This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER ONE.

STATE OF THE NATION.

It is a practice which would prove no less beneficial to a nation than to a private trader, to make up a distinct account of its actual situation at the close of every year; to observe the situation of loss and gain which had befallen it during the preceding twelve months; and to consider how the one might be diminished and the other encreased, in a succeeding period. It is from ignorance of what has happened even to themselves, from inattention to those lessons which experience is constantly endeavouring to impress on their minds, that nations, like individuals, are perpetually recommitting the blunders for which they have already smarted, or deploring the want of advantages which are already in their power. The past, when unobserved, fails to instruct; and the future, when seen through the dusky mass of mere uninformed conjecture, presents nothing but a chaos in which all is visionary hope, or groundless apprehension.

Were our limits as extensive as our wishes, we should endeavour to make up the national accounts, to deduce the balance of its profits and losses from a comparison with a former period, to ascertain the causes which led to prosperous or pernicious results, and, aided by the powerful voice of experience, to inculcate upon our countrymen, the course which their own welfare and honour seem to prescribe.

But our labours for the use of the public are as yet only in their commencement; we have not had an opportunity to develope to our countrymen the real nature of preceding transactions; and the political events, even of the last twelvemonth, are sufficiently numerous, important, and intricate, to require a volume for their detail, discussion, and due appreciation. But what lies within our power we shall endeavour to effect: we shall attempt to draw up an inventory of the national affairs, for the commencement of the present year, and to inform the public, as briefly as possible, of the situation in which the interests of our country are placed both at home and abroad. Every succeeding week will afford us an opportunity of pointing out the progressive changes in this state of things; and the commencement of another year will be the period for striking a balance.

Our internal condition still displays an undiminished vigour and a progressive advancement. Our agriculture, the fundamental source of national wealth, daily receives fresh improvements: societies, established for the purpose, encourage and promulgate the discoveries of cultivators; the great and the rich proprietors employ themselves in those extensive experiments which are beyond the means of the farmer; and large and unproductive wastes are continually reclaimed to useful vegetation. Our manufactures increase in number and refinement with the increase of our population and wealth: our internal commerce, the great instrument for diffusing comfort and riches through every part of the nation, and our coasting trade, the main prop of our maritime greatness, display an equally extensive augmentation.

This exhilirating prospect, however, is not without its darker shades. The tythe-laws still serve to turn the hearts of the people against morality and religion, by embroiling them in odious quarrels with their teachers; the poor laws still lay their iron hands on the industrious, and give encouragement to idleness and vice: the want of cheap and general means for education still leaves a large portion of the people of England in lamentable ignorance, with all its attendant miseries and crimes: the remains of the feudal institutions are allowed to encroach on the equal rights of the nation, and the proprietors of land still retain the privilege of cheating their just creditors with impunity.

Yet are not these blots on our national prosperity to be considered as any signs of degeneracy, as evils which we have incurred by recent misconduct: their baneful influence has long hung upon our political constitution, and we are now making greater efforts than ever to shake off the distemper. Plans for commuting the tythes have been suggested; devices have been presented to the Legislature for the gradual abolition of the poor laws; methods for the education of the lower classes have them also been discussed, and warmly approved; while a bill for the partial abolition of the ignominious privilege of the landed proprietors has been introduced into Parliament by one of the greatest lawyers of our age. Though ignorance and prejudice may, for a while, maintain their sway, these facts prove, that the sun of knowledge and improvement is rapidly rising on our country.

There is one, and perhaps only one cause of fearful presage, which seems to blacken as we advance, and threatens, ultimately, to overcast the national glory with its baleful shade. It cannot be dissembled, that our public burthens have, in the course of a few years, increased to an amazing degree, unprecedented in the history of any other nation; that our taxes have been necessarily augmented in the same distressing proportion; that, after laying, on nearly every article, as great impositions as they could bear, without diminishing the consumption, our government has, at length, been obliged to have recourse to direct and galling taxes, which send the tax-gatherer into our houses, and compel every man to a disclosure of his private affairs;—these evils cannot be dissembled, and no adequate remedy has yet been devised. We do not overlook the merits of the Sinking Fund, but we distrust its efficacy, especially under its present modifications, when we compare the amount of the annual loans with the amount of the annual redemption. We derive no consolation from those recent palliatives, which only put off the evil to a future day; and we see no prospect of those decisive economical retrenchments, without which, we fear, the ultimate catastrophe cannot be averted.

Temporary facilities ought to be taken into the account, as well as permanent advantages. Our finances present a most flourishing appearance, and even exceed, in productiveness, the calculations of our Ministers. The intricate laws, relative to the income tax, have become better understood; our tax-gatherers have become more expert by practice; our wealth and population are greatly on the increase; and, in spite of adverse circumstances, even our custom-house duties are unusually productive. Our national credit stands as high, and our facility of borrowing remains as great, as when the first instalments of our funded debt was advanced; and will, in all probability, continue so until the last farthing be mortgaged, not only of our present War taxes, but of every tax that can be raised. We enter into the gratification, which these circumstances must afford to the Ministers of the present age; but we must be allowed to tremble for posterity.

From this short view of our internal situation, by which our prosperity is chiefly to be estimated, we turn to the consideration of our external relations. Great Britain is now placed in a condition in which she may distinctly ascertain whether her own internal resources are perfectly adequate to her defence, or whether she cannot, without external aid, resist a combination of external enemies. The most powerful Prince that has ever reigned in Europe, a man raised from obscurity by his own transcendant talents, has succeeded in reducing every surrounding nation to a complete subserviency, and has converted them all into instruments of vengeance against this hated nation. The plans of vengeance which he has devised, if not wise, are are at least vast and magnificent. Comparing our wonderful resources with those of the countries under his own dominion, and impressed with our striking superiority, he has conceived that our external commerce, the only advantage which we seem exclusively to possess, is the source of all our riches and aggrandisement; and that, if deprived of this fountain of wealth, we should soon sink into miserable decay, and become humble suppliants for his forbearance and favour. In conformity with these views, he has undertaken to cut off our intercourse with foreign nations; and as he has not the power of blockading our island by sea, he has resolved to compel every nation of the Continent to exclude our merchandize from its shores. In this vast enterprise he has already succeeded beyond all previous calculation; and, with the exception of Sweden, which cannot long resist his influence, there is not a single harbour in the Continent of Europe, into which an English vessel can obtain a friendly admittance.

The folly of these enterprizes, and the very false judgment which Bonaparte has formed of the real sources of British greatness, will speedily be evinced. He will find that the interruption of our continental commerce may distress a few manufacturers and merchants, but will neither diminish the sum of our national industry, nor even the receipts of our Exchequer. In time he would discover that his estimate of our finances is not less absurd than the calculations of some of our own wise politicians, who, twelve years ago, affirmed that France could not possibly support the expences of another campaign.

It must be truly consolatory to our countrymen, to be assured that no nation in Europe can exclude our commerce, without bringing upon themselves tenfold greater distresses than they can possibly make us sustain. The commencement of war with Britain entirely deprived France of all direct commerce in her own vessels with other nations, and the late severe edicts which Bonaparte has issued, with a view to prevent the importation of our productions by means of neutrals, has cut off from his subjects every source of comfort and opulence which they derived from an intercourse with foreign nations. All the states which he has reduced to subjection are equal or greater sufferers. The Dutch, who not only prospered but subsisted by external commerce, and who had hitherto been saved from the deepest distress by the connivance of their rulers at a secret traffic with Britain, are now, by the strict enforcement of the prohibitory laws, reduced to such a calamitous condition, that they have even ventured to murmur their miseries in the face of their oppressors. Russia loses her external commerce, and the means of internal cultivation; Prussia is placed in the same unhappy predicament; Spain finds left on her hands those raw materials which she has not the capital or the industry to manufacture; and Portugal must desist from the cultivation of her vineyards, the former sources of her wealth, when she can no longer find a market for their produce.

From these considerations, it appears, that Bonaparte cannot prosecute his schemes of vengance against the external commerce of Britain, without bringing far deeper distress on France, her allies, and dependents: that, in short, the more fiercely he deals his blows, he will the more rapidly shatter the weapon which he aims against the impenetrable helmet of our prosperity. Nor has the discontents which his impotent enmity excites to be overlooked. There is not a maritime province within his dominions, or the reach of his influence, which does not smart under the rigour of his prohibitory edicts, and send forth its murmurs against them: and the Russians already begin to give evident indications, that the timidity of their Court will not long be able to overcome a general sense of national interest.

When we turn our eyes from the Continent of Europe, we see vast entrances open to our commerce, which cannot be shut against us, either by the arts or the arms of our enemies, and which can only be lost by our own misconduct. The Americans, indeed, have begin to assume that tone of presumption and insolence, which is natural even to infant Republics, from a consciousness of their own vigour and energy; but by a mixture of moderation and firmness, the angry demagogues of that country may speedily be silenced. There, as in Europe, Britain would be a loser; but America would be tenfold a sufferer. In the pursuit of maritime rights which she has not the power to assert, she would only incur the certain destruction of her commerce, and the deprivation of the most indispensable comforts of life.

The establishment of the Portuguese Government in South America, promises to open to our most productive manufactures an extensive market, which must for a long series of years continue progressively to increase its demands. We have here an Ally bound to us by the strongest ties, who can have no intercourse with any other nation but by our permission, and who can have no reason to desire any commerce but our own. If we can only inspire the Government with a liberal policy, the Brazils must long prove an invaluable treasure to this country.

Our colonial possessions in the East and West Indies, present a less flattering appearance. We, indeed, see no reason to entertain any apprehension from those imaginary expeditions of the French and Russians, with which some ingenious speculators have imagined that Hindostan would be overwhelmed; but insults have lately been offered to the most sacred prejudices of the natives; the foundation has thus been laid for infinite discontents and insurrections; while a great portion of the commerce of India is thrown into the hands of other nations by the baneful operation of a chartered monopoly. In our West India islands, great discontents prevail: our planters, from an imprudent avidity to accumulate rapid fortunes, have cultivated sugar to an extent far beyond what any market in the world can receive; and the sufferings, to which they are necessarily subjected by this imprudence, are aggravated by the perseverance of the mother country in cutting off their intercourse with other nations.

We refrain from expatiating on our national armaments, as the strength of these must depend on our resources. We have a navy more than sufficient to crush all the maritime forces of the world; and an army perfectly adequate, from its numbers, to our internal defence. But it is in these armaments that we perceive a total want of that economy and order which are absolutely necessary to prevent the ruin even of our immense resources.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. I.

COBBETT'S POLITICAL REGISTER.

We have ever looked upon it as a crime, ignominious in itself, and very heinous from its effects on society, to sit down and deliberately misrepresent the nature of political events. In a country where so much depends upon public opinion, where popular delusions may either disconcert and ruin the best laid measures of government, or, on the other hand, enable designing and unprincipled ministers to barter the prosperity and liberties of their nation for the attainment of their own selfish ends,—such misrepresentations appear to us tenfold pernicious, and tenfold criminal.

Yet—(we make the remark with a deep feeling of national degradation)—it will be difficult to point out a single political publication, printed in a periodical form, which is not tainted with this very base and mischievous crime; which actually practises that impartial, candid, and manly mode of discussion, allowed by our boasted privilege, the freedom of the press; which does not systematically wrest every occurrence to its own particular purposes, and wilfully pervert the clearest truths by its malignant glosses. Those who are aware of this universal corruption of the periodical press, read the political essays of newspapers, not so much with a view to gain true information, as to hear what is said by a particular party. They know, for example, that the Morning Post will always be on one side, the Morning Chronicle always on the opposite; and it may be amusing to observe the strange contrast of appearance which the same fact presents, after having passed through their rival manufactories. But few have the opportunity, and still fewer the sagacity, to develope the impostures of these corruptors of public opinion: most men take their political creeds, without farther inquiry, from the newspaper which they usually read; and as the newspapers of different factions always give a different representation of the same transaction, there is not a single political event with regard to which a large portion of the people are not misled, abused, and deceived into dangerous errors. No wonder that the honest and unsuspicious become ready dupes to these deliberate propagators of political fraud; to men who promulgate their unprincipled falsehoods, with the same devotion and enthusiasm as if they had actually felt the inspiration of patriotism, and the impulse of conscience.

Surely, if there ever was a duty incumbent on a political writer, it is to open the eyes of his countrymen to those delusions so artfully thrown before them; to extricate them from errors which may be fatal to their own peace, fatal to the prosperity of their country; and to expose, by reason or by ridicule, those ignominious speculators in falsehood, who deliberately resolve to lie themselves into notoriety and affluence. We undertake the task with pleasure, and shall execute it with fidelity; conscious that, in doing so, we discharge a real duty to our country. We know well the fate that awaits us: Those writers who smart under our indignant strictures, will, at first, pretend to treat our remarks with contemptuous silence: when they find that the public cannot be brought into the same humour, they will commence their disguised attacks on a certain censorious Sunday Paper, but carefully avoid to name The National Register, lest they should, forsooth, promote our notoriety: but when, at length, these subterfuges can no longer avail them, and when the public voice loudly calls upon them to stand forth in their own vindication, then are we prepared to meet every species of reviling, which detected impostors can pour on The National Register. Yet, however loud these railings, we do not despair that the contest will ultimately terminate in real public good. The propagators of falsehood, when fairly detected in their practices, lose their influence over even the most credulous. Calumny, when fairly refuted, recoils with double force on the inventor; and virulent invectives, when uttered by impotent resentment, serve only to convert indignation into unmingled contempt.

The declaimers, whose corrupting labours we shall endeavour to expose, are not confined to the mere interested supporters of the two great contending factions, to the retained abettors of the outs and the ins, to the men with as little soul as conscience, who dare neither praise nor blame, nor refuse to praise nor to blame, unless as they are licenced by the sovereign nod of their masters. There have lately appeared certain political writers who vehemently affect the praise of impartiality, who actually lash both the outs and the ins when it suits their occasions, and who certainly shew abundance of intrepidity in their political declamations. But when we open their pages to look after these political novelties, truth and candour, we find ourselves as far removed from them as ever: we find misrepresentations as gross, invectives as virulent, designs as pernicious as those from which we turned away in disgust. We discover that pride, malignity, or the mere love of notoriety, may lead men to act as villainous a part in politics, as if they had sold themselves to be the devoted tools of a party: while their iniquitous glosses are far more dangerous from their lofty pretensions of impartiality, and their evident intrepidity in alternately traducing both our great political factions.

At the head of this class of professed impartialists, stands the author of The Political Register. This man is possessed of very uncommon merit of a peculiar kind. Without any education beyond the elements of reading and writing, and without a systematic knowledge of any subject, he was led by the ardour and energy of his mind to adventure into the world as a political author. The fury of his declamations forced attention: and though his ignorance and outrageous violence have frequently brought him into contempt and disgrace, he has at length succeeded, by invincible perseverance, in raising himself, solely by his political writings, from poverty and obscurity, to very considerable affluence, and very great notoriety. With solid information, with a sound judgment, with confirmed principles of truth and honesty, such a character would have been invaluable: he might have proved the terror of political profligacy, and have improved the age by his vigorous chastisements. But destitute, as we shall hereafter shew him to be, of all these requisites; his ardour, his intrepidity, his perseverance, serve only to diffuse more widely, and to impress more deeply the dictates of his ignorance, his prejudices, his perverted passions. The middling and lower classes of the community, who read to believe, and who have neither leisure nor inclination to sift fallacies to the bottom, have The Political Register constantly in their hands, and swallow down its weekly banquet with amazing eagerness: It is, therefore, of importance, that we should bring to some test the infallibility of this gospel, to which some men implicitly pin their faith.

Mr. Cobbett knows, that to speak with perfect assurance is a certain way to impose upon a great part of mankind; and that, whatever is asserted with dauntless confidence, whether right or wrong, will meet with many believers. He, therefore, puts this art in practice on all occasions; and makes no scruple to challenge implicit belief to his present assertion, though there is scarcely a political opinion, which he has not successively maintained and reprobated, scarcely an eminent statesman whom he has not, at one time, represented as the noblest, at another, as the vilest of men. Mr. Pitt was, with him, at one period, the wise, the great, the heaven-born minister; but now, Mr. Pitt is in his eyes, the most weak, worthless minister that ever ruled a nation; the greatest curse that Britain ever saw; a wretch, whose very ashes he thinks himself called upon to insult and trample. Mr. Fox was once branded as the most diabolical of incendiaries; and The Political Register actually first attracted notice by a whimsical attempt to prove, that this statesman had gone to Paris to concert schemes with Bonaparte against his country: and now, Mr. Fox is venerated as the only person, in either party, who had any share of wisdom or virtue. It is but two years since the nation was loudly warned against Burdett, as a firebrand, who must be either extinguished, or set his country in flames: and now, this same firebrand is discovered to be a very pillar of light to direct our darkness, the only man to whom we must look for salvation. Commerce was once idolized as "the life-blood of the nation;" and now, The Political Register glories in assuming the motto of "Perish "Commerce!"

Mr. Cobbett does not deny these inconsistencies, but he assures us, that nothing is more pardonable. Every man, he argues, must grow wiser by experience; and as soon as he has discovered his errors, the best thing he can do, is, like him, to recant them, and strenuously propagate his more enlightened opinions. This may be a decent apology for Mr. Cobbett's tergiversations, but it is a poor amends to those whom he has successively misled. Suppose the nation had all along listened to his opinions, they would find themselves in a fine condition when his eyes became opened. He was once a furious Anti-Jacobin, and thought that the nation could only be saved from destruction, by weeding out, by banishment, or the scaffold, all the accursed race of Democrats. If his advice had been taken at that period, what an awkward figure would the national councils make now that he has discovered the Anti-Jacobins to have been a set of infamous scoundrels, and these same Democrats the only honest men in the kingdom! Poor Horne Tooke, and Sir Francis Burdett, would not at this day have had ears to hear the applauses now showered upon them. At present, Mr. Cobbett assures us, "that capital, credit, and commerce, tend to weaken rather "than strengthen our country; tend to produce her subjugation, rather than to preserve her independence." (Vol. xii. p. 889.) Suppose we should take all this for undoubted truth, and manfully set about rooting out these fatal inmates, till we should be as free from them as a bankrupt, who had just paid sixpence in the pound; would it not be unfortunate, if Mr. Cobbett should just then happen to discover that he had been in a very great error, that commerce, credit, and capital, had been the real sources of our national greatness, and that we must now become slaves to Bonaparte, without further murmur, since we had deprived ourselves of the only means of resisting him! In short, it appears from Mr. Cobbett's own confessions, that however confidently he makes any statement, and though he be ready to stake his body and soul on its veracity, yet we must not, at our peril, believe one word of it, till he has had at least five or six years to detect its errors.

If we may believe Mr. Cobbett, his political sagacity is very amazing; for there is scarcely a political occurrence which he does not assure us he distinctly foresaw—after it has taken place. But when we look at his prophecies, before the event, they are generally of a very different cast. We select the most recent instance, his speculations about the emigration of the Portuguese Government, a measure dictated by so many imperious circumstances, that it would have been most strange had it not taken place. In his Number of October 24, p. 652, he ridicules "the Brazil adventure," as "so very romantic as "to merit not a moment of serious attention." Four weeks afterwards, p. 801, he again pours contempt on the expatriation project, assuring us, that "none but sheer fools ever gave cre"dit to it; and that none but sheer knaves ever pretended to "give credit to it." In his Number of December 26, the actual accomplishment of this derided project, obliges him to confess his surprise; but he solaces his mortification, by asserting that the Brazils are worse than "the very worst country in Europe," and abound in nothing but "venemous reptiles!"

But neither ignorance or prejudice delude this singular writer into such absurdities, or lead him so far beyond the bounds of truth and honesty, as an insatiable vanity which seizes and devours every thing that can be brought within its grasp. The most harmless indications of this passion appear in the fulsome complimentary letters with which the pages of his Register are continually loaden: for instance, a correspondent in the Number for December 26, expresses his full conviction, "that "unless the higher ranks follow Mr. Cobbett's advice, a few "years only will be necessary to complete the destruction of "our national prosperity." But a much more glaring indication of this principle was exhibited in his late attack on the Learned Languages. The frequent blunders into which he had been led by his want of education, exceedingly mortified his vanity, and incited him to the curious task of proving that learning was a thing of no value under the sun. He began with a furious onset on the Learned Languages; and finding that his arguments produced no impression, unless on such as were as ignorant as himself, he now contents himself with expressing an utter contempt of universities, professors, and whatever bears the appearance of a regular education. "When I see L. L. D. "in a title page," says he, "if I am not well acquainted with "the name that precedes it, I instantly throw down the book, as "the work of one who has obtained his certificate of learning "from our well educated neighbours to the North, at the price "of a second-hand wig."

But the most curious display of his vanity appears in those charges which he brings against other writers as plagiarists from his Register. As he is perpetually writing, he necessarily throws out a number of random observations on a great variety of political topics: and when any of these topics happen afterwards to be treated of systematically by some other author, he makes no scruple, from a few similar thoughts, to infer that the work has been stolen from him. A curious example of this has lately occurred with regard to a pamphlet published by a Mr. Spence, where, from the principles of the French Economists, which he adopts, the author endeavours to prove the independence of Britain on Commerce. This doctrine Mr. Cobbett zealously espouses: and prudently forgetting that it was originally promulgated by the Economists, and taking for granted that Mr. Spencer claims the merit of the discovery, he ransacks the pages of his Register, and thence produces several paragraphs to prove that he himself was the author of the doctrine, and that Mr. Spence is a notorious plagiarist. For some time, Mr. Spence heard in silence these singular exhibitions of vanity, amazed in what they would end; but he has, at length, published an answer to the charges of plagiarism. He there shews Mr. Cobbet, that the very doctrines, now in question, were held by Aristotle two thousand years ago, enlarged and fully explained by the French Economists in the last century, and treated of by many authors in our own country. He shows, that his pamphlet was in the printers' hands before several of the alleged plagiarised passages had appeared; and that, in particular, the extract on which Mr. Cobbett lays the greatest stress, appeared in The Political Register three weeks after Mr. Spence's pamphlet was published! !!

But it would appear, from this reply of Mr. Spence, that Mr. Cobbett's charges were not altogether the result of ignorance; that Mr. Cobbett quoted in his Register five pages of the commencement of Mr. Spence's pamphlet, and in all these omitted only four words, in which it was distinctly stated, that the opinions treated of were those of the Economists! ! ! But if Mr. Cobbett had allowed his readers to know the truth, how could he have arrogated to himself the discovery of these opinions!—The suppression was a master-stroke of policy!

We may pause and admire, when we recollect that this very Mr. Cobbett arrogates to himself a monopoly of all the political sagacity, honesty, and candour of the age—this very man who cannot even pretend to political consistency, who has refuted in one part of his writings whatever he has advanced in another, who appears to copy authors who have written before him, and then flatly accuses them of plagiarism; and who seems to want even some grains of common honesty. We shall hereafter have abundance of opportunity to exemplify the modesty, candour, and moderation with which this immaculate reformer attacks every one who presumes to differ from his opinions.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

FROM THE FRENCH PAPERS.

Paris, Dec. 26.

IMPERIAL DECREE.—REJOINDER TO HIS BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S ORDER IN COUNCIL, OF THE 11TH OF NOV. 1807.

At our Royal Palace, at Milan, Dec. 17, 1807.

Napoleon, Emperor of the French, King of Italy, and Protector of the Rhinish Confederation:

Observing the measures adopted by the British Government, on the 11th of November last, by which vessels belonging to neutral, friendly, or even Powers the allies of England, are made liable, not only to be searched by English cruizers, but to be compulsorily detained in England, and to have a tax laid on them of so much per cent. on the cargo, to be regulated by the British Legislature.

Observing that by these acts the British Government denationalizes ships of every nation in Europe, that it is not competent for any Government to detract from its own independence and rights, all the Sovereigns of Europe having in trust the sovereignties and independence of the flag; that if by an unpardonable weakness, and which, in the eyes of posterity, would be an indelible stain, such a tyranny was allowed to be established into principles and consecrated by usage, the English would avail themselves of it to assert it as a right, as they have availed themselves of the tolerance of Governments to establish the infamous principle, that the flag of a nation does not cover goods, and to give to their right of blockade an arbitrary extension, and which infringes on the Sovereignty of every State; we have decreed, and do decree, as follows:

Art. I. Every ship, to whatever nation it may belong, that shall have submitted to be searched by an English ship, or to a voyage to England, or that shall have paid any tax whatsoever to the English Government, is thereby, and for that alone, declared to be denationalized, to have forfeited the protection of its King, and to have become English property.

Art. II. Whether the ships thus denationalized by the arbitrary measures of the English Government, enter into our ports, or those of our allies, or whether they fall into the hands of our ships of war, or of our privateers, they are declared to be good and lawful prizes.

Art. III. The British Islands are declared to be in a state of blockade, both by land and sea. Every ship, of whatever nation or whatsoever the nature of its cargo so may be, that sails from the ports of England, or those of the English Colonies, and of countries occupied by English troops, and proceeding to England, or to the English Colonies, or to Countries occupied by English troops, is good and lawful prize, as contrary to the present Decree; and may be captured by our ships of war or our privateers, and adjudged to the captor.

Art. IV. These measures, which are resorted to only in just retaliation of the barbarous system adopted by England, which assimilates its legislation to that of Algiers, shall cease to have any effect with respect to all Nations who shall have the firmness to compel the English Government to respect their flag. They shall continue to be rigourously in force as long as that Government does not return to the principle of the Law of Nations, which regulates the relations of civilized States in a state of war. The provisions of the present Decree shall be abrogated and null, in fact, as soon as the English abide again by the principles of the Law of Nations, which are also the principles of justice and of honour.

All our Ministers are charged with the execution of the present Decree, which shall be inserted in the Bulletin of the Laws. (Signed) NAPOLEON.

By order of the Emperor,

The Secretary of State, (Signed) H. B. MARET.

As a Supplement to this Decree there is in the Official Journal the following Circular Letter, addressed by the Minister of the Interior to the Chambers of Commerce.

"You are not unacquainted, Gentlemen, with the late acts of the British Government, that last stage of the oppression of the commerce of the world; you know that it has resolved to destroy the feeble remains of the independence of the seas. It now thinks proper, that henceforth no ship shall navigate the seas without touching at its ports, without a tribute to its pretended sovereignty; and without receiving from it an ignominious licence.

"Thus the Ocean is henceforward only the field of slavery: the usurpation of the most sacred of the rights of nations is consummated, and this tyrannic yoke is to press upon them until the day of vengeance, or until brought to a due sense of moderation, the English Government will itself calm its rage, and break that sceptre to which the nations of the Continent will never consent to submit.

"I am calling our common attention to the important circumstances which must powerfully induce us to awaken your patriotism and your wisdom. One would have imagined, that every obstruction and restraint that clogged the course of the commerce on the Continent, had been exhausted; still, however, they are going to be aggravated by the measures lately adopted by England; but they will find our minds made up to struggle against, and to overcome, this new mode of oppression.

"We must not shut our eyes to the consequences. Importation and exportation, already so much restricted, will soon be much more so. Every thing connected with maritime commerce; every thing that depends upon it, will now be liable to more difficulties, to more uncertainty. There are, however, two channels that still remain open.

"The power of attacking every ship that renounces the independence of its national flag, by a shameful submission to the British Sovereignty, and by navigating under a British license, will open a wide field to the hopes of our Commanders. Such a resource will not prove ineffectual, and French conscience will not devote itself uselessly to that sort of warfare which never lets courage, dexterity, and decision, go unrewarded.

"We have moreover to hope that neutral ships will elude the vigilance of the English cruizers; the immense extent of the coasts of the empire will favour and protect their enterprises.

"These resources ought not to be undervalued, nor counted for nothing. France will submit to a temporary situation, which can only change with time, and with new exertions; but her enemy shall not deprive her of the main basis of her prosperity, her internal communication, her relations with the Continent, where she no longer sees any but friends or allies; her soil will not be less fertile, her industry will not maintain itself the less, though deprived of some materials which is not impossible to replace.

"To this last proposition I am rather anxious, Gentlemen, to direct your attention. You have advice to give, and examples to hold out to commerce. You must already foresee the effect of the privation of certain materials, more especially of cotton, and of ingredients for dying cotton, of which a quantity has been stored up in France: that which we shall derive from the

Levant, and that which, at a more distant period, we shall reap from our indigenous culture, not unsuccessfully essayed, will suffice to support, in a great measure, our manufactures; but in the expectation that some of them may experience privations, we must have recourse, as far as possible, to hemp and flax, in order to provide occupation for those manufacturers who would no longer be employed with articles of cotton. It were desirable that we would circumscribe our consumption within the products of the materials the growth of our soil, and restrain the unhappy effects of habits and taste contracted for manufactures, that would render us dependent upon foreign countries.

"The materials for dying may become scarce—but many of them may be replaced by the productions of our soil. We will dispense with the rest by a slight sacrifice of some colours, which may please from their apparent greater beauty, without adding any thing to the intrinsic goodness of the article. Besides, no small reliance is to be placed on the genius of our manufacturers: it will triumph over those difficulties.

"The channels, which in spite of these usurpations, will remain open to importation, may not suffice for the consumption of sugar and coffee; these objects of a secondary utility may become scarce; but the great mass of the nation will not suffer from this temporary privation: habits of indulgence too widely indulged will be counteracted and restrained by the rise in the price.

"And besides, is it to be supposed that the Great Nation will allow itself to be intimidated by the privation of some futile enjoyments? Her armies have endured, without a murmur, the most pinching wants: that great example will not have been held out in vain; and when we have in view to reconquer the independence of the seas; when we have in view to rescue and redeem commerce from the ruinous acts of piracy that are juridically exercised against it; when we have in view the vindication of the national honour, and the breaking down of those furcæ caudinæ which England is attempting to erect upon our coasts, the French people will support with the dignity and courage that belong to their great character, the momentary sacrifices that are imposed upon their taste, their habits, and their industry. The commerce of Europe will soon, no doubt, be rescued from oppression. The interests of nations; the honour of Sovereigns; the magnanimous resolutions of the most powerful of the Allies of France; the power and wish of the hero who rules over us; the justice of a cause to which Heaven will grant its protection; every motive concurs to decide the contest; nor can its issue remain uncertain. Accept, Gentlemen, the assurance of my sincere esteem.

(Signed) "CRETET."

VIENNA, DEC. 2.—The Court Gazette of this day contains the following article from Turkey:

"Tranquillity is again disturbed in the frontier and Eastern provinces of the Ottoman Empire. The following particulars of the passing of the Bozawa by the Turks, have been received from Serajevo, the capital of Bosnia:

"At the commencement of October, this body of Ottoman troops on the Drina, which amounted only to 10,000 men, were secretly increased by successive reinforcements to 25,000. On the 8th of October, Hassan Pacha assembled all his force at Kraila, on the Buzawa, not far from Seniza, and on the 10th he passed the river. He immediately advanced against the Servian positions; but the latter fell back at every point, and in the evening the Turks reached the Castle of Socco. On the four following days the Servians made several attacks, and on the 15th, having received large reinforcements, they repulsed the Mussulmen. Following up these advantages, they re-passed the Buzawa, and advanced to Vartz, a few miles from Tarajevo. To stop their progress, Bekir Pacha, Vizir Travenick, summoned a levy en masse against the Servians. He marched out of Travenick on the 18th, with 2000 men.

"Nothing respecting the evacuation of Wallachia or Moldavia has yet taken place. A new Russian corps has marched from Mohilow towards these two principalities. General Prince Apraxim, Brigadier of this corps, is still at Bucharest, whither Prince Prosorowsky has also repaired from Yassy. The advanced posts have been again reinforced, and all correspondence or [illegible]

HAVRE, DEC. 11.—The day before yesterday an American vessel, with a rich cargo of colonial produce, came in and anchored in our roads. The Maritime Prefect immediately sent on board her an officer of the principal office, and an interpreter. The officer put this question to the Captain; "Have you not touched at England since you quitted the United States?" "Yes," said the Captain, "I was forcibly carried into Plymouth by an English frigate." Upon this declaration, which was in direct contradiction to the decree respecting the continental blockade, the vessel was prohibited from entering, and an order to withdraw was intimated to her.

MADRID, NOV. 26.—Don St. Jago Leniers, has sent to his Excellency the Prince Generalissimo and Grand Admiral, the official account of the events which took place at Buenos Ayres, in the course of last July.

His Majesty, as a reward for the extraordinary proofs of loyalty given by that city, as well as for the services rendered by Don St. Jago Leniers, and by several officers, has declared that the city of Buenos Ayres is to henceforth have the title of Excellence, and that its Magistrates are to be called Seigniors; that Don St. Jago Leniers is to receive the rank of Field Marshal, and is appointed Viceroy; that all the officers who served under him are to be promoted, and that the Viceroy is to name the rewards which are to be bestowed on those who have distinguished themselves.

ITALY.

VENICE, DEC. 3.—His Majesty visited on the first of this month a part of the Lagunes and the fort of Malamocco. Yesterday, at ten o'clock, his Majesty witnessed the launching of a frigate in the Arsenal. At two o'clock he was present at the amusement of the Regatta. It was a match of goudolas, in three parties: the first was between two boats, manned by a single rower each; the second and third between boats manned with two rowers each. The course they took was the great canal which crosses the city from one end to the other. The beautiful gallies which had served on the first entrance of the Emperor, cut through the crowd of barks, and cleared the passage for the gondolas, who followed in the race. His Majesty, with all his Court, was situated in the balcony of the Palace, which commands a full view of the canal. This charming sight, the immense number of barks, and the joy manifested by the crowds of spectators, displayed Venice in all its singular beauties. The illuminations which concluded the day were general, and magnificent beyond description.

SENATE.—WASHINGTON CITY, NOV. 25.

Mr. Adams submitted the following resolution for consideration:—

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested, to cause to be laid before the Senate, a return of the number of American Seamen impressed or detained by British armed vessels, whose names have been reported to the department of State, since the last statement made to Congress, mentioning the names of the persons impressed, the time and place of their impressment, the names of the ships, and as far as may be known of the officers by whom they were impressed, together with any material facts or circircumstances in relation to the same: stating also the whole number of seamen impressed since the commencement of the present war, what number of persons impressed according to the last statement of the Secretary of State, has since been restored, and the numbers still detained since demand of [illegible] made, with the reason assigned for [illegible]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THE AFFAIR OF THE CHESAPEAKE.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.—Mr. Blount, from a Committee of the House of Representatives on a part of the President's Message, reported this day on the subject of the attack on the Chesapeake. The report commences with an expression of sensibility at this outrage; states the receipt of information relative thereto from the State and Navy Departments; presents a general view of the circumstances, observing that it might be said to have been incontestibly proved, that William Ware, John Strachan, and Dan Martin (three of the four persons taken out of the Chesapeake) are Citizens of the United States; but the Committee add, that they conceive it unnecessary for them or the House to go into any enquiry on that part of the subject, as, in their opinion, whether the men taken from the Chesapeake were, or were not Citizens of the United States, and whether the Chesapeake was, or was not within the acknowledged limits of the United States at the time they were taken, the character of the act of taking them remains the same.

From the foregoing facts, it appears to your Committee, that the outrage committed on the frigate Chesapeake has been stamped with circumstances of indignity and insult, of which there is scarcely to be found a parallel in the history of civilized nations, and requires only the sanction of the government under colour of whose authority it was perpetrated, to make it just cause of, if not an irresistible call for, instant and severe retaliation. Whether it will receive that sanction, or be disavowed and declared an unauthorized act of a subordinate officer, remains to be determined by the answer which shall be given to the demand of explanation; that answer, now daily expected, will either sink the detestible act into piracy, or expand it to the magnitude of premeditated hostility against the sovereignty and independence of this Nation; and until its true character shall be fixed and known, your Committee deem it expedient to decline expressing any opinion as to the measures proper to be adopted in retaliation to it. But the Committee add, as other acts of aggression have been committed within our ports and waters, such as those mentioned in the President's Message, the Committee are of opinion, that it is expedient to provide more effectually for the protection of our ports and harbours; but not being prepared to report specifically upon that subject, they ask further indulgence of the House, and submit the following Resolution:—

"Resolved, That the attack of the British ship of war Leopard on the United States frigate Chesapeake, was a flagrant violation of the jurisdiction of the United States; and that the continuance of the British squadron (of which the Leopard was one) in their waters, after being notified of the Proclamation of the President of the United States, ordering them to depart the same, was a farther violation thereof."

Nov. 18.—Yesterday the Hon. Mr. Lyon stated in the House of Representatives, that he wished the galleries cleared, and the doors closed, bolted, and barred, as he had some highly important matters to communicate. The House having gratified his wishes, he observed that Mr. Erskine, the British Minister, had recently transferred Stock, possessed by his father, to a large amount in the American Funds, and in consequence proposed the following Resolution:—

"That provision ought to be made by law, forbidding all transfers of right of action, and all monies, and other property, either real or personal, to or by any subject of the Crown of Great Britain, and also forbidding any Citizen or Resident of the United States paying any debt or demand upon any such subject."

Not a single Member supported the Resolution, but all censured its imprudence. The general opinion was, that if persisted in by the Mover, the doors should be instantly opened, and the resolutions rejected in public.

Mr. Lyon then withdrew the Resolution, and the galleries were opened, under the understanding that all secrecy was at an end.

Nov. 27.—Mr. J. Clay presented a Memorial from sundry inhabitants and traders of the city of Philadelphia, praying that the Act prohibiting the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandize, passed the 18th April, 1806, may be repealed.

Mr. Clay moved, that the Memorial be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. Rowan hoped the Petition would not be referred to any Committee. He thought it would be beneath the dignity of the House to give it any consideration. Had he been in Congress at the time the law passed, he would have voted against it; but as it had passed, and as we had received a fresh insult from Great Britain in the attack on the Chesapeak, he would not vote for its repeal.

Mr. Crowninshield said, that from the rumours which were afloat, and the disposition of Great Britain, he entertained no hope that she would do America justice. She was making great preparations, endeavouring to decoy the Indians on our frontiers, and was arming her Militia in Canada and Nova Scotia.

Mr. Randolph said, if the prayer of the petitioners was improper, would it not be better to expose their errors in a masterly Report from a Committee, than to slam the door in their faces, and affecting all the airs of an Asiatic Sovereign, refuse to hear them? We were, he believed, on the eve of a war with Great Britain; and we were treading in the very footsteps of the British Ministry on the eve of an American War, and on the eve of the French War.—The House, Mr. R. said, had now been in session five weeks; and, on the eve of a war, they were discussing whether we should import locks with brass nobs or locks with iron nobs; they were sitting there looking at one another, reading newspapers, writing letters, receiving bank checks, and counting their money; and the nation was precisely in the same situation as it was when the House first assembled. If we were to have a war with Great Britain, as he believed we were, it would become the House at the outset to conciliate those by whom that war was to be carried on; he meant by those, the great body of the American people, and not the rich merchant more than the landholders, but not less.

After a long debate, the question was then taken for referring the Petition to a Committee of the whole House, and it was lost,—Ayes 50—Noes 80.

The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

NEW YORK, Dec. 3.—The visit of General Moreau to the westward, and the expedition of his travelling, has excited a variety of conjecture in the political world. A friend of the General has handed us the following account of the motives of his journey, which will fully satisfy the curiosity, and allay the suspicions of those who are always watching the movements of great characters:—

"The General had some time ago, the misfortune of losing his only son. His Lady has also been under the necessity of returning to France, in order finally to settle some family concerns. Such painful separation, added to the dreadful loss which he had just experienced, have rendered his house so totally disagreeable to him, that in order to divert his grief, he has determined to undertake this excursion, and visit the Ohio and Mississippi, as far down as New Orleans. His intention is only to remain a few days at the latter place, as he wishes to be in Charleston next February, and in New York the following month.

"The season being so far advanced, made it necessary for him to travel with some rapidity, and it was only a few days before he left New York, that he was informed a passage could be procured.

"This explanation was, perhaps unnecessary, for no person of common sense will imagine, that one of the greatest generals of the age, should be willing to change his high fame for that of an adventurer."

The Senate of the United States have appointed a Committee to investigate the conduct of John Smith, Senator of the United States from the State of Ohio, as it relates to his connections with Aaron Burr. Mr. Smith is said to be at Washington.

A Resolution has passed the House of Representatives of the State of Maryland, granting leave to bring in a Bill, entitled, an Act to abolish all such parts of the Constitution and form of Government, as relate to the time and manner of electing the Senate, and the mode of filling up vacancies in that Body.—Yeas 47, Nays 9.

WEST INDIES.

SLAVE TRADE.

JAMAICA.—The House of Assembly of Jamaica have made a Report on the Act passed in the last Session of Parliament, for the Abolition of the Slave Trade. It is the object of this Report to represent the stop put to the importation of Slaves, as ruinous to the Colonies. This has been always the argument of those who opposed that benevolent measure; but it is obvious that if it were true, it cannot be proved by any effects, which have yet resulted from the abolition, as sufficient time has not yet elapsed to shew either benefits or disadvantages of the Act. If, however, the wisdom of the Legislature had not adopted that measure, it is to be feared that the Colonists would have experienced the dreadful effects of an abolition, not brought about by the influence of law, but by violence. The constant and unlimited importation of Negroes from Africa would have finally reduced our West India Islands to the melancholy situation of St. Domingo.

The following are the Resolutions of the Committee of the House:—

"Resolved, That the Act of the Imperial Parliament for abolishing the Slave Trade, is pregnant with evils to this Island, militating not only against its general welfare and interest, but threatening its total destruction as a British West India Colony. That depriving this extensive and yet unsettled Island of the means of a supply of labourers from Africa, to cultivate the soil, must be eventually ruinous to the proprietors and others interested in it: many industrious and enterprising settlers, who have braved the difficulties and hardships always attendant on infant embellishments in the interior and mountainous situations, will, with their families, be reduced to poverty and wretchedness; and, when these settlements are abandoned by their present inhabitants, they will become the haunts and fastnesses of disaffected and rebellious negroes. That properties in possession of mortgagees, receivers, guardians, and others, must shortly fall a sacrifice to this Parliamentary regulation: because, from their peculiar circumstances, they cannot be supplied with labourers, the result of which will be, to deprive a numerous description of persons, from the earliest state of infancy to the most advanced and helpless ages, of the common means of education and support."

The Jamaica Papers received on Tuesday, contain a Memorial of the of the Committee of Planters, Merchants, and others, interested in the West India Colonies, which though presented so long ago as last June, has not, till now, been published in any Paper in this Country. In this Memorial the Planters complain, "That where the relaxation of the navigation system would be beneficial to the British Planter, it is rigidly enforced; and, where the enforcement of it would be beneficial to him, it is unaccountably relaxed by the novel permission granted to a Neutral Power of carrying the produce of his rivals to undersell him at the European market.

"That your Memorialists are unwilling to intrude their concerns upon the important relations of the Mother Country with Neutral Powers; but humbly conceive, that it cannot reasonably be expected that Great Britain should see her Colonies decay, herself deprived of that Great balance of foreign trade, which she commanded by the export of her surplus colonial produce, and the Colonies of Powers, with whom she is at war, aggrandized by the continuance of a mistaken and injurious policy.

"That your Memorialists, on these grounds, humbly suggest that the now acknowledged and extreme distress of the West India Colonies of Great Britain, calls upon Government for a revision of the existing system, respecting the trade of Neutrals with the Colonies of the enemy; and justifies the reasonableness of a change in that system, so far as may be necessary for the purposes of self-defence and self-preservation."

HAYTI.

Christophe had for some time been confined with a severe indisposition, of which Petion had taken advantage to rally his partizans and invade several places, which adhered to his rival. On his recovery, Christophe lost no time in taking the field; and his skill and energy enabled him to defeat with great slaughter, those corps of his enemies which he first encountered. Petion, determined to shew himself not less active, took advantage of his rival's absence, to advance with all his forces against St. Marc and Port Le Prince. The officers of Christophe, however, were well prepared to receive him, and repulsed him with great loss in every quarter. The following is the relation of events subsequent to that period:

REPORT MADE BY THE CHIEF OF THE STAFF OF THE ARMY OF HAYTI TO THE PRESIDENT HENRY CHRISTOPHE, ON THE VICTORY GAINED THE 25TH OF OCTOBER, OVER THE ARMY OF THE REBELS, BEFORE ST. MARC.

After the unsuccessful attack of the 20th of September, another desperate attempt of St, Marc was determined upon, for which all the forces in the South of Hayti were collected. The President having received information of this design, sent, to reinforce the garrison of St. Marc, three battalions, two companies of artillery, and a squadron of cavalry, and set off himself from the Cape on the 23d of October. On the 24th he entered St. Marc, when, without dismounting, he visited all the posts, reconnoitred the positions of the enemy, and gave his orders for a general attack on the following day.

On the 25th the troops of the North entered St. Marc at ten o'clock in the morning. The President reviewed all the troops on the place d'armes, and ordered the attack at eleven o'clock.

The rebels occupied on the left the post of Pivert, distant only half a mile from the town, where they had thrown up several intrenchments. They had, in the same manner, erected some works upon the road leading from St. Marc to Port au Prince; on the right they occupied the position of Florenceau and the neighbouring hills. Brigadier Diaquoi Vigne, and Colonel L'Esperance, were detached with three battalions, in order to keep in check the rebels on the right, whilst the left was to be attacked. The Commandant Richer was left in the town with a battalion as a reserve.

The President divided the troops into two columns; the first with a piece of cannon, was ordered to force the road, and storm the intrenchments; the second column was ordered to turn the heights, to flank the rebels, and throw them upon the road, where the first column and the cavalry were ordered to receive them with vigour. The cavalry were drawn up in order of battle, at the distance of musket shot from the enemy, as a reserve. Soon after the attack was commenced, the intrenchment on the road was evacuated by the enemy, who withdrew to the intrenchment in the heights. The President was in the midst of a shower of balls, which were flying in all directions, and giving his orders with the greatest coolness.

The second column having, in the mean time, reached the heights, under fire of the enemy, the rebels were turned, and fled precipitately toward the road. They were completely put to the route, and the cavalry under Generals Pierre Toussaint and Cottereau pursuing them, they were cut to pieces, and several hundreds made prisoners.

During the engagement, some barges were seen in the bay, making demonstrations to approach the road. The President re-entered the town, and ordered the General of Artillery, Ambrois, to make his preparations in order to receive them: but those barges carefully kept out of the range of his guns.

The President went to the right, where Brigadier Diaquoi Vigie commanded the troops: he ordered an attack to be made to dislodge the rebels from their position; but on account of their great superiority of numbers, their resistance was very obstinate, and their fire extremely brisk. The Seventh Battalion even made a retrograde movement. The President then ordered Colonel Richer, who had been left at St. Marc with a battalion of reserve to move forward, and support the Seventh, which was done, and the battle was re-established. This officer having proceeded along the shore, turned the extremity of the line of the rebels; and from that moment the victory was decided. The horse guards came up at the same time, made a charge, and the flight became general. The remainder of the day was employed in searching and securing the prisoners, who had concealed themselves in the bushes, and the underwood, which are on both sides of the road. Several Colonels, Lieutenant Colonels, and other officers, with numbers of soldiers, were made prisoners. The rebels fled from the field of battle, which they left covered with their killed and wounded. Night put a stop to the pursuit, and prevented their total extermination.

The actions lasted six hours each, during which the troops of the North evinced the greatest bravery. General Diaquoi was wounded in the arm; Captain Le Jeune, Aid-de-Camp of the President, had an eye shot away by a ball; Lieutenant-Colonel Manpoint, of the horse-guards, was wounded; the two battalions of the second regiment had made a forced march of thirty-six leagues in three days, but their ardour, notwithstanding their fatigue was not relaxed.

On the 26th, the Generals Pierre Toussant and Cottereau continued the pursuit by Montrois, Les Verettes, and Les Matteux. The President went to Montrouis, and ordered that patroles should be established all along the sea shore, to interrupt such of the fugitives who should attempt to reach the barges and canoes which were ready to facilitate their escape. They were almost all made prisoners, perishing with hunger and thirst, and cursing the traitor who had exposed them to their present miserable situation. Colonel Chibasse, who pursued them in the mountains, took many prisoners, and brought off their colours.

Their famous General, Senator Bonnet, maintained his character of cowardice at the very outset of the engagement; he withdrew to Montrolus Cleagues, distant from the field of battle, and left his troops without a Commander.

No enemy being any longer to be seen, the troops of the North were sent back to their cantonments. The battalion of the 27th was ordered to take charge of the prisoners; and after having provided the necessary succour for the wounded, the President returned with his horse guards to the Cape, where he arrived on the 7th of November, and received the felicitations of the civil and military authorities. In the evening there was a general illumination. The report concludes with these words:—

"The friend of humanity, the man that loves his country, and who obeys the laws, asks himself what may be the object of the rebel Petion, when he thus exposes to certain death the miserable tools of his ambition? What would have been the fate of those unfortunate creatures, whom the chance of war put into the hands of the President, if his clemency had not spared them, even after they had raised their arms against his person? Why does the cannibal Petion cause the shedding of so much blood, unless it be in pursuance of a plan of destruction, artfully preconcerted with our implacable enemy, the enemy of the world, for diminishing the population of Hayti; a design which was always the favourite object of the French faction, of which Petion is the secret abettor, and which never was satiated on human blood, when shed to gratify their execrable ambition. PORTUGAL.

ADDITIONAL EDICTAL, OR PROCLAMATION, ISSUED BY THE PRINCE REGENT, PREVIOUS TO HIS EMBARKATION.

Instructions to which my Royal Decree of the 26th November, 1807, bears reference.

The Governors whom I was pleased to nominate, by my Royal Decree of this present date, to govern these kingdoms during my absence, will have the usual oaths administered to them by the Cardinal Patriarch, and will attend with all solicitude, vigilance, and activity, in the administration of justice, distributing the same impartially, and maintaining a rigorous observance of the laws of this kingdom. They will preserve to the natives all the privileges which had been granted to them by me and my Royal Predecessors. The plurality of votes will decide on the reports the respective Tribunals may lay before them, regulating themselves according to the Laws and Customs of the kingdom. They will direct literary professions, offices, of criminal and civil judicature and revenue, according to the forms heretofore practised by me. They will protect the persons and properties of my loyal subjects, selecting for military occupations those who may be deemed worthy thereof. They will endeavour to preserve to their utmost the tranquillity of this kingdom, to provide for the troops of the Emperor of the French and King of Italy good quarters, and to supply them with every thing they may require, during their stay in this kingdom, averting all and every insult that may be perpetrated, and punishing with rigour any that may occur; maintaining always the good harmony which ought to be displayed to the armies of nations with whom we find ourselves united on the Continent. Should it by any occurrence happen, that any of the said Governors are absent, a plurality of voters will elect a Successor. I trust to your honour and virtue, that my people will not suffer inconveniences during my absence; and should it be God's will that I should shortly return to my kingdoms, that I may meet every one contented and satisfied, reigning among them that good order and tranquillity which should exist among subjects who have rendered themselves so worthy of my paternal care.

IRELAND.

During the December Meeting of the Orange-men at Verner's bridge, in the County of Armagh, an extraordinary concourse of people assembled, which, on being dismissed, proceeded tumultuously, in a body, and continued parading the country the whole night, with a most dreadful noise and yelling, in imitation of the Irish cry at funerals. This could not fail of exciting great alarm amongst the Catholics of that neighbourhood, it having often hitherto been the harbinger of destruction to many of them. Happily, however, it produced no further immediate effect, but it certainly has left an impression on their minds of approaching danger, owing to the circumstance of some gentlemen of considerable property being at the head of this party. Government ought to obviate the realization of these apprehensions, by some positive proceeding, if the measures of terror and sacking are not to become, once again, the order and policy of the day.

A general and very widely-extended search commenced throughout the district of Clonmeul, for concealed arms, and, notwithstanding the most crafty precautions, which we know are resorted to by those miscreants who have lawlessly obtained them, and the number brought in has been very considerable. The range of country covered was in length near sixty miles, and, in many places, in breadth above twenty; and the routes of every party were so accurately delineated, that there was scarcely a part of it unvisited. We cannot too highly applaud the judgment of General M'Kenzie in the disposition and arrangement of the military, nor speak in terms too high of the zeal and alacrity with which the officers and men, employed on the service, persisted in a very harassing excursion, in most instances lasting from day-light till night-fall.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The PROPRIETORS of THE NATIONAL REGISTER do not come before their Readers with AN APOLOGY. They have made professions; they have endeavoured to fulfil them; and by the success of these endeavours they desire to be judged, and to stand or fall in the public opinion. At present they only come forward to pledge themselves that there will be NO FALLING OFF OF THIS PAPER; that the same talents, the same industry will be employed to complete EVERY NUMBER as the first; and they feel assured, that if they have proved themselves worthy of the Public favour, it will be vouchsafed them.

It is truly satisfactory to their feelings, to have to express in their First Number, their gratitude to an unprecedented List of Subscribers, distinguished by their rank in society, by their political eminence, by their taste and learning. They feel proud, that the very indication of their Plan has attracted such marked attention, and no pains or expence will, of course, be spared to secure a continuance of the same flattering approbation.

They beg leave to inform their Readers, that an Appropriate Emblematical Title-page was folded up in every Paper of This Day's NATIONAL REGISTER, previous to its leaving the Office; but if through any accident it should not be delivered, Subscribers will be immediately furnished with it by sending to the Office.

THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

London,

SUNDAY, JANUARY, 3, 1808.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

Among the articles of intelligence which we have received this week, the most important, or at least the most surprising, is a new decree of BONAPARTE against our commerce. One would have imagined that his last edict had exhausted his schemes of vengeance; but the retaliating proclamation of our government has again set his invention to work; and, since we are beyond his reach, he has resolved to wreak his vengeance on all neutrals who will not sacrifice their commerce to complete his schemes of vengeance.

In this new edict, he decrees, that every ship, to whatever nation it belongs, that has undertaken a voyage to England, paid any tax to our government, or even submitted to be searched by any English ship; shall, for that action alone, be denationalised, be considered as having forfeited the protection of its king, and become English property! All the vessels thus denationalised, are declared to be lawful prizes, whether they enter the ports of France and her Allies, or fall into the hands of their ships of war or privateers. The British Islands are declared to be in a state of blockade, both by sea and land; and every vessel, of whatever nation, going to or from the ports of Britain, or her Colonies, is declared to be lawful prize. To conclude this singular edict, it is declared to be a mere measure of retaliation against England!

This decree serves to shew how far BONAPARTE may be carried beyond the bounds, not only of policy, but even of reason, by the headstrong fury of his passions. The damage which the British Islands will sustain, from a blockade by sea, while the enemy dares not send out a single vessel, unless by stealth, into the Ocean, cannot much alarm us; and the same circumstances must free neutrals from any considerable apprehensions. The terms of the decree, however, shew how ready he is to sacrifice the interests of his own subjects, and of all other nations in the universe, to gratify his ungovernable resentment.

But it is France that must chiefly suffer from this impotent ebullition of vengeance. To the decree is subjoined, in the Moniteur, a Circular Letter from the Minister of the Interior, in which the miserable condition to which France is reduced by the prohibitory edicts of her master, is forcibly though unintentionally depicted. The Minister here breathes nothing of that lofty tone which has heretofore promised the speedy conquest of Britain, the sack of London, and the utter annihilation of the great rival of France. He tells the owners of privateers, that they will have greater chance for booty; he expresses a hope that neutrals may possibly elude our cruizers; he consoles his countrymen that their privations will be only temporary; and that substitutes will probably be found for the necessaries and comforts of which they will be deprived. This is truly an altered tone for a Minister of France; and what must give the strongest idea of the indefensible absurdity of her ruler's present measures.

In the course of the week, a number of American papers have been received. They contain the first proceedings in Congress relative to the disputes with Great Britain. There is much bullying in the tone of the American orators, yet it appears evident that they are much afraid of the consequences of a rupture with this country, as indeed they may. The merchants of Philadelphia and of several other places, have presented strong memorials against the Non-Importation Act, which the policy of Jefferson has never enforced, though left at his discretion. These memorials, which discover such a marked aversion to any rupture with Great Britain, have been rejected by a majority; but at the same time, some violent Resolutions against Britain have been rejected with equal firmness. The Report on the affair of the Chesapeake was very intemperate; but the junction of the great opposition orator, Mr. RANDOLPH, formerly the staunch friend of Britain, with the advocates for war, shews his opinion that the American Government is inclined to pacific measures. It is, indeed, said that our wise abandonment of any pretension to search ships of war, has entirely done away the hostile feelings of the American Government; and in this case we need not fear the foolish violence of those demagogues who would vainly attempt to wrest from us even the right of searching merchantmen.

There is one circumstance which we cannot pass unnoticed. Lord ERSKINE, it seems, had some time ago, from what motive we do not presume to conjecture, invested a considerable portion of his property in the American funds. When his son was appointed American Ambassador, this very circumstance was stated as one of the causes of that appointment, as it was supposed his interest in America would render him more anxious to preserve amity between the two countries: a dangerous and impolitic principle, which might often set the interests of an Ambassador in direct opposition to his duty to his country. It appears that Mr. ERSKINE, alarmed at the discussions between this country and America, had recently transferred his father's property in the American funds, to secure it at all events. This circumstance, which so impolitically indicated his apprehensions, excited in the demagogues a desire not to let such a prey escape them; and a motion was accordingly made by one LYONS to prevent such transfers of British property in the American funds. The motion was negatived; but the evident impolicy of this sudden transfer by our Ambassador was not removed.

The Couriers passing and repassing through France, to Count STAHREMBERG, have excited much attention, and given rise to innumerable reports. To us they only seem to indicate that BONAPARTE is little anxious to force Austria into hostilities, which cannot possibly do us any harm. The stay or the departure of Count STAHREMBERG is an object of equal importance.

Some letters have been published, which passed between Gen. WHITELOCKE, and LINIERS the commander at Buenos Ayres. They are chiefly remarkable for the utter ignorance of the situation of the enemy which the English General displays. On the 4th of July, he summons General LINIERS to surrender, with great professions of his own clemency; and on the 5th, LINIERS with equal professions, returns the same summons, to which General WHITELOCKE, now better informed, finds himself obliged to consent.

A vessel, which arrived yesterday from the coast of France, brings the topics of conversation at Charante and Bourdeaux. These are a meditated repudiation of the Empress JOSEPHINE, and a marriage of BONAPARTE with a sister of the RUSSIAN EMPEROR; to which is added a project of giving LUCIEN BONAPARTE the Crown of Spain, and indemnifying the Prince of ASTURIAS with that of Portugal.

A Deputation from the American Merchants waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Saturday se'nnight, to obtain information as to some points connected with the late Orders of Council, and particularly to ascertain whether it was intended to impose any tax on articles of American produce, on board such American ships as should, pursuant to their Orders, touch at British ports. The inquiry of the Deputation was principally directed to the article of Cotton, and the answer of Mr. Perceval was quite decisive, that Ministers do intend to propose a duty upon that article. Upon asking, whether such American ships as should not, in consequence of the French Decree, feel it safe to proceed to an enemy's port, after having touched in this country, would be allowed a licence to sail in any other direction? the answer was, that no licence would be granted to any other than the port of such ship's original destination.

The object of the expedition under General Spencer and Sir C. COTTON, we are informed, is not a very distant one; and we therefore conclude that this force will join Sir Sidney's and General Moore's. It is said we shall soon hear of Ceuta being in possession of the British.

Four camps, consisting of 15,000 men each, besides Yeomanry, are to be immediately formed in several districts in Ireland. One, it is said, is to be fixed in Athlone, another in Aughnacloy, a third at Bandon, and a fourth in Strabane.

The convoy arrived at Spithead from Gibraltar, was on Wednesday put under quarantine at the Mother Bank. It Paget, Fraser, Wynyard, and Oakes, landed on Thursday. The troops arrived amount to between eight and nine thousand men. They consist of all the guards that were in Sicily; the 20th, 52d, 78th, and the second battalion of the 35th regiments, besides artillery and engineers. This force was probably to co-operate with Sir Sidney Smith in securing the possession of the Portuguese navy.

The Captain of a vessel from Cadiz states, that previous to his departure from that city, it had been entirely evacuated by the Spanish troops, the great body of which had proceeded to Portugal, under the command of the Marquis di Solano, who is Governor of Cadiz. The remainder of the Spanish troops had, in conjunction with a French force, gone on board the French and Spanish ships in the harbour, which, with six months provision on board, were ready for sea, and daily expected to sail. The inhabitants were, as our informant states, considerably agitated by the apprehension of an attack from an English fleet and army. The Captain we allude to also adds, that four eminent merchants have been recently arrested at Cadiz, upon a charge of having spoken disrespectful of the Prince of Peace. This arrest took place immediately before the Captain's departure. Such an event would imply the undiminished power of the Prince of Peace.

Many are the efforts which Bonaparte has made to diminish the comforts of our countrymen. He has endeavoured even to deprive the town of its usual pleasures, by laying an embargo on opera dancers and singers; and by making war upon the milliners who even transmit their fashions. But we can shew him our independence in these as well as in other articles. We have voices as sweet, and feet as nimble as any that can be imported. Our milliners declare, that their traffic was never more flourishing than at present; and Mr. Millard, of Southampton-street, Strand, assures us, that the demand for his fashionable straw hats is becoming greater than he can almost supply.

A West Indian Gentleman, in a fit of despondency, put an end to his existence at the Hummums. The Coroner's Jury, which sat on the body, brought in a verdict of Lunacy.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Friday morning, after breakfast, his Majesty rode on horseback in Windsor Park, by Cranbourne, till half past twelve o'clock, accompanied by the Dukes of Kent and Cambridge, Princesses Augusta, Sophia, and Amelia, attended by Lady Ely, Count Munster, Generals Manningham and Cartwright, Colonels Upton and Taylor.

Friday at twelve o'clock, the Duke of Kent arrived at Windsor. All the Royal Dukes were expected in the course of the afternoon, to dine with her Majesty and the Princesses.

The following is said to be an original Letter from Lady Craven, to one of her Theatrical female friends, who asked how she liked her change of situation.

MY DEAR T* * * * * *

No doubt you are interested in the question by asking me so soon my opinion of "Matrimony"—it would be "Love's Labour Lost." Indeed if I disliked it in the "Honey Moon"—if you continue such a prude, as to retain your old opinion of "Marriage à la mode" and still consider it as foolish, I would advise you by all means to catch the "Folly as it Flies," provided you hit upon some sober spark who has sown his "Wild Oats"——"trial's all," you know——however, if upon "Review" you should'nt like the state, why you may name "The Devil to Pay" in the "School for Scandal;" and of course, the result of your "Wedding Day" will then form a very pretty "Winter's Tale." Thus, in all events, like fashionable women, you will "Raise the Wind." Do you

"Wonder" at trifling, for you know "Laugh when you Can" has been ever my maxim. But to be serious—follow my advice—in "Three Weeks after Marriage" speak of it—"As you Like It;" and if you are disappointed call me a "Country Girl" "Too Friendly by Half."——With such charms as you possess; I know all you want is "the Will."—Once married, you may, quite in the fashion, act as you choose; and if your spouse proves "a Provoked Husband," why you may take your own "Revenge," and make him a "Suspicious one."—If now (notwithstanding all I have said) you remain obstinate and single, perhaps, in nine months hence, as "Time's a Tell-tale," I may produce an additional inducement.

Adieu, yours, &c. D.

If, as Swift says, God has decreed revenge against punning, the late George Selwyn, was unfortunate indeed. So confident was he of his powers in this way, that he once bet a friend five guineas that he would produce a pun on any given subject—"Done," replies his friend, "pun on the King."—"Damn it, man, (rejoined the witty George), you know just as well as I do that the King's no subject!"

When Garrick in the zenith of his powers took his friend Doctor Johnson, to view his valuable estates which, by a late decree, his widow has been ejected from, the emotion they caused in the mind of the great moralist was singular, "Ah David, David, David, (exclaimed the Doctor tapping the shoulder of our immortal Roscius) these are the things which make a death bed terrible." !!!

On the rumour of a coalition, an opposition wit lately observed, that, he was sure Lord Howick never would desert principles which he had grown Grey in.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

EXTRAORDINARY PEDESTRIAN UNDERTAKING.—A person of the name of Yardley, a victualler, in Berkshire, who, it has been stated, recently sprang forth, to astonish the amateurs of agile sports, and to rival the pedestrians of the day, undertook, on Wednesday se'nnight, to perform 20 miles in two hours and a half, for a stake of 50 guineas. He started on a piece of ground about 4 miles from Croydon at 10 o'clock, yesterday morning, to go a mile to and from; he ran 2 miles in 17 minutes, 2 in 16, 2 in 15, 2 in 14, 2 in 13, 2 in 17, and the 6 last miles in 54 minutes—total, 8 miles in 146 minutes. The pedestrian, it will be seen, had two miles to go in 4 minutes, when he resigned, visibly fatigued. He only halted for about two minutes during the race, when he eat a mouthful of chicken and drank half a pint of mulled wine. The day was extremely unfavourable for the pedestrian, who, if the report be correct, did the distance in less than the given time, on Tuesday last, whilst training. He is of low stature, and 35 years of age. His regular step was to do 2 miles in 15 minutes.

CITY.

BREAD.—Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be raised half an assize, or a penny in the peck loaf. The quartern loaf of wheaten will then be sold for 11½d. an household 9½d.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Tuesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the following ships were thus timed, viz.

Euphrates, Sir William Bensley, Sovereign, Madras and Bengal; Masarch, Northumberland; Madeira, Madras, and Bengal; Alexander, Madeira and Bombay. To be afloat 27th January. Sail from Gravesend 27th Feb.

Harriet, Madras and Bengal; Huddart, Bombay. To be afloat 11th Feb. Sail from Gravesend 11th March.

The Court adjourned at 6 o'clock till Wednesday next.

The Court of Directors of the East India Company, on Thursday, ordered the following ships, viz.

Ocean, Ceres, Canton, Dorsetshire, Alnwick Castle, David Scott, and Exeter, to prepare for the reception of troops, to be loaded at Madras, in their outward voyage to India.

THE THEATRES.

Dramatic Criticism, or something which bears that title, is now so much in request, that a Newspaper can scarcely obtain a great circulation, without presenting a pretty large portion of such matter. We shall, therefore, devote a considerable space in THE NATIONAL REGISTER to this fashionable subject, although we do not intend to treat it in the fashionable style. Of late, in the most popular of the periodical Critiques, the absence of scientific principle has been supplied by the superfluity of spleen, and the want of experience has been compensated by the ebullition of wit. The fallacy has pleased the Public: because every body can admire what is brilliant in wit, but every body cannot detect what is erroneous in science. The spectators in a Theatre are distant from the stage, and foil dazzles their eyes with all the lustre of real gold: The readers of these current criticisms are remote from those circles in which the Drama is understood, and pointed antithesis strikes them with the force of truth. In the columns of this Paper we shall consider the criticism of the Drama not as a task which may be slurred by idleness or blotted by caprice: but as a science possessing principles as certain and as exalted as the general criticism of poetry, of painting, of sculpture, or of any other of the Fine Arts.

The Drama, considered as a Fine Art, which may become the subject of criticism, divides itself naturally into two parts: the one is the art of Dramatic Composition, which we may criticise as fully as any poetry can be criticised: and the other is the art of Acting, which can be criticised as fully as we may criticise Painting or Sculpture. To draw a parallel between the art of Poetry and the art of Dramatic Composition would be idle, because the latter is allowed to be a branch of the former: but we are no less certain of our ground, when we assert that there is a strong analogy in the three arts of Painting, Sculpture, and Acting. All equally tend to the same object: that is, to please by the just representation of what is striking, interesting, or agreeable in nature. Acting bears the same relative distance to Sculpture, that Sculpture bears to Painting—for Painting represents Nature by lines and colours laid on a flat surface to be viewed from a single point: Sculpture goes further, and represents the roundness and real proportion of Nature in every point from which a statue can be viewed; but Acting surpasses them both, and with a Promethean power, gives motion, and voice, and life!

But though Acting, thus considered, of all the Fine Arts comes nearest to Nature's Prototype; yet it is the most difficult to be criticised, because its productions are the most evanescent. If we wish to decide on the merit of a picture or a statue, we may keep it before our eyes, unvarying in its expression and uninjured in its workmanship, for an hour, for a day, for years: if we disapprove it at a first glance, we have opportunities of discovering its beauties by degrees, of revising, perhaps totally changing our original judgment. But the representation of Nature, which is produced by Acting, vanishes as soon as it is beheld; and though the spectator may not happen to be in the right frame of mind at the moment when the actor delivers a particular passage, there is no opportunity of arresting the images in order to ascertain their merits or defects.

Yet, though Acting is thus of all the Fine Arts the most difficult to be criticised, it is nevertheless the most universally and the most confidently canvassed. An uninformed person who enters a gallery of pictures or statues, if he gives any opinion at all, usually gives it with some sort of reserve: he for the most part leans to the favourable side: and, even when he disapproves a work, he usually makes use of some such phrase as, "I don't admire it, but very likely that is because I know "nothing about painting or sculpture." But almost every body who enters a Theatre, thinks himself entitled to give a positive opinion on Acting, although he perhaps may never have seen fifty plays in his whole life. No one should believe that every reasonable creature whom Nature has brought into the world, can judge of acting, because good acting is a reasonable representation of Nature; for Acting, as well as the other Arts by which Nature is represented, has rules which direct, and rules which restrain, not only its mechanism, but even its conception; rules which cannot be understood and applied without original taste, extensive reading, theatrical intercourse, and long experience.

If these positions be true, our readers will not be surprised, when we declare the very low opinion we entertain of the theatrical critics, who blot the periodical publications of the present age. As dramatic nature now appears, reduced to regular scientific principles, yet casually "snatching a grace beyond the "reach" of any settled principle at all, attired in a garb, which though it ought to fit her closely, yet is not the dress which she wears on ordinary occasions, sometimes restrained by the necessity of subordination, and sometimes stimulated for the display of magnificent effects, there can be but very few persons who have the natural qualifications for judging nicely of acting, and fewer yet to whom education and practice have imparted their final and necessary skill. In our theatres there must always be a scarcity of fine actors, because in the highest walk of the profession no man can be really great, without a union of all the qualities which can give executive brilliancy to accurate conception; among which are many of the powers of poetical combination, all the qualities of discriminative analysis, and all the qualities of a finished gentleman. There is as a lamentable scarcity of fine critics in our newspapers; and it would be difficult to find four of these authors who possess poetry enough to feel, and yet coolness enough to discriminate: gaiety enough to laugh, and yet elegance enough to understand high-breeding: who know the green-room sufficiently to distinguish how much effect is produced by the author, and how much by the actor: who, with all these natural and artificial requisites for forming their judgment, have adequate powers of composition for delivering that judgment gracefully, and so much moderation as to abstain from condemning unmercifully.

After having said so much of the requisites for perfect criticism, it would be the height of vanity and presumption to promise that our criticisms will be perfect; but we may be allowed to say, that if we are not capable of doing all that these principles require, we trust to avoid what these principles condemn. Before we animadvert upon a play or upon an actor, it is our custom to study the play itself, with a view either of discussing its merits, or of estimating its characters. Before we make positive assertions, we shall take care to ascertain our facts; and having once made up our minds upon truth, we shall never sacrifice that truth to party pique, or to the vanity of pointed style. We shall criticise new plays with as much candour as old ones, and endeavour to recommend our observations on the actors, by pointing out the beauties of their conceptions, and explaining the principles in which they may fail, rather than by the puffs of personal partiality, or the vulgarity of personal abuse. While other critics write to obtain fame for their own ingenuity, we shall labour to exhibit truth for our readers; and as truth, in theatrical affairs, has so long been a stranger to the public, we have no doubt that the public will receive her with all the hospitality which a stranger should claim!

DRURY LANE.

On Monday the 26th of December a Pantomime was produced at Drury-lane called Faribond, or Harlequin Negro. This piece was so exceedingly defective in its machinery, that on the first night it very narrowly escaped a total condemnation. Nor can we discover that, independently of the awkwardness of workmen and the rottenness of ropes, the plot of this pantomine is deserving of commendation. It is difficult to comprehend the motive or use of the tricks or scenic exhibitions: and the piece has accordingly been little successful. Mr. Hartland is a graceful Harlequin, and Mrs. Sharp is assuredly the best dancer who has for some years represented the Columbine. Nor can we allow the well-earned popularity of Mr. Grimaldi, the Clown of Covent Garden, to obstruct our praises of Mr. Laurent, who acts the blunderer at Drury Lane. Mr. Grimaldi is famous for putting all his limbs most ingeniously out of joint. Mr. Laurent deserves to be at least as much admired for employing his joints with the greatest possible agility. The one has had the glory of turning bodily nature from her common course, the other merits the praise of having cultivated her to her highest perfection. The Music is by Mr. Condell,

COVENT GARDEN.

At Covent Garden, on the same evening, was acted, for the first time, a Pantomime, entitled, Harlequin in his Element, or Fire, Water, Earth, and Air. The Fable is the composition of Mr. Dibdin, who in his Mother Goose displayed so great a knowledge of pantomimic effect. But in this piece Mr. Dibdin has by no means equalled his former effort; and although the machinery is much more adroitly managed here than at Drury Lane, yet both Pantomimes deserve equal censure for a want of apparent connection in the fable and transformations. There is, however, a stroke of satire here, which merits some praise, and which is levelled against the parochial system of employing aged and drowsy watchmen. We cannot help wishing that pantomime, as formerly was the case, entered with greater freedom on the field of satire. Miss Adams made her first appearance in this Theatre as Columbine, and was favourably received.—Her sisters performed a pas de trois extremely well; but the dancing at Covent Garden is still on the whole inferior to the dancing at Drury Lane. Mr. Bologna was the Harlequin, and Mr. Grimaldi the Clown. They obtained great applause. The Music is the work of Mr. Wear, the leader of the band, who composed the Music of Mother Goose.

On the following Wednesday, Mrs. H. Johnston, who has for some time been absent from the London Boards, presented herself as Beatrice, in Shakspeare's Much Ado About Nothing. Her private history had naturally created her some enemies who, during the early part of the play, were exceedingly boisterous; their murmur gradually fell away, and Mrs. H. Johnston is now, in all probability, engaged at Covent-garden Theatre. Mrs. H. Johnston is certainly a very pretty woman, and so far she is qualified for the representation of Beatrice: but Beatrice is a wit as well as a beauty, and the character requires intellectual powers far beyond any which Mrs. H. Johnston has within our recollection evinced. She spoke in a silver tone, and walked in a delicate march: she displayed all the requisites that we expect in the Lady Caroline of John Bull, but did not convey that light, yet poignant satire, that keen good nature, that sparkling but energetic mind, which should animate the Beatrice of Much Ado. Mr. Lewis played Benedick with infinite spirit and whim; the character that he represented was highly diverting, but it was a Benedick rather of Mr. Lewis's conception, than of Shakspeare's. In the lightest parts of all these characters, Mr. Lewis is inimitable: some of Benedick's gaiety was, therefore, well pourtrayed by him; but Benedick is a man of more than surface, a wit who has as much of reason as of jest. These features of the character were neutralized by Mr. Lewis; and that colour of character, which ought to have been a mixture, was rendered one brilliant scarlet. Mr. Munden was too shrewd in Dogberry, for Dogberry is not like the Yorkshireman of the modern stage, a clever fool, but a mere superannuated simpleton. Mr. C. Kemble is placed beneath his merit, in so wretched a character as Claudio; but he did as much as possible for the part; and Miss Bolton, in Hero, displayed great sweetness and feeling.

HINTS TO COMMERCIAL SPECULATORS.

The enterprize of our countrymen is as surprising as their capital is inexhaustible. They only require to know where a market can be opened, and what articles can be sold; and, with a celerity unknown and impracticable in other countries, vessels are immediately chartered, goods embarked, and the market stocked with every vendible commodity. We account it a laudable undertaking to second this energetic spirit of our countrymen by the communication of every information in our power; and to point out to them every outlet for their enterprize, at a period when our active enemy has resolved, if he can, to raise insuperable barriers against it in every direction.

The eyes of our mercantile adventurers, are, of course, at present turned on the Brazils, as the most desirable field which has lately opened for their speculations. It is therefore of the utmost consequence to ascertain the extent of this new market, as well as the articles which will be chiefly in demand: Without this information, the embarrassments of the adventurers to Buenos Ayres might be renewed, the market be overstocked, the commodities be unsuited to it, and the result to our commerce be, at first, distressing instead of profitable.

The extent of the Brazils is nearly thirteen times greater than that of Great Britain: but its boundless plains are as yet almost wholly uncultivated, and its population does not exceed above one million. Of these not above three hundred thousand are whites and freemen: the rest consist of the natives, who have survived the oppression of their Portuguese masters, and of negroes imported from Africa to dig their mines.

It thus appears, both from the extent and nature of the population, that the market of the Brazils must, in its present state, be limited. We are, however, to take into the account that a large number of emigrants will now accompany and follow the Court from Portugal; and that these new settlers are much more accustomed to the conveniencies of the old world, and will consequently have a much greater proportional demand for its productions. We may also take it for granted, that the whole supply of the Brazils will be in our own hands, since the Americans, the only other nation that can at present be permitted to trade there, are in want of almost exactly the same articles as the Brazilians.

The commodities which, at present, will be chiefly wanted, are all articles of dress. Cotton, both coarse and fine, will be in great demand, but woollens will also be much required, as the more southern parts of the Brazils, and even the higher ground of the more northern, are subject to colds and damps at particular seasons of the year. Hats, shoes, boots, and every manufactured article of dress will be equally in requisition.

Here, as in North America, every article of furniture, both iron and wood, is imported, owing to the total want of internal manufactures. Hardware of every description, jewellery, saddlery, all utensils both for the mines and for husbandry, must also be supplied from this country. The consumption of these latter articles must rapidly increase with the progress of cultivation, and we may in a few years, find the demand for them in the Brazils not less than they are at present in North America.

Wines, and the various luxuries of Europe, which were formerly procured from Portugal, must now be drawn from this country.

The principal imports which our merchants will derive from the Brazils in return, are articles capable of further manufacture, and consequently extremely beneficial to our country. Cotton, wool, hides, tallow, the precious metals, nitre, and wood of every description both for furniture and ship-building. Nearly all the principal articles, which we have been accustomed to derive from the Baltic, may be procured in this new kingdom; and will, of course, in the present state of things, be that part of its produce chiefly in demand at home.

PORT NEWS AND LLOYD'S LIST.

PLYMOUTH, DEC. 31.—We are sorry to state, that letters reached us last night, under date Tuesday evening, stating the total loss of his Majesty's fine frigate the Anson, Captain Lydiard, in Mount's Bay, in the hurricane of last Tuesday morning, at six o'clock. The Anson was going from Falmouth to her station off the Black Rocks, and we understand got embayed on Monday night. She parted all her cables and anchors just before six o'clock, and went plump ashore, where she soon beat to pieces: unfortunately Captain Lydiard, his first Lieutenant, and 60 of her crew perished, ere they could reach the shore; all the other Officers, and about 160 of her ship's company, got safe on shore in Mount's Bay.

The Swinder, from Halifax to St. Domingo, and the Atlantic, Neil, from New York, have been taken; but both re-captured, and carried into Jamaica.

The Queen, Forbes, from Portsmouth, to Cadiz, for the fleet; has put into Cork, damaged, and been obliged to unload.

A copper-bottomed guineaman, of 18 guns, belonging to Liverpool, with 250 slaves, last from Barbadoes, is taken and carried into Cuba; supposed to be the Beaver.

The Eliza and Sara, from Cuba to Baltimore; the Antoinette, from St. Domingo, to ditto; Louisa, Harley, from ditto, to Savannah; Fox, from ditto, to New York; Horatio, from New York, to Honduras; Rebecca, from St. Thomas's, to Aruba; Hector, from Guernsey, to St. Domingo; and the Monarch, from St. Domingo, to Guernsey, are detained, and sent into Jamaica.

The Ariel, Colley, arrived off Scarborough, from Pernau; sailed from Marstrand the 9th inst. in company with the Hecla armed ship, and 14 sail; experienced bad weather since.

A prize ship, marked No. 3, from Monte Video, and laden with Jesuits' bark, is totally lost.

Extract of a letter from Captain Mac Lean, dated off Dover, Dec. 28.—"I sailed from Cape François, the 27th ult. in company with the ship Lady Warren. On the 29th, when off the Carcoo, I hove too to speak to her, she being then on our weather quarter. When she came almost within hail of us, to my great surprise, I saw her put about, and stand in shore from us, and saw no more of her. I left at the Cape the Alexander, Wate; Charlton, Client; and Duke of York, Dunn.

The Samuel, Orr, from Londonderry to Quebec, is totally lost near Cape Pierre, only one man saved; not the Samuel, from Clyde, as before stated.

POLICE.

PUBLIC OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

On Monday evening, Mr. Decamp, of Drury Lane Theatre, went with his wife to Covent Garden Theatre, to see the new Pantomime. Soon after the performance commenced, he observed the door of the adjoining box opened by the box-keeper, and a Gentleman entered, who remarked, that his friends were not in that box, but they were in that which Mr. Decamp was; the box-keeper then opened the door of that box, and Mr. Decamp supposing his friends were in the front, lifted up the seats and made way for him to pass; the Gentleman immediately seated himself before Mr. Decamp, and took his place; Mr. Decamp observed to him, he presumed his friends were not in that box, and it being full, he could not remain in his place. After some ineffectual remonstrances at this behaviour, Mr. Decamp became peremptory, and insisted upon his leaving the seat, and forced him out; a scuffle ensued, and the latter struck Mr. Decamp a violent blow, and tore off the left side of his coat.

Donaldson, the Constable, and Rivett, the Bow-street Officer were called to keep the peace. The parties went to Covent Garden Watch-house, where the accused gave in his name, and endeavoured to persuade the Constable of the night to take his charge against Mr. Decamp; but the Constable observing the violence with which Mr. Decamp had been treated, refused to take it.

Tuesday morning, the parties attended at the Office, when Mr. Nares, the Sitting Magistrate ordered the Defendant to find bail; they, however, settled the business after they had left the Magistrate, by the Gentleman paying Mr. Decamp two guineas and an half for the loss of his coat.

NUMBER TWO.

THE DOMINION OF THE SEAS.

The Dominion of the Seas is the great boast of Britons, the most sacred portion of our national treasures. We are up in arms at the slightest intimation that this possession is in danger: and if any interested person wishes to set us by the ears with some foreign power, or to procure the establishment of some villainous monopoly, he has only to produce a belief, by some plausible and very loud declamations, that our Dominion of the Seas cannot otherwise be preserved. In the same manner the repeal of any pernicious regulation, the offspring of ignorance or prejudice, may be prevented; and the real interests of the country be sacrificed to imaginary apprehensions.

When fallacies of this sort are daily played off upon the public credulity, when our attachment to the dominion of the seas is so fond as to blind us occasionally to our best interests, it is a national object of the first importance to ascertain distinctly the real nature of this dominion, the foundation on which it actually rests, and the propriety and impropriety of the regulations by which we attempt to maintain it. Such an inquiry seems particularly necessary at a period like the present, when the dominion of the seas is the watch-word of one of our factions, and when the preservation of this favourite object is held forth, without any argument, as a full apology for unjust and feeble measures with which it has in reality no connection.

The Dominion of the Seas, we understand to be a power to defend our maritime commerce from every species of injury; to resist with certainty of success every naval armament which one nation, or all the nations in the world, may send into the seas: and to present at all times so formidable an aspect that no nation can presume to disturb the rights and tranquillity of the ocean without our permission. To these we may add the honour of the flag, an acknowledgment of our sovereignty: though such a prerogative is an eye-sore to other nations, and of no value whatever to ourselves, yet it is a sacrifice to their pride, which our countrymen would be unwilling to forego, and which it is no great boon in others to yield.

For all these purposes it is evident that our navy at present is more than sufficient; and that we enjoy the dominion of the seas as completely as the dominion of the British Islands. It would be madness in any power, or any combination of powers, to attempt to wrest it from us; the attempt could only lead to the annihilation of their own maritime forces and commerce. If, therefore, our naval power can be maintained in the same, or nearly the same proportion to that of other states which it holds at present, our dominion of the seas can never be in the smallest danger.

Since we first asserted this dominion in the time of the long Parliament, our naval preponderancy has been continually on the increase. At first the Dutch, and afterwards the French were capable of maintaining a doubtful contest, but now every rational hope of openly opposing our fleets on the seas, is at an end, and we are now more superior to any combination which can be formed, than we were a century ago to either France, Holland, or Spain. But if our naval preponderancy continues to increase as things at present exist, no new regulations can be necessary for its preservation or extension; and some great change must take place before any apprehensions for its security can be other than chimerical.

But though these considerations may sufficiently show the inutility of any new maritime regulations, it is a more difficult task to convince our countrymen, that any regulations already adopted for the maintenance of our naval predonderancy, however nugatory or pernicious they really may be, are not indispensably necessary to the end proposed. We allude in particular to the provisions of the Navigation Act, which have been demonstrated to be extremely injurious to our national wealth, but which still have innumerable advocates, from their supposed tendency to maintain our maritime superiority. It might be very distinctly shown, that whatever has a tendency to diminish the increase of our wealth, and the absolute quantity of our commerce, must be ultimately prejudicial to our maritime greatness; but such circuitous reasonings are insufficient to overpower rooted prejudices; and we shall, therefore, confine ourselves to a direct proof from facts, that the Navigation Laws are entirely unnecessary for the support of our naval preponderancy. Could this truth be ascertained to the satisfaction of our countrymen, little opposition would be made to the abolition of whatever is pernicious in these regulations.

The Navigation Laws were unnecessary to our naval superiority, even at the time when they were enacted; nor was this the object which their framers had in view. The Long Parliament, desirous to extend and secure its own influence, proposed to form an union with Holland so strict, that the two states should seem to form portions of the same empire. The Dutch, distrusting the stability of the English republic, or fearing to be swallowed up in the dominion of a greater power, rejected this overture, and would only renew its ancient alliances. The English republicans, fired with indignation at this refusal, resolved to chastise the Dutch for what they accounted an intolerable piece of insolence; and the Navigation Act, which imposed severe restrictions on foreign nations trading to Britain, and wholly excluded them from her colonies, was immediately passed. The terms of this Act were general, but its provisions exclusively affected the Dutch, the only nation which at that time possessed any commerce. But the intention of this law was merely to ruin the commerce of Holland as far as possible, without any idea that it was necessary to our naval superiority. The war which immediately succeeded its enactment proved, that it was wholly unnecessary for this purpose; for we defeated the Dutch in every general engagement, and we continued to display the same superiority both over them and the French, in some succeeding wars, before the Navigation Act had been enforced with any degree of vigilance.

We shall find, that as this act was unnecessary to our naval dominion at first, it has continued to be so in succeeding periods. It contains two distinct classes of provisions: the one entirely excluding other nations from our coasting trade, and from any intercourse with our Colonies; the other excluding them from certain portions of the foreign carrying trade. These last we shall first consider. By them, a variety of articles are prohibited from being imported into Great Britain, unless in the vessels of the country in which they are produced; or in British vessels manned by British seamen: A variety of other articles are prohibited from being imported into Great Britain, even in British vessels, unless from the country where they are produced: And every species of the produce of fisheries is subjected to heavy duties, when imported into Great Britain.

These regulations, though very injurious to the Dutch, against whom they were levelled, have produced a surprisingly small increase of any portion of our shipping. They diminished the Dutch fisheries, as far as that could be done by excluding them from the British market; but we have taken no advantage of this diminution for the increase of our own fisheries. That provision which prohibits even British ships from importing certain articles, unless from the country where they are produced, has had an equally limited operation in behalf of our shipping: it has merely obliged us to go direct to France or Russia, for the respective produce of these countries, instead of going to an intermediate depot in Holland for them, a step which, surely, it is unlikely our merchants should ever be inclined to take. We cannot conceive that a single vessel has been added to the British shipping, by a regulation evidently superfluous and nugatory.

The only one of these provisions, then, which can have considerably affected our shipping, is that which prohibits the importation of certain articles from the country in which they are produced, unless in the vessels of that country or in British vessels. But while the manufactures of Britain continue to be in most demand with almost every nation, it is evident that the vessels of every country, which can be spared from its own coasting trade, will have more temptation to bring its produce to Great Britain and receive her goods in return, than to any intermediate nation which might afterwards re-export them hither: and the British vessels, when they can carry out a saleable cargo of their own goods, will always be able to bring home in return the produce of the country to which they trade as cheap as any other nation. This is sufficient to shew how very limited must be the effect of this regulation of the Navigation Act in increasing our shipping: but the argument will be still more unanswerable when we shew how little of the maritime commerce, either of our own, or of other countries, can be affected by the whole class of its provisions.

We shall first take example from the trade of France. Before the war, in the year 1792, while we were still at peace with that power, the whole vessels employed in our trade with France, that entered inwards, or cleared outwards, amounted to 3,201, carrying 217,365 tons. Of these only 2,706, carrying 196,657, were British; and this latter number could alone be affected by our navigation laws, as these laws were then in full force. But the number of vessels employed in the coasting trade of France, that entered inwards, or cleared outwards in the year 1801, amounted to 50,820, carrying 1,390,348 tons; and from this traffic not a single vessel or ton could, even in the event of peace, be deducted by our navigation laws. This example may shew how little effect they have in diminishing the shipping of foreign nations; and we have equal proof of their insignificance in increasing our own.

From the commerce of the port of London, to which all the East Indian commerce, and the greater part of our foreign commerce in general is conveyed, an estimate may be formed of the proportion between the extent of that portion of our shipping, which can be affected by the regulations which we have stated, and that portion which cannot. By a statement made up from the public accounts of the port of London, it appears that the number of vessels which transported the commerce of the port of London for the year 1798, amounted to 13,444, carrying 1,713,316 tons: of these, 10,498 vessels, carrying 1,188,168 tons, were employed in the coasting trade, and only 2,146, carrying 525,148 tons, in both our foreign and colonial trade. In other parts of the kingdom, the proportion must be still greater in favour of the coasting trade: and we may hence infer that the whole of our shipping, which could possibly be affected by those regulations of our Navigation Laws, which we have hitherto discussed, does not amount to above a twentieth or thirtieth part of our maritime trade.

Regulations which can possibly affect so very trifling a part of our commerce may surely be considered as unnecessary, and as in no degree compensating by their utility any serious national disadvantages. But we have proofs by no means doubtful, that the repeal of these regulations, so far from diminishing our shipping, would not even prevent its usual course of increase. During the late war, the necessity of our affairs compelled us to relax our navigation laws in a degree hitherto unknown since their enactment: for these famous laws are calculated for times of peace, when we need no increase of our naval power, but cannot be enforced in the time of war, when we need such aid, without depriving our commerce of all that vast and indispensable protection which it derives from neutral flags. But during the relaxation which we have mentioned, what was the consequence? A dimunition of our shipping and seamen? No—a prodigious increase even under the most disadvantageous circumstances, and when there was every lure to foreigners from the high price of our native freightage. In the year 1792, the number of sailors on board British vessels, according to the returns made to Parliament, amounted to 118,286. In 1802, the number of men employed in our maritime trade was greater by between twenty and thirty thousand. Yet in the space of the intervening ten years, a number of seamen, perhaps one half more than the whole of those employed in our navigation in 1792, had been transferred from the merchant vessels to the navy; for in 1801, the compliment of the British navy, in spite of its numerous losses, amounted to 130,000 men. During the same period, there were added to the British merchant shipping no less than 2798 vessels, carrying 365,293 tons. What can be a stronger demonstration, of utter indifference to our naval dominion, of repealing those provisions of the Navigation Laws which we have hitherto considered?

A few observations only will be requisite in regard to the other provisions, by which we secure to ourselves the exclusive possession of our Coasting and Colonial Trade. As far as relates to our Coasting Trade, the regulations are wholly superfluous. No nation, after having at all engaged in commercial affairs, has ever been supplanted in its own coasting trade: the Dutch, at the period when this Decree of Exclusion passed, scarcely carried on any part of ours; and indeed not even the most timid entertain any apprehension of our coasting trade being snatched out of our hands.

As to our Colonial Trade the argument is much more intricate, though by no means less conclusive. The spirited remonstrances of the Jamaica planters against this part of the Navigation Laws, the distresses of all our West Indian Colonies, which can only be alleviated by their repeal, must call the attention of the Legislature and the Nation to this subject, soon after Parliament assembles; and we shall, therefore, take an early opportunity of giving our readers as full and satisfactory an explanation of it, as much observation and reflection enable us to do.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. II.

THE MORNING CHRONICLE.

It is a circumstance little honourable to the character of this Nation, though very expressive of the selfish sagacity of our political factions, that each of them retains in its interest one or more newspapers, for the purpose of promoting its own view among the people. It is the business of the paper thus retained to act on all occasions as the devoted tool of its faction: to asperse the views, the measures, the very private characters of all their political opponents, whether, in reality, good or bad; and to erect, on the ruined reputation of their antagonists, unblushing trophies to its own patrons. A person unacquainted with this system of political iniquity would find it difficult to believe that men capable of thinking, of writing, of feeling, could be found base enough to prostitute their talents, their honour, their conscience to the ignominous task of poisoning the minds of their countrymen by deliberate falsehoods; of feeding the shameless vanity of their patrons at the expence of truth or reason; and of still more dishonourably blasting, by scandalous invectives, and malignant insinuations, the justly-earned reputation of individuals. Yet such persons are found in the Editors of all those newspapers, which decidedly stand forth as the champions of a particular faction. The mercenary Editor receives his cue; and, whatever he knows or believes, his devoted pen disperses abroad, with equal alacrity, the most undeniable truths, or the most villainous falsehoods. The ineffable contempt which we feel for men who thus dishonour their natures, would prevent us from even noticing their servile declamations, were it not for the effect which they produce on the honourable and unsuspecting part of the community, who never can imagine that apparent zeal, and warm professions of patriotism, should proceed from such ignominious motives, and be designed for such infamous purposes. These considerations oblige us to pull off the disguise, and expose the cloven foot of these betrayers to the world which they have duped.

Of these periodical instruments of faction, some, after having by popular arts acquired a great circulation, have been brought over to the cause of their patrons by the usual means: such are The Morning Post and The Courier, whose change of party was as sudden, as their zeal has since been ardent. Others, such as The Sun and The Morning Chronicle, have been originally established, and since supported by their respective factions, from whose mandates they dare not swerve a tittle. Among them all, The Morning Chronicle holds the first rank for consistency; that is to say, for having zealously and perseveringly said just what its patrons were desirous it should say, without once pretending to those qualms and scruples of which few persons can wholly divest themselves. This humiliating sort of consistency, has, strange to tell! actually been the boast of every successive editor of that paper; and we have heard some of its admiring readers observe that, amidst all changes, the Morning Chronicle was always on the same side!

Among the numerous instances which we have seen in that paper of the virulent attacks made on individuals, because they were connected with the political antagonists of its party, and merely because they were so, we shall only select the most recent—an invective against Lord Strangford, which appeared in The Morning Chronicle of Tuesday last, the 5th of January. Of Lord Strangford, we know nothing beyond what is known to all the world; nor do we desire to know any thing of him, unless the public services which he may hereafter render his country. It is not as an individual that Lord Strangford calls forth our strictures in his defence, and far less as the member of any political party: it is as the representative of all those whose reputation may be injuriously traduced to serve the views of a faction, that we are desirous to rescue him from the fangs of interested harpies. It is a cruel private injury to give undeserved stabs to the reputation of a man just commencing his career: it is a cruel public injury, causelessly to destroy the respectability of a man to whom a portion of the national interests is intrusted. Such are the considerations which call forth our present remarks.

As soon as it was known that the Court of Portugal had actually emigrated to the Brazils, The Morning Chronicle began to prepare the public mind by announcing the extreme importance of appointing an Ambassador of commanding talents and dignity to the new empire; and thus, as soon as the expected nomination of Lord Strangford was made public, the meditated blow was ready to be given to Ministers, through the character of his young negociator. That his reputation was to be sacrificed, merely for the sake of hurting the Administration, will pretty clearly appear, from the proofs adduced of his incapacity.

First, we are informed, by The Morning Chronicle, that his Lordship possesses no qualifications, of any sort, which could point him out as a negociator; that the world knew nothing of him, except his having published a few amatory poems and translations, from Camoens. We must own it to be a melancholy truth, that little attention is ever paid to the original qualifications of our diplomatists; their appointment is matter of mere favour; and Ministers have the philanthropy to look upon them as very able men, till they have proved themselves otherwise. In this state of things, Lord Strangford's nomination to a diplomatic station, must be considered as rather a fortunate selection. His poetical effusions prove that he is possessed of some genius and some taste; his translations from Camoens shew that he was well acquainted with the Portuguese language, and solicitous about the literature, and, consequently, the manners of that country. How many of our Secretaries of Legation could be named with equal qualifications? How many, even of our Ambassadors know and care nothing more about the language of the country to which they are sent, than the bears of Siberia?

The next objection is, that although Lord Strangford may do very well for some subordinate place, for a Secretary of Legation, yet he is every way unfit for the high station of Ambassador; that he has neither rank to impress the Portuguese with a sense of his dignity, nor experience to make up for this lamentable deficiency; that he is only a poor Irish Lord, who must have recourse to his industry, and has hitherto been employed in a subordinate office.

It is curious to observe the cloven foot of this tool of the great aristocracy, which sometimes pretends to be the friend of the people, the asserter of equal rights. Because Lord Strangford is not born a Marquis or a Duke, we are told that he is not at all a fit person to negociate with the Portuguese Grandees, the Souras, and Aranjos, and Almeidas, and twenty other odd names, of which no one ever heard before: men who would have been glad to retain their places at the price of licking the dust off a French Viceroy's foot; and whose counsels protracted the stay of their Prince, till he could scarcely evade the chains of his oppressor. It is amusing, in the nineteenth century, to hear it objected to an Ambassador, that he was not born to a great title; at a period when the greatest generals, statesmen, and negociators of the age can scarcely tell the names of their great grandfathers; when the ancient nobility of the Holy Empire are hardly ever mentioned, and the ensigns of the upstart Legion of Honour are received by Sovereign Princes with profound reverence. We must own that we have no particular satisfaction in seeing important trusts placed in the hands of untried men, merely because they happen to be born Earls or Dukes. We never heard that those servants were best who received the wages before they did the work; every employer will tell you, that such a practice serves only to render them negligent, lazy, and insolent. The unhappy Emperor of Austria affords a sad instance of a great Prince, ruined by adjusting the appointments of his servants, according to the rank of their birth. The argument which The Morning Chronicle here urges against Lord Strangford's appointment, we should urge in favour of it. Although a Lord, he is not possessed of sufficient influence or wealth to enable him to make a figure in the world, without his own exertions; he must execute his commissions well, otherwise he will have no more entrusted to him; while, without these appointments, he must be reduced to obscurity and indigence. Such is the man who is likely to be attentive in the management of our political interests, since upon his success entirely depends his own future fortune.

But if this objection to the appointment of Lord Strangford so manifestly turns in his favour, what shall we say to the other objection, that he is unqualified for the higher office, because he has filled the lower; that he is unfit for discharging the duties of an Ambassador, at the same Court where he has acted as Secretary of Legation? By this rule, a man would be rendered unfit for an office, merely by taking the preparatory steps to qualify himself for it; and it would be the best policy in the world to make some brainless Earl or Marquis, who understood about as much of diplomacy as he did of the language and manners of the country to which he was sent, vault into the station of Ambassador over the head of a Secretary of Legation, experienced in all these indispensable requisites. Here, truly, is who may be inclined to strut a year or two in the robes of an Ambassador. Lord Strangford is disqualified for such an appointment, because he had peculiar motives to become thoroughly acquainted with the language and manners of the Portuguese; because he had lived at the Court of Portugal a considerable time, and in the very situation best calculated to afford him a complete knowledge of the characters and views of all the great men at that Court—in the temporary exercise of the functions of an Ambassador! If these be the only disqualifications of Lord Strangford, there are few, indeed, of The Morning Chronicle's men of high rank, who would not be excellently fitted for Ambassadors at the new Court of the Brazils.

But a still heavier charge is attempted to be thrown on Lord Strangford: we are informed that he has exposed himself as a vain boaster, that the dispatches which he sent to his Government contained palpable falsehoods, and that on these accounts he is both contemptible and odious in the eyes of the Prince Regent and his Court. Now we must acknowledge that we do not perceive the slightest ground for such assertions; and if this be the case, they can only be considered as malignant calumnies invented for mischievous purposes. From his Lordship's dispatches we perceive that the Court of Portugal had prepared for emigration, as soon as a French invasion began to be apprehended; and though it might very well be inferred that these preparations were accelerated by the instances of the British Government, through their agent at Lisbon, yet his Lordship's dispatches do not give a hint that he had any merit in the transaction. He afterwards informs us that the Court of Portugal lost its resolution as the hour of emigration approached; that, in spite of his remonstrances, it united itself with the enemies of Britain, and was ready to purchase the forbearance of Bonaparte, at the price of engaging in the utmost hostilities against this country; that, however, he ventured to renew his negociations with the Court of Lisbon; that he then found all the Prince Regent's apprehensions directed to a French army, and all his hopes to a British fleet; and that, on his Lordship's assurances that the Prince would find protectors instead of enemies in our ships of war, the Portuguese fleet immediately began to drop down the Tagus. Now in all this we cannot see any thing that deserves the name of vain boasting: Lord Strangford merely assumes the merit of having taken the last step to remove every remaining scruple of the wavering Portuguese; and of having taken upon himself some arrangements for which he had not time to receive orders from his Court. As to his assertion that the confidence of the Portuguese in the protection of Britain arose from the moderation of our Ministers in not menacing their Court, seizing their fleet, plundering their dock-yards, and treating this Ally like a prostrate enemy whom he had bound hand and foot—we have no hesitation in believing it: had they always behaved in this manner, we should probably have had at least one nation less in the catalogue of our enemies. If Lord Strangford's representations were the cause of this moderation, we have only to regret that we had not similar Ministers at some other Courts of Europe.

The other insinuation of The Morning Chronicle, that his Lordship must be unacceptable to the Portuguese Government, does not rest on even the slightest foundation. The Prince Regent consulted with him in his utmost extremity, relied upon his assurances of British forbearance and protection, sailed in his company till he had reached the open ocean, and at parting bestowed upon him cordial expressions of esteem, accompanied by such presents as it is usual for Princes to bestow on well deserving subjects.

From these considerations, we think ourselves entitled to conclude that the attack of The Morning Chronicle on Lord Strangford was a mere work of party; a stab to the ministry at the expence of an unoffending individual. We have no adequate means to judge of his Lordship's real degree of ability; would have been the height of injustice in ministers not to have given him the appointment of ambassador at the court of the Brazils. After having attended the Portuguese government in all its fortunes, after having had every opportunity of studying its views and character; after having accompanied it as a protector in the most distressing circumstance of its fate, would it have been proper, or politic, or just, to set aside this man, and substitute in his place some person who knew nothing more of the Portuguese than of the Kamschatkans? Lord Strangford may behave ill hereafter; but where is the man who either from his services or his knowledge has at present an equal claim to the Brazilian embassy?

We cannot conclude these animadversions, without noticing the pompous declamations which have appeared in The Morning Chronicle, respecting the extreme importance of conciliating the Brazilian Court, and the extreme delicacy of this undertaking. Were the Court of Russia indeed, in question, a Court of vast and independent power, such language might very properly be held; but as to the Portuguese Government, which has not, nor ever had the power of injuring us, which depends upon us entirely for the supply, the protection and improvement of its new dominions, we should not imagine that any great art was requisite, either to gain its good-will, or to retain its fidelity. But the unhappy Morning Chronicle, in pursuit of its vocation, was under the necessity of representing this object as too great to be affected by any but the redoubtable politician of its own faction.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, DEC. 13.—The following remarks appear in The Moniteur, upon two articles of news extracted from the English Papers. The first relates to the communication between Gibraltar and the Spanish territories. The Moniteur observes "Commerce was carried on then between Spain and Gibraltar. If the King of Spain knew that his Governors betrayed their duty and traded with England, whilst England invades his colonies, surprises his frigates, massacres his seamen during peace; and causes so many miseries to his people, his Catholic Majesty could not but be indignant at it."

Upon the second Extract, which relates to Mr. Rose junior's mission, The Moniteur remarks, that, "the English have strange ideas of the Sovereignty of Nations, if they think the Americans pusillanimous and impolitic enough to barter away their independence and abandon their share of the commerce of the Colonies to England. If they should adopt such a mode of conduct, renounce the sovereignty of their flag, and interdict themselves from all commerce with France, there is no doubt that tearing thus to pieces their first charter of independence they would be at war with France, and with all the Continental Powers."

DEC. 16.—General Junot's Proclamation, upon entering Lisbon, states in substance, that the French army entered the city to save the Prince and the country from the influence of England—but that the Prince, so respectable for his virtues has suffered himself to be guided by the advice of some bad persons about him, and has thrown himself into the arms of his enemies; that these persons insinuated apprehensions for his personal safety; his subjects have been considered as nothing and their interests have been sacrificed to the cowardice of some courtiers.—"Inhabitants of Lisbon," adds the General in Chief, "remain quiet in your houses, neither fear my army nor myself; we are only terrible to our enemies and to the wicked. The great Napoleon, my Master, has sent me to protect you—I will protect you,"—It was not Fort Belier, but Fort Belem, the guns of which were spiked by the Prince's order. General Delabode has been appointed Commandant of Lisbon, and of all the troops in that city. We hoped that the Prince, knowing at length what were the real interests of his kingdom, was preparing to accede to the grand Confederacy of Europe; but all these demonstrations were only so many ruses to gain time. And what use has he made of this time?—he has deserted the throne which he might have rendered free. The result of his wise manœuvres, is to ensure himself, till fresh incidents happen, the post of Viceroy or Governor of an English Colony. His conduct has proved the necessity of the Expedi tion to Portugal. The Expedition of the English will soon convince him of their gratitude. But Europe sees with joy that an alliance which unites the two most powerful Sovereigns of Europe, could never be cemented at a more critical moment. This compact alone can guarantee it from the incessant aggressions of a maritime despotism, whose surest and richest spoils are always the wrecks of the thrones it pretends to protect.

On the 24th November, a flag of truce sent in by Sir Sidney Smith, arrived at Lisbon, with the following notification:—

"To all whom it may concern.—It being notorious that the ports of Portugal are shut against the British flag, and that his Britannic Majesty's Ministers has quitted the capital, the mouth of the Tagus is declared to be in a state of rigorous blockade. It is therefore notified to the Portuguese Government, that the execution of this measure will be rigorously enforced, until the difficulties that have lately arisen be done away. The Consuls of neutral powers are also informed of this, in order that they may acquaint their different Courts with this blockade, which will be maintained in the manner authorised by the laws of nations and the treaties concluded between his Britannic Majesty and the neutral Powers.

On board the Hibernia, off the Tagus, Nov. 22.

TO THE CONSUL OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AT MARSEILLES.

Tunis, Nov. 5, 1807.

"Sir—I hasten to communicate to you the following news, contained in a letter I received three days ago from the Consul General of the United States at Algiers, Colonel Lear, dated the 21st of October last; by which he informs me, that, on the 15th of that month, the Dey sent for the Dragomans of the American, Swedish, Danish, and Dutch Consuls, and ordered them to inform their respective Consuls, that he had long waited for their Annuities due for some time—that his patience was exhausted, and that if he did not receive advices through the medium of Alicant, or by some speedy arrivals, which should assure him of the annuities being soon paid, they should feel the consequences.

"The Consul General considered this as a formal declaration, the reigning Dey being in the habit of carrying his threats into execution—and he thinks that there is little doubt of his breaking with one of the powers, or with all—but we presume that if his attacks be directed against one alone, the extent of our commerce in these seas will be an object of temptation to him. You will, in consequence, immediately advise all American ships in your district to be on their guard, and also transmit this information to such of our Consuls in Europe as you may have occasion to correspond with.

"I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed) "C. D. Coxe."

Paris, Dec. 24.—The Moniteur of this date, contains several Notes upon the news extracted from the English Papers. Upon a paragraph in one of the Papers, relative to the rise of the Funds, in consequence of the arrival of a Flag of Truce, it observes:

"No Flag of Truce has been sent from France to England. Vessels have been placed at the disposition of M. De Metternich, the Austrian Ambassador, to communicate with England.—Of what use would Flags of Truce from France be? Do we not know that the present Ministry have proclaimed the principle of perpetual war? The refusal of the mediation of Russia, the massacre of Copenhagen, the present infamous decree by which England assimilates herself to the Dey of Algiers, do they not sufficiently make known that no peace is possible whilst this Club of furious Oligarchs shall be at the head of the English Administration?"

Upon a paragraph relative to the recognition of Christophe, as President of Hayti, The Moniteur remarks:

"That the Brigands, who have massacred the Whites at Copenhagen, should ally themselves with the Brigands who have massacred the Whites at St. Domingo, would not surprise any one. Both are equally the enemies of Europe."

Upon the entrance of the Russian Squadron into the Tagus, The Moniteur says,

"The Russian squadron cannot be surprised—it is in safety, and has escaped all your snares.—Admiral Sinlavin, by his manœuvres, has spared your annals a new crime."

Upon a paragraph in the English papers respecting the disposition of Russia not being favourable to us, The Moniteur observes:

"Search the Continent, the whole world, which the atrocious conduct of your oligarchs has roused against you, you will not find a nation that does not curse the British name.—We must except, however, the negroes of St. Domingo and the Dey of Algiers. The latter has explained himself categorically—He has declared your law founded upon justice and the law of nations."

An article in one of the English Papers having stated that Mr. Hill, who is going to Sardinia, is the bearer of dispatches for the Austrian Government, announcing the acceptance of the Austrian and Russian Mediation, The Moniteur says, "that "It is true that the Emperor of Austria, upon the first intelligence of the events at Copenhagen, demanded explanations from England, and, as the Emperor of Russia did, demanded how far she intended to make the world groan under the miseries of the present war, and whether she imagined that all the Governments of the Continent would longer suffer the vexations offered to their commerce, and the violation of their flags?

"To this Declaration worthy of a great Sovereign, what did England reply? She replied by the Decrees of the 11th November.

"At London, as at Vienna, and at Petersburgh, the people desire the termination of this infernal war, which is profitable only to pirates; but the Ministers of perpetual war will laugh at the evils which Europe is suffering, until the avenging blow, from the hands of the English themselves, tired with the odious part they are made to play, or from the hands of the Continental Powers, shall at length rid the world of them."

GERMANY.

Vienna, Dec. 3.—Little attention seems now to be paid to the politics of this capital. The peace of the Continent appears to be settled for a long time, and the policy of our Court is hailed with blessings, "having made common cause with the Continent against England. We are assured, that our Ambassador at London, Prince Stahremberg, is recalled.

There has lately been established a number of new batteries for the protection of the port of Triest: a numerous train of artillery has been sent from the arsenals of the interior of Austria, and even from this capital, for their destination. All the coasts will likewise be furnished with cannon, in order to frustrate all attempts that may be made by the English against our maritime place: for it is easy to foresee, that the British Cabinet must be much incensed at seeing our Court adopt the measures so imperiously prescribed by the interest of the whole Continent, for at length putting an end to British despotism. We learn, besides, that the Archduke Charles has lately issued orders for reinforcing the troops already stationed on the coast.

It has also been lately determined, that the Austrian frontiers, on the side of Turkey, shall be furnished with a cordon of troops: and with that view several regiments are already proceeding to Hungary, and thence to Formio and Croatia.

December 16.—On the 11th inst. the French garrison of Brannau marched out of the fortress, and possession was taken of it on the part of the Austrians.

Yesterday the Diet of Hungary was to be closed, yet it is thought, that the sittings will continue some time longer; but the Emperor is to return on the 21st inst. The Diet has decreed, in support of the Royal Finances, a grant of six per cent. on all income, and one per cent. on all immoveable property. There are Magnates in Hungary, who, in consequence of this new tax, will have to pay 200,000 florins. Prince Esterhazy will have to pay upwards of double that sum.

SPAIN.

Cadiz, Dec. 6.—Twenty-five thousand French troops are expected every hour in this city and its environs. There is not the least doubt that French troops will take possession of all the sea-ports of Spain. Governor Solang has left Cadiz to put himself at the head of 20,000 Spanish troops, which are to be joined with 20,000 French infantry and 10,000 who are proceeding towards Portugal. A rumour is afloat here, which seems generally credited, that very severe restraints will be imposed upon every description of export, as Bonaparte has discovered that the provisions of his prohibitory decree against commerce have not been enforced in the several ports of Spain with all the rigour which he requires.

ITALY

Milan, Dec. 19.

We, Napoleon, by the Grace of God, and the Constitution of the Empire, Emperor of the French, and King of Italy, decree as follows:—

Art. 1. We adopt for our Son, Prince Eugene Beauharnois, Archchancellor of State of our Empire of France, and Viceroy of our Kingdom of Italy.

2. The Crown of Italy shall be, after us, and in default of our children, and male legitimate descendants, hereditary in the person of Prince Eugene, and his direct legitimate descendants from male to male by order of primogeniture, to the perpetual exclusion of women and their descendants.

3. In default of our sons, and male descendants and the sons and male descendants of Prince Eugene, the Crown of Italy shall devolve to the son and nearest relative of such of the Princes of our Blood, as shall then reign in France.

4. Prince Eugene, our son, shall enjoy all the honours attached to our adoption.

5. The right which our adoption gives him shall never, in any case, authorise him or his descendants to urge any pretensions to the Crown of France, the succession to which is invariably fixed. (Signed) Napoleon.

A Decree of the 20th confers upon Prince Eugene Napoleon, the title of Prince of Venice.

Another Decree confers upon "our well-beloved Granddaughter, Princess Josephine, as a mark of our satisfaction to our good city of Bologna," the title of Princess of Bologna.

Another Decree declares the Chancellor Melzi, Duke of Lodi.

After the above Decrees had been read, the Emperor made the following speech:—

"Gentlemen, Possidenti, Dotti, and Commercianti, I see you with pleasure about my Throne.

"Returned after three years absence, I am pleased at remarking the progress which my people have made—but how many things remain to be done to efface the faults of our forefathers, and to render you worthy of the destiny I am preparing for you.

"The intestine divisions of our ancestors, their miserable egotism to particular cities, paved the way for the loss of all our rights. The country was disinherited of its rank and its dignity; that country which, in more distant ages had carried so far the honour of its arms and eclat of its virtues. I will make my glory consist in regaining that eclat and those virtues.

"Citizens of Italy,—I have done much for you; I will do much more—But on your side, united in heart as you are in interest with my people of France, consider them as elder brothers.—Always behold the source of our prosperity, the guarantee of our institutions, and that of our independence in the union of the Iron Crown with that of my Imperial Crown."

Milan, Dec. 22.—Yesterday Deputations from the three Electoral Colleges were introduced to his Majesty, who was seated on his throne, with the Viceroy, the Grand Duke of Berg, and the Prince of Neufchatel, by his side.—To the address of the Duke de Lodi, President of the College of Possidenti, he replied, "Gentlemen of the College of Possidenti, I am pleased with the sentiments you have expressed—the laws of property form the compact between the Sovereign and the People—Rely always upon my protection."—To the address of the College of Dotti, he replied, "Gentlemen of the College of Dotti, your talents give you a great influence over the nation—employ them for the advantage of the Throne and the Laws, which are the support of it.—Your prosperity is equally necessary to my people and my glory—It will always please me to give you proofs of my benevolence."

To the College of Commercianti, he said,—"The greatness of a State is particularly advantageous to the prosperity of Commerce, so necessary to the good of agriculture. The laws on which my empire is founded are especially useful and honourable to you. I shall constantly watch over your interests. I am pleased with the sentiments you have just expressed."

Paris, Dec. 27.—It appears to be certain, that the Emperor and King will return to Paris before the 1st of January.

It is said that the King of Persia has declared war against England.

PORTUGAL.

Lisbon, Dec. 5.—General Junot having ordered, the evening before his arrival in this city, a corps of French troops to proceed by the suburbs of Lisbon, to Port St. Julien, which is the principal defence of the mouth of the Tagus, the corps entered the fort, the command of which was given to the Chief of the 2d battalion of the 70th regiment of infantry. It is a in good condition, and well mounted with cannon. A tempest forced the English fleet, which has been in sight, to make sail, and down to this day it has not re-appeared.

AMERICA.

SENATE, DEC. 1.

The bill reported by Mr. Adams, "For the preservation peace and maintainance of the authority of the United Stat in the ports, harbours, and waters, under their jurisdiction after undergoing a slight amendment, was ordered to a thi reading without a division. The question was taken on stril ing out the 5th section, which interdicts the entrance of a British armed vessels into ports and waters of the United State and vests the President with power to take off the provision whenever, in his opinion, due reparation shall be made, an lost.—Yeas 3, Noes 26.

Dec. 2.—The Senate passed a Bill, introduced by Mr Adams, for the preservation of peace in the ports and harbour of the United States, with but little variation from the origina Bills. The division on the passage was—Yeas 26, Noes 3; th Members dividing as on the motion to strike out the first section the affirmative in one case becoming the negative in the other.

Dec. 3.—The Bill making an appropriation for the more effectual defence of the ports and harbours of the United States, was passed but with little division.

New York, Dec. 7.—We are told that on Sunday morning a British 74, and two frigates, anchored in Lynhaven Bay; that the officers every day since then, landed from them near the Pleasure-house, (whose name we do not at present wish to mention) has had the temerity of supplying them with some necessaries, intimation of which has been given to Brigadier-General Mathews.

Dec. 8.—The following is extracted from a letter received by a Merchant of this city, by the Calypso:—

"Bourdeaux, Oct. 15, 1807.

"William Lee, Esq. American Consul in this city, has received a letter from General Armstrong, desiring him to advise all Masters of vessels to quit this port in as short a time as possible. The like advice, it is said, has been given to the Consuls at the other sea ports. Bonaparte will have no neutrals—Americans will have to fight for him or against him."

Dec. 8.—We are glad to notice, that the attention of our fellow-citizens is awakened by a sense of the evils which the Non-importation Act must produce, if suffered to go into operation. As a war measure it certainly can be of no use, for, on the occurrence of that disastrous event, a total, not a partial restriction, must be enforced; as a measure of irritation, until negociation is hopeless, it is palpably unwise, for these reasons, as well as because in its effects it would bear peculiarly hard upon that class of citizens, who have engaged in distant voyages, undertaken from their own hopes, and the avowed expectations of the Government, that peace with Great Britain would be preserved; we are happy to learn that a respectful memorial to Congress, which does not affect or express any party feelings or sentiments, requiring its suspension or repeal, is now in circulation, and will be very numerously subscribed by our citizens.

Dec. 10.—The Non-importation Act goes into operation on Monday next, unless Congress, during the present week, repeal or suspend it for a further period.

The House of Representatives of Pensylvania, have refused to answer the Governor's speech, forty-three to forty-two.

SCOTLAND.

Glasgow, Jan. 5.—A Mercantile House in town has favoured us with a copy of the following Official Notice.

Trade to the Brazils.—Licences are directed to be prepared for this trade by the Privy Council, upon the following conditions:—"The Licence is to be indorsed by the Portuguese Minister here, and invoices of the cargo to be delivered him.—Vessels to proceed only to the Island of St. Catherine's, to the southward of Rio Janeiro, there to wait the directions of the Portuguese Government. No articles to be allowed which were not heretofore admitted in Portugal, and to pay the same duties, "Henry Nadin, Agent."

Antiquities.—About a fortnight ago, some of the labourers on that part of the Caledonian Canal, which cuts the side of the hill Torravain, near Inverness, and close to the old road leading to Lochness, dug up a silver chain, of double links, in all containing thirty rings.—The thickness of the bars which compose the links is about that of a man's little finger, and the medium diameter of the rings may be a little more than an inch and a half; the chain weighs six pounds, and is of silver mixed with a small quantity of alloy, seemingly of brass or copper. A human skeleton was found near the chain, and a piece of the same metal, resembling in shape a bracelet, but which could not have been intended for that purpose, being considerably too small. Inverness is said to have been the ancient capital of the Pictish kings, and the forts of Craig Phatrick, near that town, as well as many others, are supposed to be the remains of the royal habitations of that race.

During the late heavy falls of snow, which were severely felt by all the store farmers in Scotland, two sheep, the property of Mr. Bertram, farmer, at Westhope, in the county of East Lothian, were blown up and covered over with snow, beneath which they survived no less than five weeks and four days, without food; and after having, of course, been considered as lost, one of them, after a day or two of thaw, travelled home to the farm-steading from the place where (as was discovered,) it had been blown up, a distance of about two miles, and is now thriving and doing well; but the other one was found dead.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, JAN. 2.—Between the hours of six and seven o'clock, on Wednesday, the 30th ult. an attempt was made to set the Dublin Library Society House on fire, by putting a lighted piece of coal, wrapped up in a quantity of linen rag and whited brown paper, among a great number of bundles of unbound books and loose papers, which were stored at the farthest part of the hall, and not more than two feet from the cieling and staircase. Had it not been for a Gentleman of the Dublin Library Society, who was going out of the house, and discovered a smoke and smell of fire, and a flame having actually burst out from the papers, the house must have been on fire, and probably consumed. A reward has been offered for the discovery of the offender.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—A melancholy accident lately occurred in the Distillery in Belfast. When the fermenting vat was to be cleaned, though the men had been always strictly enjoined to have a large place taken out the previous night, and also to put down some burning coals, and afterwards to throw in a quantity of water, in order to expel the new air, yet, from mere negligence, one of them, without even trying the simple experiment of sending down a lighted candle, rashly descended into the vat, and was suffocated in a moment. His companions hearing him fall down, one of them hastily went to his assistance, and though others, who were present, insisted on his tying a rope round his waist, he, through over anxiety to save his comrade, instantly descended without it, but had scarcely reached the bottom of the ladder with a rope in his hand to fasten to the other man, when he himself was so affected by the air that he could only give some tremulous shrieks or cries, but being totally unable to help himself, he also fell down. Immediate exertions were then made by all present, and another man having fixed a rope round his waist descended, but before he could lay hold of either of the other two persons, he also was so strongly affected that the people above instantly drew him up again. For some minutes he was strongly convulsed, and appeared like a person deranged, but on being taken to the open air, he immediately recovered. Notwithstanding what he had experienced, his humanity prompted him to make a second attempt, in which he succeeded in throwing a noose over one of the men's legs, and he and that man were both drawn out. Though very much affected, and greatly exhausted by this second attempt, he insisted on going down a third time for the other man; he did so, and in a similar way accomplished his object. Having been rather longer down this third time, when drawn up, he was very seriously affected, but fortunately soon recovered. Medical assistance being immediately called, every exertion was made by two Professional Gentlemen to recover the two men who first descended, but though the one had been only 15 minutes, and the other only 10, in the vat, yet every attempt to revive them proved ineffectual.

PROVINCIALS.

The following is said to be a most effectual method of keeping crows off grain land:—A stick, about two yards in length, stuck into the earth in the most exposed part of the field, and an inverted glass bottle put on the top, the stick going up the neck. These bottles thus placed, have this season secured a seven-acres field of wheat from their depredations.—We cannot vouch for the truth of the above; but we hope, that those who are inclined to disbelieve it will make the experiment, as the best and only means of removing their doubts.

A winter pear tree, in a garden at Greenhill, Swansea, has this season produced fruit of a second blossom; some are nearly the size of an egg.

Lately was shot by George Pringle, at Staingate, near Danby Lodge, (the sporting seat of the Rt. Hon. Lord Viscount Downe) an eagle of the following remarkable dimensions: its breadth between the tip of the wings two yards ten inches, the length, from its beak to the tip of the tail, thirty-eight inches, the extreme breadth of the tail twenty-five inches. When placed in an erect posture, its height two feet seven inches, its weight sixteen pounds two ounces: the colour is a mixed brown and white, the back almost nearly white. This extraordinary bird has been put into a state of preservation, by Mr. Frank, at Danby Lodge.

LONGEVITY.—A Mrs. Mary Thrapson is now living in Kent-street, Liverpool, in good health and spirits, at the advanced age of 110 years, having been born in Scotland the 1st of January 1698. She has lived in the reign of five successive monarchs, beginning with King William. She bore a distinguished part in the battles of Dettingen, Culloden, Fontenoy, &c. under the Duke of Cumberland.

Another melancholy instance of the thoughtlessness and imprudence of parents.—On Tuesday last, about one o'clock in the afternoon, Joseph Carr, an infant about four years of age, and blind, the son of William Carr, serving in the Navy, being left by his mother, in her lodging room in Lewes, with two other children younger than himself, for a short time, while she went to a shop for flour, got so near the fire, that his clothes caught the flames, when the child left the room, and ran into an adjoining well-house, where its cries brought a woman from the next house to its assistance, but too late, as the flames had consumed all its apparel, except the stockings, to tinder, and so miserably burnt the child, that he expired a few hours after in the greatest agony. Coroner's Verdict—Accidental death. The unfortunate little sufferer was born blind, but could run about the street like other boys, and possessed such a thorough knowledge of his play-mates, that he could readily distinguish one from the other.

Tuesday, as Thomas Dicker, a lad of 15, of Silchester, Berks, was preparing to go out a shooting, he found the flint defective, and gave the end of the gun, which was loaded, to his brother to hold, who placed it against his belly; on hammering the flint the prime caught fire, and the contents were discharged into the bowels of his brother, who languished in great agonies till the next day.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A Correspondent,' who subscribes himself Hiero, is very angry at our assertion, in our Review of Political Declaimers, last Sunday, "that Cobbett's arguments against the utility of the learned languages imposed only upon those who were as ignorant as himself." In refutation of this remark, Hiero states that he himself is a learned man; that he had formed from his own reflections the same conclusions with Cobbett, even before he had read Cobbett's disquisitions, and that several respectable Philosophers were of the same opinion. All this may be very true, but it is no refutation of what we advanced; for it appears that neither the learned Hiero, nor these deceased Philosophers, nor indeed any intelligent person we have ever heard of, derived their conviction on this subject from Mr. Cobbett's reasonings.

We are much obliged to Veritas and P. W. K. for teirh friendly hints, and shall look for the future favour of themselves and their friends only in proportion as the faults they allude to are remedied.

The complaint of a Neglected Artist will speedily meet with consolation on a scale that, we trust, will satisfy his expectations. We shall be obliged to him for the communication of any thing in his Art, which has been neglected, and yet is worthy of the Public notice.

Our Correspondent G. will have the candour to make an allowance for the difference of taste, and will accept our thanks for his pretty effusion, though we are at present prevented by the remonstrances of many other Correspondents from inserting Poetry.

We shall be happy if our strictures on ignorant and unprincipled declaimers prove as convincing to the rest of the world as to N. and to Philo-consistency.

The address of the Mercoaps has been received.

TO THE PUBLIC.

We have, therefore, to beg, that all Subscribers and others, who may have been deprived of the First Number and of the Title-Page, which are so indispensable to those who intend to bind up THE NATIONAL REGISTER, will send their orders to the Office immediately.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

In the Moniteurs which we received last night, there are several Articles replete with bitterness against this Country. The Moniteur is eager to assert that no Flags of Truce have been sent by the French Government to this Country; and those which have excited so much speculation in England, were some vessels placed at the disposal of Count METTERNICH, the Austrian Ambassador. To what purpose, it inquires, should Flags of Truce be sent to England, while its Members are known to have determined on perpetual War? Of this conclusion, the rejection of the Russian mediation, and the affair of Copenhagen, and the present infamous Decree by which England assimilates herself to the Dey of Algiers." The Moniteur has the most convenient memory imaginable: it forgets the behaviour of BONAPARTE to Switzerland, Portugal, and twenty other weak Governments which he has wantonly robbed, not only of a portion of their Armaments, but of their whole Independence; and it also prudently recollects not that our late Decree was a mere act of retaliation, and that the moderate BONAPARTE has since carried his Barbary Institutions to a much greater extent.

On our traffic with the new Government of St. Domingo, the Moniteur observes, "That is no wonder the Brigands who massacred the whites at Copenhagen, should ally themselves with the Brigands who massacred the whites at St. Domingo." This is very well, and we may really consider the confidence which the rulers of Hayti repose in us as a comparative compliment; for if they suspected that we should decoy them by solemn promises into our power, and then murder them, as the French did with the gallant TOUSSAINT, assuredly we should never be permitted to set a foot in that island.

The Moniteur assures us that the English name is loaded with curses in every nation of the Continent; and, with a very unusual degree of modesty, it does not assure us that the French name is hailed in the same nations, with blessings equally loud!

The Moniteur tells us that the people of London are no less eager for peace than those of Vienna or Petersburgh; but that we can have no hope of this happy event, until we rise in the height of our vengeance, and tear our present Ministers to pieces. We should imagine that hints of this kind to the populace would at present be rather dangerous at Paris!

BONAPARTE, by an imperial decree, has declared EUGENE BEAUHARNOIS his successor in the kingdom of Italy, &c. and created him in the mean time Prince of Venice. JOSEPHINE, the daughter of EUGENE, is now to be entitled Princess of Bologna; and Melzi, the obsequious President of the Cisalpine Republic, Duke of Lodi.

After the Decree was read in the Milanese Senate, BONAPARTE thought proper to make a Speech. He hinted at the intestine divisions of the Italians, which had been the means of losing their Independence: but he consoled them by assuring them "his glory should consist in regaining the eclat and virtues of their Ancestors." Lest, however, some turbulent Roman notions should be generated in their breasts by these intimations, he reminds them that the French are their elder brothers, and that the Iron Crown can be secure only by its union with his Imperial Crown!

The most important contents of the Gazette of last night, are the order for blockading in Spain the ports of Cadiz, Carthagena and St. Lucar, and all the ports which lie between Carthagena and St. Lucar. The reason for selecting these is the importance of the trade of Cadiz, and the ready communication of the others with the southern harbours of France. The northern ports, into which our manufactures may much more readily be conveyed, are still left open for our mercantile speculators under neutral flags.

The most important article of news received in the course of this week, relates to the discussions in America. Strong petitions have been received from Philadelphia and other trading towns against the non-importation act: and there is little doubt entertained in America that the legislature will at least suspend its operation. In the mean time the Congress is adopting every measure suggested by JEFFERSON for the fortification of the American harbours, and for fitting out a naval armament to drive all intruders from their harbours. These measures are necessary, and it would be folly in any government that aims at independence to neglect them; but we still see little reason to apprehend that the Americans will be so blind to their own interests, as to precipitate themselves into a ruinous war with this country.

By recent accounts from the Coast of France, it appears that active exertions are going forward in all the minor ports, particularly in Normandy, to prepare a number of boats similar to those at Boulogne. To this foolery little attention is due; but our Government will, however, undoubtedly, take precautions to prevent the fears of the timid, by destroying these trifling armaments in their attempts to unite.

Our Government has authorised the Governors of Guernsey and Jersey to issue licences to trade between those Islands and the French ports, even in French vessels, if under 100 tons. This regulation will be of great advantage to the inhabitants, and their proximity to the French coast will give them a great facility in evading the restrictions of BONAPARTE.

A Cabinet Council sat yesterday in Downing-street, at the breaking up of which the American Ambassador had an audience with his Majesty's Ministers.

Friday the dividends began to be paid at the Bank to the Public; the Bankers, and some of the first Merchants, had their warrants issued to them on Wednesday and Thursday; but this, though some accommodation to them, gives them no priority of payment over the Public in general.

It has been stated that Lord Hutchinson, Colonel Hutchinson, and Colonel Eustace, have been captured on board a packet, and carried into Norway. We have made particular inquiry into the truth of the report, and ca no trace it to any respectable source whatever.

The body of Captain Lydiard, of his Majesty's late ship Anson, was picked up on the 1st inst. and brought to Falmouth on the 2d, for interment; his remains were attended to the grave by Vice-Admiral Cotton, and all the other naval officers at that port, and many of the military (amongst whom were General Spencer), a party of marines from the men of war, and a party of the Oxford Militia fired three vollies over his grave; his interment was also attended by the Mayor and Corporation, and most of the respectable part of the inhabitants of the town.

A Court Martial was held on Thursday last at Plymouth, on board the Salvador del Mundo, 112 guns, on the surviving officers of his Majesty's late frigate the Anson, when the whole of the Officers, with the exception of the Master, were unanimously acquitted. The latter Officer was sentenced to be admonished, for not having fulfilled, to the utmost, the duties of his station.—There was not on board the Anson any prisoner in irons, as has been reported, at the time of the loss.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

THE KING'S LEVEE.

Wednesday, about half-past twelve o'clock, His MAJESTY arrived at the Queen's Palace, from Windsor. A great concourse of people assembled round the Palace to endeavour to see him. The Duke of Kent was in readiness to receive His MAJESTY. The Dukes of York, Cumberland, and Cambridge, came soon after to pay their respects to their Royal Father. Soon after two o'clock, His MAJESTY held a private levee. The following had the honour of being presented to His MAJESTY:—

Rear-Admiral Hunter, upon his promotion to that rank.

Bartholomew Frere, Esq. upon his return as Secretary to the Mission of Sir Arthur Paget, at Constantinople.

Lieutenant-Colonel Johnson, of the 28th regiment, upon his return from Copenhagen.

Captain P. G. King, of the Royal Navy, upon his return from his late Governorship of New South Wales.

His Grace the Duke of Manchester, upon his leaving England, for Jamaica, to take upon him the Governorship of that place, to which he has lately been appointed.

Major-General Winyard, upon his return from Sicily.

Mr. Hill, upon his being appointed Charge D'Affaires to the Brazils.

Captain Johnson, of the 28th regiment, upon his promotion.

His MAJESTY held a Privy Council, and gave audiences to the Duke of Portland, Earl Camden; Lords Hawkesbury and Castlereagh; Mr. Canning, and Mr. Ryder; the latter, as Judge-Advocate, laid before His MAJESTY the proceedings of several Courts Martial.

Soon after six o'clock, His MAJESTY set off in his travelling carriage, for Windsor, escorted by a party of the Light Horse.

His MAJESTY took a short ride on horseback yesterday in Windsor Park, with the Princesses Augusta, Sophia and Amelia.

The QUEEN and the Princess Elizabeth spent the morning at Frogmore Lodge.

Thursday the Princess Charlotte of Wales entered into her 13th year, upon which occasion the Duchess of Brunswick gave a splendid entertainment to the Princess of Wales, Princess Charlotte, and a select party of friends. In the evening, several of the tradesmen of her Royal Highness paid the customary tribute of respect to their Royal Patron, by illuminating their houses.

The Gentlemen of the Long Robe are likely to be called on before long, to exercise their forensic talents, in a case of Crim. Con. under circumstances of a very peculiar nature. The fair delinquent, it seems, after having been thirteen years married, found herself, to the great joy of her Lord, in an increasing situation; but as the hour of her accouchement drew near, the horrors of dissolution induced her to acquaint her injured spouse, that the expected offspring was not his, but the fruits of an illicit intercourse with a medico-military hero. The Lady was immediately sent home, and on the same day was delivered. We understand some letters were soon after discovered, which placed the matter in a point of view, as curious as it is certain.

It can't rain but it pours!—Another daughter of Thespis, whose brows have been aching for a Coronet, has at length persuaded a dashing Marquis to make her an honest woman. When a Coronet graces her brows, it is to be hoped she will not grace the brows of her most noble Benedict!

Mr. Cobbett's conduct to Mr. Spence, in apologising to him after endeavouring to defame his character, reminds us of the story of the gamester who, suspecting foul play in his adversary, watched an opportunity during the game, and dexterously nailed his hand to the table with a fork.—"Zounds, (exclaimed the sufferer, writhing with pain), do you mean to murder me?"—"No, replied the aggressor, very coolly), I shall beg your pardon if the Knave of Diamonds is not concealed under your hand!!!"

A sketch of Lord Stanhope's new vessel, which sails both ways, would make a very handsome Vignette for some of our Morning Papers.

BREAD.—Tuesday, the Lord Mayor ordered the price of bread to be reduced half an assize, or 1d. in the peck loaf. The price of the quartern loaf to be 11d. and household 9½d.

Friday General Sir John Stewart and Sir H. Popham went to Merchant Taylors' Hall, where they were admitted Freemen of that Company. They then proceeded to the office of the City Chamberlain in Guildhall, where Mr. CLARKE, the City Chamberlain, presented each of them with the sword voted by the Common Council:—one to Sir J. Stewart, for his gallantry and good conduct at the battle of Malda, and the other to Sir Home Popham, for the capture of Buenos Ayres. The presentation of the swords was accompanied with an appropriate speech by the City Chamberlain, to which the two gallant officers made a suitable reply. None but Aldermen and Common Councilmen were admitted to witness the ceremony of presentation.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held, when Captain Peter Campbell was sworn into the command of the ship Lord Keith, consigned to St. Helena and Bengal.—The Court adjourned at six o'clock, till Thursday.

Friday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the following Captains were sworn into the command of their respective ships, viz.—Capt. P. Herbert, Euphrates; Capt. Kymer, Lord Castlereagh; W. Gelston, Europe.—The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

During the reigns of Mr. Garrick and Mr. Kemble, Tragedy was peculiarly cultivated at Drury Lane; and the audiences, though in general they preferred Comedy, were induced by the greatness of the actors, to countenance a species of entertainment which they had a vanity in admiring, though, with a few exceptions, they did not understand it. But the present Managers perceiving that the town, unless led into another channel by some commanding genius, inclines rather to Comedy than to Tragedy, and having no Tragedian of sufficient powers to stand alone, like Ajax, and turn an overwhelming multitude, have allowed the Comic Muse to re-assume her reign. Comic actors are always to be found: both because Comedy is of all dramatic arts the most encouraged, and because it does not require in its representatives the same grand qualifications of nature and education.

At the head of this Theatre stands Mr. Elliston, a gentleman who, though he acts in every thing, is most particularly eminent in elegant comedy; and we have often regretted that he, who might approach so near to perfection in one sphere, will persist in weakening his efforts by dividing his pursuits. As his powers are adapted rather to charm in established Comedy, than to support the tottering pile of Tragedy, he would do well to abandon the latter: for though, perhaps, the town will endure a Tragedy at Drury Lane, once in a month, an actor like Mr. Elliston ought never to play but when he can be admired.

Though this is our general opinion of Mr. Elliston's genius, yet there are two or three characters of Tragedy which he plays with great force: and among them is the Earl of Warwick, which he represented on Wednesday night.

The Tragedy of The Earl of Warwick was written by a Dr. Franklin, who was Chaplains to His Majesty: and is one of those plays which are never very likely to incur execration, because they never take the chance of delighting. When a poet boldly puts on his Parnassean wings, he may fall, like Dedalus, by soaring too high; but an author who creeps along the ground has at least the solid satisfaction of considering that he cannot easily be lower. Dr. Franklin selected the safer course: he constructed his play with great regularity, and, with a most laudable respect for custom, abstained from introducing any characters but those to which the stage had been long habituated. A Monarch amiable but misled, a Nobleman the idol of the people, a patriotic Peer, and a cringing Courtier, with a couple of Ladies, one an angel and the other a devil, are the Dramatis Personæ of "The Earl of Warwick." The Doctor, however, was evidently as honest a pains-taking poet as any Court-Chaplain who ever wrote: and by his labour he has at least succeeded in obtaining some cold eulogies, as a mole works his way through earth to day-light. From this sample of the worthy Doctor's genius, we cannot help conceiving that, in appointing him to a Chaplaincy, his Majesty acted with more discrimination than patrons usually evince in the business of promotion: for his reverence has brought his clerical taste into the theatre itself, and manifested his zeal for the church by preaching on the stage. We have in vain endeavoured to discover a single poetical passage, or a single situation of real interest through the whole five acts of the play. Warwick, indeed, is exhibited in various tempers; but whether he be pleased or vexed, angry or affectionate, he invariably fails to excite our emotion. An actor may create something from the character, and to have given an opportunity for good acting, is some merit, but it is only the merit of a raw outline; the actor must make the picture. An author of real genius leaves nothing to the actor but the business of varnishing, and the discretion of adding a few finishing touches. The Doctor has once or twice endeavoured to speak bold constitutional language; but just as we expect a plain vindication of popular rights, we find the King and People making up matters in a good-humoured way, and submission, as usual, walking quietly, arm in arm, with injustice.

We are happy to speak with unequivocal praise of Mr. Elliston's Warwick. His magnificent voice gave a powerful energy to the vigorous scenes: and where affection for Elizabeth was to be expressed, he evinced all that tenderness and feeling, which so particularly distinguish his representations of love. There is one passage which he delivered in a manner so nobly accordant with the genius of his character, that we cannot deny ourselves the pleasure of pointing it out to our readers. Warwick, having quarrelled with Edward the Fourth, whom he justly considers as a creature of his own elevation, is ordered into custody by the enraged King. The guards are about to take his sword, when Warwick exclaims:

" Slaves, stand off!
" If I must yield my sword, I'll give it him
" Whom it so long has served; there's not a part
" In this old faithful steel, that is not stained
" With English blood in grateful Edward's cause.
" Give me my chains! they are the bands of friendship—
" Of a King's friendship! for his sake, a while
" I'll wear them."

An actor of vulgar conception would have contented himself in this place, with presenting the sword in mock humility to Edward. But Mr. Elliston, who knew that the very irony of so high-spirited a being as Warwick, was openly contemptuous, did not affect a reverence for Edward, but having spoken, with undisguised resentment, the line—he stalked boldly to the King, and threw the weapon at the monarch's feet. The audience, though perhaps they did not reason the question, felt the beauty, and their instinct produced a loud applause.

" With English blood in grateful Edward's cause,"

Mr. and Mrs. H. Siddons were able representatives of Edward and Elizabeth; but Mrs. Powell forgot that Margaret of Anjou should exhibit a deep and deadly revenge, rather than a loud and unvarying passion. The rage of Margaret, though its casual flashes are tremendous, yet burns, for the most part, like a subterraneous fire, and seems to be gathering strength for the great explosions. All that should have been subtle was open: and if the author had not taken care to let Margaret acquaint the spectators with the villainy of her own character, probably, but few of last night's audience would have guessed her to be evil-minded, till she had actually murdered Warwick.

The Pantomime has been continued through the week, though without any powerful attraction.

OPERA.

This fashionable Theatre, which has lately given occasion to such vigorous disputes between Managers and Ballet-Masters, and such ungentle usage from a Lord Chancellor to a beautiful woman, was at length, on Saturday, the 2d of January, opened, for the season, with the Opera of Semiramide. The histories of all the altercations to which we have alluded, are now a little out of date, and therefore we shall not molest our readers by introducing them into our columns. Of the Opera it is our intention to give regular and ample accounts: but we shall make it a principle to insert no observations, vamped in the hurry of a Saturday night; lest the necessary speed of that agitating period should betray us into some inadvertences, which we may too late discover, and which our readers may too early regret. Madame Catalani was warmly received on her first appearance: and seems likely to produce to the Theatre much more than the sum for which she has so finely and so justly contended.

THE PRINCE OF ASTURIAS.

Letters received by the vessel from Holland, have furnished us with some intelligence from Spain. It is said, that the conduct of the Prince of Asturias underwent an official investigation relative to the plot of which he was accused, before he received the King's pardon; and in the Dutch letters an account is given of the Prince's examination, in which he certainly appears to more advantage than in the correspondence which was published in the French Papers. Instead of acknowledging any offence, his Royal Highness is said to have vindicated himself in a very manly manner, and with considerable ingenuity. The examination of the Prince, which took place before the Commission appointed to inquire into the Conspiracy, was very short. Four questions were put to him, which, with their answers, were to the following effect:

Q. Is it true that your Royal Highness has conspired against the life of your Royal Father and King?

A. I am a Christian; I fear God, and cannot but shudder at the mention of an accusation so horrible. Such a thought never entered my mind.

Q. What use did you mean to make of the cyphers of correspondence found in the lining of your coat.

A. The cyphers you speak of were found the first day I wore that dress. Those who made the coat can best answer your question.

Q. For what purpose did your Royal Highness correspond with the Emperor Napoleon, and what was the object of that correspondence.

A. I have no hesitation in owning that I have kept up a correspondence with that august Sovereign, but it contained nothing prejudicial to the interests of my country, and nothing that could provoke the displeasure of my Royal Father the King.

Q. Why did your Royal Highness order, and keep ready, four horses, under circumstances which indicated an intention to escape?

A. It is true the horses were ordered to be kept in readiness, but this was not done with the intention of flying from Spain, but for the purpose of joining the French army: after which I intended to make known to my Royal Father the unhappy situation to which the country is reduced, by the truly bad administration and despotic measures of the Prince of Peace.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

Fox-hunting in Kent.—The Lodge hounds are now in the highest vigour, or to speak technically, well blooded. They closed the sport of the last year in very good style, notwithstanding the sky was stormy and the day far advanced before they found the fox. In drawing the last cover, Baken Pole, the hounds struck upon the drag at a quarter before two, and in a few moments the fox broke away, in view of the field, with the hounds close at him. His first point was up wind for Heuncker Earth, across Brockeden. Stopped out there he instantly turned down the wind for Willow Wood, and skirting Dally, the hounds were so near him he dared not try the earth. He then stretched across, with a side wind, in a line with Crome's Earth; but the hounds again gaining upon him, he turned down the whole extent of King's down Wood, for Shrubber's Earth. Here he was again baulked, and run for the earth opposite Lineted Lodge; at this moment some of the horsemen rode into the hounds and brought them to a check: Jerry, however, made a good and quick cast down wind, and immediately recovered the scent. The hounds now went away with a good head across Newberry, Petwood, and Skuddington, into Mr. Lake's Chesnut Plantation. Here we all looked very dismal, lest he should go to ground in the rabbit burrows; but, as if despising a safety that he did not owe to his own powers, he went gallantly across the open country to Barling's Wood. Fearing that he was running for Tynham Great Earth, which was open, we sent the whipper-in forward, at speed, to prevent, if possible, this intention. He had scarcely reached it when the fox came up, and, seeing the whipper-in, passed on to Rascal's Mount, and thence into Tynham Osiers. After going half over the bed he returned, broke across the marsh, and run the road towards Cannon Mill. There he was met by a labourer and turned, completely exhausted, into the hedge. The hounds being now nearly up to him, he made a last effort of speed and courage, and we killed him in view in Brian's Orchard. This chace lasted, without interruption, an hour and twenty-eight minutes, and completely realised Mr. Beckford's ideas of a fox chace, which he wished never to continue less than one hour, or to exceed two—and that it should correspond with Lord Chatham's notion of a battle, "it should be short, sharp, and decisive."

Boxing.—The celebrated Gulley has just entered into a public-house in the parish of St. Clement Danes, and consequently he has not yet gone into a regular course of training, preparatory to his second combat with Gregson. The latter is in perfect health and full vigour of body, and he continues in careful training; under the management of his original trainer, Richmond, the black, near Hampstead. There are no other matches made or in agitation. The betting regarding the contest between Gulley and Gregson is five and six to four on Gulley, and even betting that he beats Gregson in less time than he did at Newmarket, and two to one on the first fracture.

A very severe battle was fought near Clifton, on Monday, between two expert bruisers, whose fame has not yet attracted the notice of the town amateurs. The names of the parties were Gore and Maddox, and the battle was for a purse of fifteen guineas. In science it was nearly equal to that which was displayed by young Belcher and Dutch Sam, and the conflict was as sanguinary as the late battle between Gulley and Gregson. After an hour's real fighting, Gore was carried off as the victor, he being unable to walk, and perhaps worse beaten than ever was witnessed in a winner.

MILITARY MOVEMENTS,

THE GUARDS FROM SICILY.

Horsham, Jan. 7.—Yesterday afternoon a division of the 1st Regiment of Foot Guards, consisting of upwards of 400 men, under the command of Lord Frederick Bentinck, Lord Tyrconnel, Colonel Askew, and several other Officers, marched in from Petworth in a most uncomfortable condition, the roads being dreadfully heavy and foul, from the late rains. The Officers and men bore every appearance of fatigue and disorder in their clothes and accoutrements, while smiles of joy seemed to mantle in their faces, on again touching British ground. Sicily has been, for a length of time, the scene of their operations, in and about the neighbourhood of Syracuse. Lord Frederick Bentinck's dress, and particularly his shoes, bore proof to his having literally marched from Portsmouth (the place where the troops disembarked), the latter being nearly worn off his feet, having, with a humanity worthy the imitation of every British soldier, resigned his horse for the accommodation of the weak and fatigued, and the animal quietly bringing up the rear with three little drummer boys on his back. Lords Tyrconnel and F. Bentinck dined with Colonel Bligh at Nutharst Lodge, previous to which, the latter, before he made the slightest alteration in his dress, saw the sick and fatigued attended to, and the men comfortably settled in their quarters. The division marched this morning for Cuckfield, on their way to Deal Barracks. This afternoon four companies more, of the same regiment, marched in for the same route, under the command of Colonels Drummond, Lambert, and Donson.

The force which sailed with Sir Samuel Hood and General Beresford, amounted to 3794 effective men.—It consisted of the 3d Foot, or Buffs, 11,00 men; 11th, 1000; 25th, 600; 63d, 850; to these were added two Companies of Artillery, making 244 men. Fourteen artificers were also attached to them.

The old 25th regiment of infantry, formely called the Edinburgh regiment, and now under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Ainslie, passed through Newcastle, on Tuesday se'nnight, on their way to Edinburgh Castle. This is the regiment formerly called Leven's 25th, in which the story of Le Fevre, a Lieutenant of that regiment, by Sterne, originated.

On Saturday se'nnight, instructions were received by the General Officer commanding in the Cork District, to order the disembarkation of the Infantry Regiments and Artillery, which had arrived in that harbour from Monte Video. The regiments and their strength, according to the return supplied by the transports composing the fleet, were as follow:—Royal Artillery, Col. Setch, 615 men; 5th Foot, Col. Davy, 840; 36th, Col. Burne, 756; 38th, Col. Nugent, 637; 40th, Col. Browne, 867; 45th, Col. Garde, 712 men.

The disembarkation of the troops intended to remain for the present in Ireland, has taken place. The 5th Foot proceeded from Monkstown, where they landed, to Kinsale, and reputated the 2d Battalion of the same Regiment, which arrived here yesterday on its route to Fermoy. The 38th proceeded, to Bandon, and replaced the Second Battalion of the 38th, which marched to Mallow. The 36th and 45th are to duty in this garrison, from which the Louth and Dover gal regiments of Militia marched yesterday morning, the former to Tramp, and the latter to Charleville. We have not heard the destination of the Artillery. The 36th regiment did not arrive here till late last night, having been obliged, in consequence of the difficulty of crossing the ferry from Cove, where they disembarked, to Passage, to march round by Belvelly. The returns of the sick in the fleet from Monte Video, amounted to 817. The whole force, effective and non-effective, which arrived in the transports, was 6994.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

Lord Gardner has struck his flag, and has been succeeded, temporarily, in the command of the Channel Fleet, by Vice-Admiral Sir J. T. Duckworth, K. B.

Lord Nelson's old ship, the Victory, is fitting at Chatham, for Sir Sidney Smith's flag. Sir Charles Cotton, when the weather shall permit, him to reach the Portuguese coast, will remove his flag to the Hibernia. Sir Sidney's present ship.

LOSS OF THE ANSON FRIGATE.

(FARTHER PARTICULARS.)

She sailed from Falmouth on Christmas Eve for her station off the Black Rocks: as one of the look-out frigates of the Channel Fleet. In the violent storms of Monday, blowing about W. to S. W. she stood across the entrance of the Channel towards Scilly, made the Land's End, which they mistook for the Lizard, and bore up, as they thought, for Falmouth. Still doubtful, however, in the evening of Monday, Captain Lydiard stood off again to the S. when a consultation being held, it was once more resolved to bear up for Falmouth. Running eastward and northward, still under the fatal persuasion that the Lizard was on the north-west of them, they did not discover their mistake till the man on the look-out a-head, called out "breakers!" The ship was instantaneously broached to, and the best bower let go, which happily brought her up; but the rapidity with which the cable had veered out, made it impossible to serve it, and it soon parted in the hawse-hole. The sheet-anchor was then let go, which also brought up the ship; but after riding end-on for a short time, this cable parted from the same cause, about eight in the morning, and the ship went plump on shore, upon the ridge of sand which separates the Loe-pool from the bay. Never did the sea run more tremendously high. It broke over the ship's masts, which soon went by the board; the main-mast forming a floating raft from the ship to the shore; and the greater part of those who escaped, passed by this medium. One of the men saved, reports, that Captain Lydiard was near him on the main-mast; but he seemed to have lost the use of his faculties, with horror of the scene, and soon disappeared. At a time when no one appeared on the ship's deck, and it was supposed the work of death had ceased, a Methodist Preacher, venturing his life through the surge, got on board over the wreck of the mizzenmast, to see if any more remained, some brave hearts followed him. They found several persons still below who could not get up; among whom were two women and two children. The worthy Preacher and his party saved the two women, but the children were lost. About two p. m. the ship went to pieces, when a few more men, who, for some crime, had been confined in irons below, emerged from the wreck. One of those was saved. By three o'clock no appearance of the vessel remained.

Our Correspondent at Haverford West has sent us the following melancholy account of the loss of the Antiope Transport, Captain Molleaby, with part of the 90th Regiment on board:—

"We embarked at Portsmouth 16th of December last, and on the 20th set sail with a fair wind for Cork. We had very pleasant weather for two days, but after we had passed Scilly, we were becalmed two days. On Christmas Eve it began to blow very hard, and the gale increased to a hurricane, the sea running such prodigious heights, as to alarm the most experienced sailor on board; and which was made still more dangerous by a fog, so thick, that one end of the vessel could not be discovered from the other; great quantities of water dashing over the deck and rushing down the hatchways, all hands wet to the skin and perishing with cold; our pumps choaked below, our sails and rigging tearing; it was with extreme labour we kept her afloat, by baling the water out with the bucket; the morning's light afforded us the prospect of the Irish shore, but the wind then shifting, prevented us making any harbour there. We passed all that night at the mercy of the winds, and in the morning we saw land about two leagues from us, but dare not approach it; the sea ran so high, that the captain and crew expected every moment to be dashed to pieces, nor did they exactly know where they were; we put about again and experienced the most dreadful sea; thus we were for five days, without change of cloathing, starving with hunger, not being able to serve out provisions, yet this was trifling to what we afterwards experienced—the ship was left to the mercy of the waves—sailors and soldiers fell on their knees to prayers, for deliverance from their dreadful situation: fortunately, however, the vessel was forced into St. Bride's Bay, Pembrokeshire, surrounded by prodigious, and almost inaccessible cliffs—here we were dashed on a rock, which is not easily to be discovered. Our situation here was the most dreadful to be imagined—not a boat could venture to our assistance—hundreds of people were viewing us without possible means of help; our mainmast fell overboard with a dreadful crash, and swept over two poor fellows, who, together with four others that attempted to swim, were drowned before our eyes. We got ashore on the evening of the 29th, without any thing but what was on us; a few of our men have saved their knapsacks. After we had quitted the wreck some hardened wretches got on board and robbed the vessel; the officers lost all their baggage. We are now in Haverford West, in very hospitable and good quarters. In the midst of this shocking scene, a soldier's wife was delivered of a very fine boy, and both are likely to do well."

DREADFUL SHIPWRECK.—Captain Russel, arrived at Salem on the 13th Nov. from Petersburgh, communicates the following distressing account of the loss of the English transport Alexander:—

Oct. 20, lat. 47, lon. 51. W. we fell in with a boat having on board 21 living persons, among whom were a woman and a child, in a most dreadful situation. They sailed from Monte Video on 9th Aug. in the Alexander, Captain Howard, an English transport ship, No. 421, under convoy of the Unicorn and Thetis. There were about 110 persons on board the Alexander; on the 20th Oct. the ship being in a very leaky condition, they were under the necessity of carrying short sail, by which means they lost convoy; and on the 22d the leak so increased, that with both pumps going, and bailing at the hatchways, they could not keep her free. The Captain took a small boat for his preservation, and rowed around the ship several times. Meantime the long-boat was hoisted out, but unfortunately bilged in going over the ship's side: 13 sailors, 15 soldiers, one woman, and a child, however, kept in the boat, and found means to keep her from sinking. They had not got far off, when the ship seemingly blew up, and foundered immediately. They afterwards spoke with the Captain in the small boat, who told them to steer NE. and NE. by N. as that course would carry them near the coast of England, from which he said they were but a short distance. They had only four biscuits in the boat, three gallons of spirits, and one pound of raisins. They had been in the boat six days, during which seven soldiers died for want; two of whom lay dead in the bont when she came alongside. They had cut one man up, and had eaten part of his flesh, some remained in the boat when they saw the ship, but on seeing her they threw it overboard. Captain R. and the Captain of another American ship took the remaining sufferers on board, and carried them to Salem.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

THURSDAY, JAN. 7.

PULLING NOSES.—Henry Sawyer took his trial on a charge of pulling and twisting the nose of Thomas Atkins. From the evidence it appeared, that the prosecutor had made use of very indecorous language to the defendant, which he resented, and told the prosecutor that if he repeated the same again he would wring his nose; and that the prosecutor not regarding the warning, the defendant did twice pull his nose. This happened at a public room in Westminster, where several persons were present.

Many of them were called, who corroborated the foregoing circumstances, and the Counsel for the defendant observing, that as the prosecutor was one of those men, who, coming into a public room with a mouth full of slander, having neglected to soap his nose as a precaution against offended individuals, deserved all the pain and all the anguish which such a circumstance produced, so say nothing of the disgrace attending it.

No evidence being brought forward on the part of the defendant he was found Guilty.

The Court, however, in mild consideration of the provocation altogether, sentenced him to pay a fine of 6s. 8d.

FRIDAY, JAN. 3.

William Soames, Henry Woodford, and William White, alias Conkey Beau, were brought to the bar, and heard by Counsel against their conviction, before the Magistrates at Bow-street, under the Act, the 42d of the King, chap. 78. commonly called the Vagrant Act.

Mr. Knapp, the Counsel for the Prisoners, started a variety of objections with respect to the legality of the conviction. Among other things he argued, that the title of the Act of Parliament had been mis-recited, inasmuch as the actual title of the Act defined the Jurisdiction of the Magistrates to the Justices at the Thames Police Office, &c. whereas the conviction, attempting to recite the title of the Act, stated the words to be "of the Thames Police," &c.

Mr. Gleed answered Mr. Knapp.—The evidence afforded nothing new.

The Chairman observed, that he was clearly of opinion that the Prisoners came within the meaning of the Act; but then, as to the trumpery objection they of instead of at, he had some doubts, and should reserve his decision until the adjourned day of the Sessions.

The Prisoners were then taken back to prison.

In the Appeal Hubert v. the Coal Meters, the conviction was affirmed.

SATURDAY, JAN. 9.

John Richardson, James Baldwin, John Finchley, and William Read, who had been convicted at Bow-street, as rogues and vagabonds, were brought up to receive farther sentence.

The defendants, who were dressed as sailors, had been in the habit of imposing on the credulity of the public, and extorting money, by pretending to have received bodily infirmities in his Majesty's service at sea. Their irregular beat was at the west end of the town, where each alternately became cripples and applicators. It was proved that these impostors had never been at sea, and that their insolence was as intolerable as the imposition was abominable. After a suitable lesson from the Chairman, the vagabonds were sentenced to three months hard labour in Bridewell, and the Sessions ended.

POLICE.

PUBLIC OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

On Monday evening, Mr. Read received information that several prize-fighters were assembled to spar, in a large room, in a public-house, in Drury-lane, in consequence of which he dispatched Pearkes, and a numerous party of the patrole, to disperse them. Pearkes stationed the major part of the patrole in the lower part of the house, and proceeded up stairs, accompanied by a few of them; Pearkes found James Belcher upon the stairs, taking half a crown from each of the men who entered to the exhibition; Pearkes was passing him to proceed into the exhibition room, but Belcher stopped him, and said he had not paid half-a-crown. The officer being on Belcher's blind side, who has lost the sight of one by accident, was not known till Pearkes replied, No, Jim, I am too good a judge to pay half-a-crown. Belcher then begged his pardon, and behaved very civil. The officer enquired of Belcher what they were at; he replied that his brother Tom, Crib, and several others, were sparring for the benefit of his brother. Pearkes then told him he had orders from the Magistrates to stop the sport, and proceeded into the room, where he found about two hundred persons assembled to see the sparring, who immediately obeyed his order to disperse. In fact the officers very seldom have any trouble with pugilists or old thieves; it is in general enough for them to be told, they are wanted.

PUBLIC OFFICE, MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

On Thursday a woman, of the name of Martha Davis, was charged with violently assaulting Charles Tettwell, a youth fifteen years of age, dragging him into a loathsome dark room, and there, with menaces and violence, robbing him. —The youth is servant to Mr. Lewis, of Covent-Garden Theatre, of whom his master spoke in the highest praise. He stated in evidence, that he had been sent with several messages, on Wednesday evening, to different parts of the town, and on his return from the last place, he had called in the vicinity of Bedford-square; he was returning home through Dyot-street, St. Giles's, when he perceived the prisoner standing at the door of a wretched habitation, who seized him by the arm, and dragged him through a passage into a dark room, where there was another wretched female. Terrified at the sudden deprivation of liberty, the youth attempted to excite alarm, when the prisoner knocked him down, and, with horrid imprecations, threatened him with instant death, if he persisted in making any resistance. The boy was partly stripped; his hat, which had on it a silver band, was taken off by the prisoner, and concealed under a bedstead, and she also, together with her associate, took from his pocket half-a-crown, which was all the money he had. The door of the room was at length thrown open, and the youth rushed with his hat, which he had taken from under the bedstead; but on the prisoner perceiving that he had got his hat, she followed him, and, assisted by a third person, took it from him: and the man who thus assisted, took the youth up in his arms, threatening to take him to the watch-house. The boy continued to resist, and some watchmen interfered, when the man escaped, but fortunately the prisoner was secured. She was fully committed for trial, and the parties were bound over to prosecute.

ACCIDENTS, &c.

A MANIAC.—On Monday afternoon, a man of a respectable appearance obtained an interview with the Honourable Mr. Villiers, at his residence in Cranbourn Lodge, in Windsor Park, and applied to him for his interference, to procure him an audience of the King, stating, that he had several plans to lay before his Majesty, and to expose to him a number of abuses and corruptions that were committed in Woolwich Warren; and likewise to lay before his Majesty some personal grievances. Mr. Villiers soon discovered that he was deranged, and in consequence agreed with all he had said, promised to get him introduced to the King, who, he had no doubt, would attend to all he said, and would give him a letter to a gentleman at Windsor, who would settle his business. He accordingly wrote a letter to Mr. Dowsett, one of the resident Police Officers, at Windsor, describing the conduct of the man, and his opinion of him; the man took the letter to Mr. Dowsett, who informed Generals Fitzroy and Manningham, his Majesty's Equerries, who directed him to take care of the man at the inn, during Monday night, and to bring him to London on Tuesday morning. —Mr. Dowsett accordingly made preparations for setting off with the man on Tuesday morning, but when the time arrived, he discovered that the man had neither shirt or stockings to wear, having contrived to send them to be washed without his knowledge, which prevented them from leaving Windsor till the afternoon. The man travelled very quietly with Mr. Dowsett, he having told him he was taking him, by the command of the King, to Magistrates and others, who would attend to every thing he had to say. He at length confessed that he broke out of a private mad-house on Bethnal Green, which he thought was no harm, as they had ill-treated him very much, and if it was any sin he was very sorry for it. When they arrived in London, Mr. Dowsett took him to the Brown Bear public house, and gave him into the care of two men, when he was provided with some refreshment and a bed, and Mr. Dowsett went to Mr. Read, to inform him of the directions he had received from his Majesty's Equerries. Early on Wednesday morning, Mr. Read dispatched R. Limberick to the mad-house, on Bethnal Green, to make inquiries respecting the description the man had giving of himself, when he found it correct, and one of the Keepers set off with Limberick to the Brown Bear public-house, Bow-street, and took the man back with him, secured in a straight waistcoat. During his confinement in a room in the Brown Bear public-house, on Wednesday morning, he broke open the room door, and was fighting his way out of the cage against two men, and would have made his escape, had not Dowsett come up to their assistance, who was obliged to use great violence, in order to secure him.

A few days ago, as a young lady, about 16 years of age, the daughter of Mr. White, of Market-street, St. James's, was reading in the drawing-room, her clothes caught fire, and she was so much burnt that she expired on Sunday. The same evening was buried, the daughter of a gentleman of Vine-street, Piccadilly, who was burnt to death by a similar accident.

CORONER'S INQUEST.

An Inquisition was taken, yesterday, at Barrow's field, on the New Canal, on the body of a man of the name of Knight, who was drowned on Thursday, whilst escaping from some pursuers, when detected in an illegal act. The deceased, who was a net-maker in Islington, and who has left a family of nine children, went to the private water of a gentleman of the name of James, which had, it appeared, been often robbed of fish, and whilst in the act of taken in a flue net, stocked with carp fish, he was surprised by two persons on the watch, from whom he fled by swimming to the opposite side of the water. After having done so, and being still pursued, he made a hasty retreat over what is called a ware, (the head of a water fall), when one of the stones gave way, and he fell into the water, down a precipice of 15 feet, and he was drowned before he could be got out.—Accidental Death.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THREE.

THE EMPIRE OF THE WEST.

There are few subjects more interesting either to the present generation or to posterity, than the nature and probable stability of that empire which Bonaparte is labouring to consolidate. Should it acquire any degree of permanency, it will nearly reduce Europe from a number of independent states to one vast dominion; should it quickly fall to pieces, after the arm which now holds it together is withdrawn, its ruin must give rise to new confusion, to new wars, of which it is difficult to foresee the termination. At this moment, when further circumstances have occurred to develope the plan of this empire, and the means employed to establish it, some examination of the subject cannot be uninteresting to the public.

No sooner had Bonaparte confirmed his dominion in France, and perceived, from the successive defeats of the Austrians, that he had little to apprehend from the opposition of the surrounding nations, than he conceived the magnificent project of forming an empire which no power in Europe could presume to oppose, and which might avoid the defects that had precipitated the dissolution of so many great dominions. Convinced, either by his own lights, or by those of his sagacious counsellor Talleyrand, that, by presenting a more extensive frontier to the enemy, a great enlargement of territory serves rather to weaken than to strengthen an empire; that its resources must be speedily exhausted by the progress necessary for its defence; and its government embarrassed even by the care of its too numerous internal relations: he formed a new plan for extending his dominions, and yet rendering this extension a source rather of strength than weakness.

By this plan, which was announced in the official journal, France was to comprehend all that compact and fertile territory, which is separated from other countries by the Rhine, the Alps, and the Pyrenees. All the other conquests of Bonaparte were to be divided into small dependent kingdoms, which should look up to France as their guardian, assist her with troops and money in every emergency, and form an extensive barrier between her and the enemy. From this plan, if it could be carried into execution, great benefits were to be expected. France, instead of being more exposed by the extension of her territory, would be rendered far more secure. Her own immediate frontier would be provided with far better natural defences, and would even be more contracted than before: all contact, and consequently many occasions of quarrel with great neighbouring powers, would be cut off by means of her intermediate dependent kingdoms; and as each of these would retain its own supreme judicial and legislative power, the centre of government would not be embarrassed by a multiplicity of subordinate business.

This model of empire resembles several that have existed, and yet in some respects perfectly new. The dependent kingdoms bear, in their rights and burdens, a strong analogy to the allies of Rome; only the latter were by no means so systematically arranged, being neither designed as a frontier, nor useful in any other way, than by furnishing their contingents. An analogy might also be traced between this new empire of the West, and the Germanic constitution; but the differences between them are [illegible]. The princes of the German empire were a number of independent sovereigns, the greatest of whom elected a new chief or emperor, when a vacancy occurred. It was their policy at first to raise to the Imperial throne, one of the least powerful princes, to prevent any dangerous encroachments; and to this circumstance the Austrian family first owed its elevation, though fortunate incidents afterwards enabled it to acquire an extension of territory, which gave it a complete ascendant over the other associated powers. The constitution of Bonaparte's empire is fundamentally different. The sovereign of France is entirely independent of his subordinate allies, while they are, in many respects, dependent upon him: his power is so superior, that they have only the power of aiding but not of injuring him.

In the execution of this plan, Bonaparte has made a progress quite beyond the calculation of politicians. The miserable weakness of the old European governments was not perceived, till they were assailed by an enemy who had the resolution to despise all dangers but real ones; and as the people looked on their change of masters with indifference, Bonaparte found that when he had dissipated an army of mercenaries, he had conquered a kingdom. In the course of two campaigns, he was enabled to carry his plan into effect, perhaps as far as he wished, on the most exposed frontiers of France. With the exception of the hereditary dominions of the House of Austria, the whole of Germany has been parcelled out into dependent allies of France; and in this view, her frontier may be considered as terminating with the Duchy of Warsaw. Italy is parcelled out in a similar manner; and the operations are at present going forward, which will probably convert Spain and Portugal into similar dependencies.

But the most important subject for us to consider is the probable stability of this new empire. The devices of Bonaparte to render his establishment permanent, discover both ingenuity and a knowledge of human nature; though they are not without defects which may ultimately baffle all his sagacity. One circumstance to which he seems principally to trust, is the near equality in size and strength of dominion, which he has established among his subordinate princes. None of them is so superior in these respects, as not to be deterred, by the least angry intimation of France, from making war upon any of the rest. The vast predominance of France can always enable her to quell their mutual animosities, to enforce the payment of their contingencies as subordinate allies, and to prevent any innovations on the established order by intermarriage, or any other cause. This same equality of size renders it not less the direct interest of the dependent powers than of France, to maintain the confederacy unbroken. It is to the preponderancy of the sovereign state, that every one of the inferior allies must look for protection against the ambition of its co-ordinate powers, or the irruptions of external nations.

Bonaparte appears also to have not a little calculated upon the ties of affection and gratitude which he has established between himself and his dependent states. Of those ancient German princes whom he has confirmed in their dominions, there is not one which has not great obligations to him beyond that of forbearance. The Elector of Bavaria, has been rescued from the dreaded jaws of the House of Austria, has received a large accession of territory, and has been elevated from an electoral to a royal title: All these advantages he owes to Bonaparte and France, and by their protection must continue to hold them. The kings of Wirtemberg, of Baden, of Saxony, are all in a similar situation, and are equally bound to the French empire by the ties of gratitude and interest. The far greater portion of his subordinate kingdoms, Bonaparte has divided among his own brothers, and the near relatives of his family, thus adding the ties of blood to all other bonds of connection, in the hopes that the House of Napoleon will not forget their common origin, or cease to reverence the intentions of their founder.

In addition to these precautions he has adopted another, which shews a still deeper political sagacity, and a mind capable of overlooking inferior considerations in pursuit of its grand ultimate objects. Several possessors of great empires have, at their deaths, apportioned their territories among their principal followers, and left in legacies what they could no longer retain to themselves. The conduct of Bonaparte is very different. He has formed a plan of empire in which his great usurpations and conquests are not to be confined to the grasp of one overgrown monarch, but to be divided among many for the security of the whole. Instead of retaining all these possessions in his own hands during his life, and parcelling them out only in his last will, as a man of impolitic ambition would have done, he has had the magnanimity and wisdom to distribute them during his lifetime, and while he may still look forward to many days of health and vigour. Even his favourite kingdom of Italy he has lately disjoined from the central Government of France, and formally consigned it to his step-son, Eugene Beauharnois.

The increased chance of stability which his new empire derives from this mode of proceeding, is very great. It prevents all contests among his followers, with regard to their shares in the distribution: it prevents the successor to the metropolitan government of France from retaining the dependencies in his own hands, which he might well do under various pretexts, were they to be given away only in consequence of the provisions of a will: it enables the subordinate princes to get acquainted with the functions of government, the dispositions, and the interests of the country committed to their charge, and by this means consolidates their power. It accustoms them to perform with exactness, all the stipulations attendant on their connection with France, and thus consolidates the whole empire: in short, it obviates the chance of any confusion on the death of Bonaparte, since every thing will have already been established in the order in which it is destined to continue.

In addition to this very politic measure, Bonaparte has adopted another, which may ultimately prove not less efficacious:—the extension of the Napoleon Code over his whole empire. This code may, in general, notwithstanding its defects, be considered as a very great blessing to the people of most of the countries which he has conquered, since they still labour under the miserably unequal and oppressive regulations of feudalism. It is needless to dwell on the vast effects which the same laws, and the same administration of justice have in binding communities together.

Such is the plan of the Empire of the West, and such the means adopted by its founder, to render it permanent. It cannot be questioned that the idea is magnificent, and that more political sagacity is displayed in the provisions, than we can discover in the foundation of any other great empire. Yet, we shall shortly state circumstances in its structure, which seem incompatible with any great degree of permanency.

History presents us with many instances of a cluster of small republics confederating together, and remaining united for a great series of years. The ancient confederations of Greece, the Achean League, the Swiss Cantons, the United States of Holland, the provinces of North America, all afford striking proofs of the possibility of giving permanency to such associations. History affords no such examples of a confederation of arbitrary princes attaining any degree of stability. The Satraps of Persia, though merely officers, were in perpetual rebellion against their sovereign: the same may be said of the governors of provinces in Modern Turkey; and there is not perhaps a single state of Germany that has not as often armed in opposition to the head of the empire as in his behalf.

The reasons of this difference between a coalition of free States and of arbitrary Princes, are very evident. In the Swiss Republic, for example, each of the States had the management of its own internal regulations, its police and judicature; but all the public concerns, which might effect the whole association, such as the questions of war or peace, and the making of laws, were managed by delegates from every State. This representation, called the States General, gave an appearance of one Government to the whole association, and the inhabitants of each State felt their own participation in the Sovereignty. But in a confederacy of absolute Princes, like that of Bonaparte's empire, no such common tie exists. As far as regards his subjects, each Prince is the only ostensible Sovereign; and he in his turn, receives, without any consultation, the mandates of the French Emperor. There is here no representation, no deliberation on common interests; the gloomy arrangements of arbitrary power are substituted for an equal voice and a mutual concern. Succeeding Emperors may have neither the moderation nor the policy of Bonaparte: and the dependent Allies may imagine it more for their safety to unite with the enemies of France for their protection, than to commit themselves to the hands of their own great Despot.

There is another radical defect in the Constitution which Bonaparte has prepared for his Empire. Bred in a camp, and accustomed to the depotic habits of a Commander, he has made no provision for the progress of society, and for those effects which the extension of political knowledge must speedily produce. No share is assigned to the people in legislation; they are entitled by the Napoleon code to no political rights whatever. But in the present age, it is not to be imagined that the people either of France or her dependencies will long submit to this degradation, after the terror of a great conqueror's name is removed. The people now know that they must have freedom and political rights, if they resolve to have them: and the example which Great Britain continually presents before their eyes, of a country so vigorous, wealthy, and powerful, entirely in consequence of the proud rights to which all her inhabitants are entitled, must continually serve to stimulate the feelings of human nature. Of this last circumstance Bonaparte seems aware; and hence, in a late peevish tirade in the Moniteur, it was declared that the world would never be at rest till Great Britain become like other monarchies—in other words, till she was ruled by a despot! He does not perceive that the want of those popular rights which she enjoys is the surest cause of confusion and ruin to the Empire he labours to establish.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. III.

THE MORNING POST.

We have already given our readers some hints of the political character of the Morning Post. It first came into notice by the uncommon industry of its Proprietor, in collecting the little trifling anecdotes and table-talk of our fashionable circles—the surmises of a dashing marriage; the inuendoes of a certain curious but secret arrangement; the dress; the new equipages; the dinners; the routs; the departures and arrivals of every one whose name is known in May-fair, or its extensive precincts. Such pieces of intelligence were extremely interesting and important to those for whom they were designed; and its merits, therefore, procured the Morning Post an extensive and fashionable circulation.

For many years that Paper distinguished itself as a most resolute champion of the Opposition, and of the friends of the People; for the Editor and Proprietor was a very noted associate of the Corresponding Club. Even the Morning Chronicle was occasionally eclipsed by the popular fulminations of this aspiring rival; and Fox, Sheridan, Grey, &c. were be-praised as unmercifully as their antagonists were blackguarded. In this strain the Morning Post continued till Mr. Pitt and his friends retired from power; and poor Mr. Addington, at the commencement of his Administration, was received by a shower of invectives, epigrams, burlesques, and the other noxious contents of a newspaper magazine. But the period was come when the Editor of the Morning Post was to be visited with a new light. One morning, to the utter amazement of all the Quidnuncs, a Manifesto appeared in that Paper, directly recanting the political tenets which it had till then so zealously maintained; and assuming for its new creed every position that could be agreeable to the existing Administration!

From that period, The Morning Post has continued the strenuous panegyrist of the party which had before been loaded with its abuse. When Pitt returned to power, at the head of a feeble and ill-assorted administration, his arrangements had still the loud acclamations of this most obsequious paper, while the talents and principles of Mr. Fox, its former idol, were represented, the one as useless, the other as dangerous. The Editor had the sagacity to perceive the unpopularity of the broad-bottomed administration, both at court and with the public; and therefore, like a wise rat, he did not venture to trust himself among the props of so tottering a building. But when the present ministers ascended to power, he again resumed his courtly functions; and now continues to deck, with the most pompous declamations, whatever he imagines will be agreeable to his patrons in power.

The political writings of The Morning Post, which has flatly renounced all its former principles, without even alleging that this was done from conviction, would be of little importance to any one, were it not that it is considered as the organ of ministerial sentiments, as receiving private communications from Government, and as uniformly expressing what Ministers wish to be expressed. These suppositions, which seem not to be ill-founded, give a real importance to its political effusions: every perverted principle which it asserts, every improper declamation which it publishes, are doubly pernicious, and doubly reprehensible, since they come to the public apparently fortified with the sanction of Ministers, and may be considered as tenets which, when occasion offers, will be acted upon. On this account, we shall find it necessary to watch the tergiversations of The Morning Post with a particularly jealous eye; and shall at present expose one of the vilest and most unjustifiable manœuvres of faction, of which it has ever been the tool.

There is nothing which more powerfully excites our indignation, than to see the spirit of faction acquire such an ascendancy over men, as to extinguish, in their minds, every generous feeling of patriotism; as to make them rejoice at the disasters of their country, and even join in the reproaches and invectives of the enemy, provided they can, by this means, bring confusion and reproaches on their political antagonists. Of the excesses of this degraded and pernicious spirit we have seldom seen a more revolting instance, than in the late discussions about our neglect to support our Allies. The present Ministers, anxious, as usual with our political parties, to exalt their own fame on the ruins of their predecessors, were very busy, last Spring, in charging the defeat and destruction of our Allies on the Continent to the negligence of the late Cabinet, in not affording them effectual support. The Emperor Alexander gladly laid hold of the protest thus furnished him, and inserted it with pomp in the front of his hostile declaration. In the answer of our Cabinet to that declaration, the justice of these reproaches was tacitly acknowledged, because to have refuted them would have been to exculpate the former Ministers, a sacrifice of party to patriotism which could not be expected: but care was taken at the same time to introduce a fabulous story respecting great armaments, suddenly created by the extraordinary vigour of our present Ministers. The Morning Post, having got its cue, has continued to rail, in strict unison with Alexander, against the good faith of our country; till at last Bonaparte has chimed in with admirable effect; and we shall now hear Alexander, Bonaparte, and our demi-official journal shewing who shall be most successful in ruining our national reputation for good faith and honour.

It is hard that Britain, who has ever been the dupe of her Allies; who, after repeated experience of their perfidy, has continued to waste her blood and treasure in support of the Continental Powers; who, for this purpose, has impaired her own prosperity, and loaded her people with intolerable burdens—should now be thus reproached not only by the enemy, but also by her own degenerate progeny. Let it not be supposed, that we mean to advocate the cause of the last administration: their apology was sneaking and unmanly beyond all endurance. They only asserted that they had given no formal assurances of aid to our allies, and that consequently no hope of aid from us could reasonably be formed. But such an excuse was only an aggravation of their misconduct: if it was proper to render assistance to our Allies, their fault was doubled in not giving timely assurances that it would be furnished: if it was improper to aid them, this silly and pusillanimous evasion was utterly mean and degrading. The defence of our national honour, against both our internal and external enemies, should, in our opinion, have proceeded upon much loftier grounds: it should have stated, first, that we had no common interest with the King of Prussia, and were in no respect called upon to assist him; secondly, that no diversion in favour of our Allies by land could have had any probability of success; thirdly, that Britain was making greater and more efficacious efforts against France than all her Allies together. If these positions be true, which we shall endeavour to shew in a few words, what are we to think of those Political Declaimers, who unite with our enemies in reviling our conduct on this occasion, with the most foul and false aspersions?

What were our common interests with the Court of Prussia? After one gasconading but ineffectual campaign against France, for which he was well reimbursed by British treasure, the King of Prussia contrived first to trick us out of some further subsidies, and then perfidiously made peace with the enemy. He afterwards saw the miserable ruin of the British and Austrian armies, without making the least effort to aid them; and shewed himself abundantly rejoiced at the triumphs of France, since he was allowed, in the mean time, to seize treacherously on some of the defenceless smaller states, and add them to his dominions. When the Northern Confederacy united against Britain in the hour of her distress, the King of Prussia did not fail to be among the conspirators for her humiliation. Yet this same champion, after having betrayed Austria into a league by his promises of assistance, left her to be ruined at the battle of Austerlitz, while his Ambassadors were perfidiously negotiating in the enemy's camp! But this gallant Monarch was at length roused to action: he boldly stood forth with his own forces to oppose the Conqueror of the Continent. And what incited him to this heroic resolution? Not the cause of Britain; not the deliverance of Europe:—No; he had treacherously seized a defenceless portion of the territory of Britain; of that Ally to whom Prussia owed not only her greatness but her very existence; and pleased with the booty of which he had so perfidiously plundered her, stood forward to maintain his right to it by arms. And this is the Prince, and this the occasion, in behalf of which Britain should have hastened to expend her blood and treasures! Had the King of Prussia been successful, what would have been the result? Hanover would have been finally annexed to the Prussian dominions; and Britain, had she assisted him, would have contributed to plunder herself in order to prosper his treachery. Can any but a fool or a knave maintain that we ought, in such circumstances, to have assisted Prussia?

We have also said that such assistance would have been ineffectual. No one, we believe, has ever looked upon the opposition of the Prussian King to France as any other than an act of the most outrageous presumption and madness: and no one examined the details of the campaign in which Bonaparte was checked, or considered the character of Alexander, but was convinced that the weather and not the Russians were the conquerors, and that, on any reverse of fortune, the feeble Alexander would throw himself upon the mercy of the enemy. The landing of twenty or thirty thousand British troops, to co-operate with allies, who had no cordial feelings towards us, and to combat the vastly superior armaments of Bonaparte, could only have added to the miserable catalogue of disasters which our continental expeditions have brought upon this nation.

But our highest and most unanswerable reply to Alexander, Bonaparte, and The Morning Post is, that Britain was making greater and more efficacious efforts against the common enemy, than all her allies together. Britain was, at the time alluded to, putting forth all her strength, besieging and harrassing France with a naval armament of immense expence, carrying on board at least a hundred and fifty thousand men; she had deprived the enemy of his large foreign possessions; she had almost entirely annihilated his commerce; and had driven his navy from the seas; she had cut off from him the most fertile sources of revenue; and had thwarted Bonaparte in the most favourite objects of his ambition—ships, commerce, and colonies. What proportion do the efforts of Prussia or Russia bear to these amazing exertions, either in expence, in magnitude, or in efficacy? And Britain is reproached for not co-operating with her allies! What will The Morning Post say to these facts, which place its unpatriotic statements in the basest light?

FRANCE.

PARIS, DEC. 26.—The grand decorations of the Legion of Honour, destined for the Emperor Francis I. for the Archduke Charles, the Archduke John, and Count Urbna, arrived at Vienna on the 7th ultimo.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, DEC. 2.—Our Court Gazette contains the following article from Turkey:—The tranquillity which prevailed on the frontiers of Bosnia, has again been disturbed. About the end of September the cordon of Turkish troops, formed on the banks of the Dwina and Buzawa, was reinforced with 9000 men, by which means its strength was increased to 25,000 men. The Servians were no sooner informed of this circumstance than they crossed the Buzawa, and gave battle to the Turks on the 15th October, in which the latter were completely routed. So far from the Russians making the least preparations for evacuating Moldavia and Wallachia, pursuant to the armistice, another Russian corps is on its march thither from Mohilow, under the command of Major-General Prince Aprexin, who is already arrived in Bucharest, the head-quarters of the General in Chief, Prince Prosorowsky. The Russian advanced posts have been lately considerably reinforced, and all correspondence and commercial intercourse with Turkey, are strictly prohibited.

BANKS OF THE MAINE, DEC. 5.—Some public Journals state, that the report has been generally circulated for some days past, that a part of the Conscription of 1809 will be immediately raised by anticipation. We are assured that similar to the last year, a Senatus Consultum will be issued, by which 120,000 youths, of this class, will be placed at the disposal of Government; namely, a part for the present army, and a part or the reserve. Although peace is established on the Continent, nevertheless, the great extent of country, occupied by the French armies, requires a reinforcement of fresh troops.—L'Abeille du Nord.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, DEC. 26.—Letters from Cronstadt state, that 16 sail of the line, and 125 gun-boats, are lying in the port of that city.

The French army in Dalmatia seems destined for very important operations. Some are of opinion, that it is to occupy [illegible] but according to others, it is to march through Constantinople and Egypt to Bengal.—Letters from Hanover inform us, that the Kingdom of Westphalia is to be divided into the following Departments:

1st. The Department of Fulda, including Lower Hesse and Padderborn. 2d. The Department of the Weser, containing Minden, Ravensberg, &c. 3d. The Department of the Verre, comprising Upper Hesse, &c. 4th. The Department of the Seine, including Gottingen, &c. 5th. The Harg-Department, composed of the Principality of Grubenhagen and the Upper Harz. 6th. The Upper Department, containing Hildesheim, Elze, Schoningen, Goslar, and several other towns and districts, which formerly belonged to the Duchy of Brunswick. 7th. The Saulda Department, including the Principalities of Halberstadt and Blackenburg, &c.; and 8th. The Department of Eichsfield, containing the Principalities of Eichsfield, &c. &c.

LOWER SAXONY.

HAMBURGH, DEC. 18.—The following changes in the Ministry and Corps Diplomatic of Holland, were announced in the Royal Gazette of the 19th December:—

Mr. Hodgendorp leaves the War Department, and is appointed Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of Vienna.—Mr. Janssens, President of the War Section, succeeds as War Minister. Mr. Verhuell quits the Ministry of the Marine, for the place of Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Petersburgh. He is replaced by Mr. Vander Kesset, who ceases to be Minister of the Colonies and Commerce. He is succeeded in that Department by Mr. Cambier, late Minister of Justice, who in that capacity is succeeded by Mr. Van Maanen. Mr. De Caulincourt, Grand Ecuyer of the King, is appointed Minister Plenipotentiary and Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Naples.

AMERICA.

CONGRESS.—HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

NON IMPORTATION ACT.

WASHINGTON, DEC. 8.—Mr. Newton said, it would be recollected by the House, that on Monday next, the 14th, the law prohibiting the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandize, would go into operation; and it was also known, that this law, in its present state, was extremely defective. For the purpose of preventing the perplexities which might arise from these defects, he offered the following Resolution:—

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the Act, bearing date the 18th day of April, 1807, prohibiting the importation of certain goods, wares, and merchandize; with the power to report by Bill or otherwise. He said, it was the duty of all Governments to prevent litigation; and to amend any of their laws which were found to give rise to it.

The Resolution was agreed to—Ayes, 84.

DEC. 11.—The debate on the passage of the Bill from the Senate, appropriating a sum of money for providing an additional number of gun-boats, was resulted and continued until near three o'clock. The question on its passage was then taken, and carried, Ayes, 112—Noes, 18.

WEST INDIES.

Jamaica, Kingston, Nov. 14.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY, NOV. 4.

In a Committee on the State of the Island the following Resolutions were agreed to:—

I. That, on a constitutional application to his Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, this House did, in the last Session, grant a bounty on the importation of fish from the British Colonies in North America, in British vessels, freely and voluntarily, to evince our anxiety to promote the navigation of the Empire, and give a decided preference in our markets to those commodities which could be furnished by any part of his Majesty's dominions.

II. That the attempt of his Majesty's Ministers to compel this House to grant a bounty on fish of certain descriptions, by prohibiting the importation of fish in ships or vessels belonging to the subjects of any State in amity with his Majesty, whilst the necessity of such an intercourse is recognized, is oppressive and unconstitutional; and nothing but this necessity, with the protection and care which we owe to our slaves, whose comforts and lives are wantonly hazarded by this regulation, could induce the House to continue the bounty, which was cheerfully granted when applied for in a constitutional manner.

III. That it is expedient to recommend to the House to grant a bounty on the importation of fish from the British Colonies in North America, in British vessels, for twelve months, and after the same rate, and under the same regulations, by the existing law allowed and established.

On the motion that the House do agree to the report, it was, on debate, resolved in the affirmative, a division taking place on the last resolution.

STATE PAPERS, &c.

RUSSIA.—UKASE.

St. Petersburgh, Nov. 8, (19), 1807.

By our Ukase of the 28th Oct. last, to the Minister of Commerce, Count N. Raumiantzoff, regarding the laying on an embargo upon the English property in Russia, we ordered liquidation commissions to be formed here, at Riga, and at Archangel, under the controul of the College of Commerce.

On the representation of the Minister, that the liquidation Comptoirs appointed in 1800, were, by their mode of conducting business of this nature perfectly adequate to the object in view, We now order that liquidation commissions be at present appointed, in every respect, strictly according to the principles and spirit of the Ukase given the 25th of Nov. 1800, upon a report of the College of Commerce, in consequence of the embargo laid that year on the property of the English, with this only alteration, that the fixed number of Russian merchants to be chosen for the liquidation commission of this plan, be not otherwise appointed than with the confirmation of the Minister, and in the other towns with the confirmation of the Chief Authorities contiguous thereto.

The said Commissions are to take cognizance of all the goods and property of the English which were embargoed by our Ukase of the 28th (ult.) Oct. 1807; and this sequestration is to be extended to all their capital monies and bills, excepting their monies placed in our Banks, which, by the laws, are in no case to be touched. The Councillor of State, and Member of the College of Commerce, Baikoff, is to preside in the Commission here.

Sent to the Senate the 8th of November, 1807, under His Imperial Majesty's Sign Manual.

Countersigned by Count Nicolay Raumiantzoff.—Published by the Senate the 11th of November, 1807.

NEW KINGDOM OF WESTPHALIA.

PROCLAMATION.

Cassel, Dec. 17, 1807.

We Jerome Napoleon, by the grace of God and the Constitution, King of Westphalia, French Prince, &c. &c. to our good and faithful Subjects, and Inhabitants of our kingdom of Westphalia, greeting:—

Westphalians!—Divine Providence has pointed this æra in order to re-unite your scattered provinces under one august institution, together with neighbouring families, though strangers to each other.

I come to occupy this Throne, prepared by victory, raised by the assent of the greatest powers of Europe, founded on a title no less sacred, by your real interests.

Too long has your country suffered from the pretensions of families and the intrigues of Cabinets; you were exposed to all the calamities of wars, and you were excluded from all the benefits of peace. Some of your towns only reaped the barren honour of annexing their names to treaties, in which nothing was overlooked but the well-being of the people who inhabited them.

How widely different are the results of the wars stirred up against the august head of my House! It is for nations that Napoleon has conquered; and each of the Treaties he has concluded, is a step farther towards the end proposed by his mighty genius, of giving to entire nations a political existence, governments and laws dictated by wisdom, the establishment to each of them of a country, and the dereliction hereafter of none in that deplorable nullity, in which they were equally unable either to steer clear of war, and avail themselves of peace.

Westphalians!—Such was the issue of the battles of Marengo, of Austerlitz, of Jena; such now is for you the result of the memorable Treaty of Tilsit. On that day you obtained the first of blessings, a country—Far be now removed from your recollection those scattered dominations, the last result of the feudal system, which prepared a master for each city—these different interests are now to form but one—your master now is the law—your protector, the Monarch, who is to cause it to be respected; henceforth you shall have no other.

Westphalians, you have got a Constitution adapted to your manners and to your interests: it is the fruit of the meditations of a great man, and of the experience of a great nation: its principles are in unison with the present state of the civilization of Europe, and are big with projects of improvement, which will far overbalance the sacrifices which this new order of things may impose upon some of you. You must, therefore, attach yourselves to it with confidence, since upon it, rests your liberty and your prosperity.

In ascending the Throne, I contracted the obligation of making you happy, and I will be faithful to it. The equality of the modes of religion shall be maintained, property assured and guaranteed. Thus shall there be established between me and my people an alliance of wishes and interests, that shall never change. Westphalians, your Sovereign henceforward relies on your fidelity and inviolable attachment.

Given at our Royal Palace of Cassel, the 15th December, 1807, and the first of our reign, (Signed) JEROME NAPOLEON.

PORTUGAL.—ARMY OF ESTRAMADURA.

GENERAL ORDERS OF THE 1ST DECEMBER.

Ferocity is not valour, it is always the proof of barbarism and generally of cowardice. The greatest honour the King can do one of his subjects, is to place arms in his hands; they are consecrated to the preserving of his Kingdom, the upholding of Religion and the Laws, the defence of his People, and the protection of his Friends. While the Portuguese Government gives us their friendship, and receives us into their territories, it would be unworthy the Spanish character, and wanting in every law to make enemies of those we come to protect. War has its rights and laws, all which are framed by the Chiefs of Governments. We, who are subjects, are not authorised to infringe on them, except by the voice of our Chiefs—it would otherwise be assassination—and the punishment of the coward who would so far disgrace humanity, belongs to universal justice. Entrusted with an important Expedition, we will go and fulfil the wishes of our Sovereign. Proud of the confidence with which he honours us, we will not disappoint him. Nor will we consent that there remains amongst us any who would deprive us of that honour, and disgrace the good name of the whole army. No; I will not suffer it. Any insult by word or deed, or any provocation to renew old and disgraceful prejudices, shall be severely punished, not only by the due course of law, but as circumstances demand it, by immediate infliction on the spot—such conduct being disgraceful, disobedient to our Sovereign, and dishonourable to the Spanish name.

The Soldier shall be provided for. In the event of wanting provisions, all will know how to suffer momentary privations, in exchange for a good name, and the honour of completing a great object. The Chiefs of Division of my army are known to me. With all of you, Soldiers, I am personally acquainted—you have not come with me from Andalusia, to disobey the King and dishonour the Nation.

Head Quarters at Badajos, 30th Nov. 1807.

PROCLAMATION.

INHABITANTS OF LISBON,

My army is about entering your walls; it was coming for the purpose of rescuing your ports and your Prince from the influence of England.

But this Prince, so respectable by his virtue, has allowed himself to be hurried away by the counsels of some wicked men who surrounded him, and he is gone to fling himself into the arms of his enemies. He has been made to feel apprehensive for his personal safety, his subjects have been counted for nothing, and his interests sacrificed to the base cowardice of some Courtiers.

Inhabitants of Lisbon, remain quiet within your houses; fear neither me nor my army; we are formidable only to the enemy and to the wicked. The great Napoleon, my master, sends me to protect you.

(Signed) JUNOT.

SCOTLAND.

GLASGOW MEETING.—In consequence of an intimation by the Lord Provost, a numerous meeting [illegible] and manufacturers of Glasgow, assembled on the 7th inst. to decide on an address to his Majesty, expressing their zeal to support the measures of government at this important crisis. The following resolution was moved and unanimously carried;

"Resolved—That it will be proper in this meeting, at this important and momentous crisis, when the unbounded ambition of our enemy calls forth all the energies of his government and of his people, to address his Majesty, and to assure him of our firm determination to support, at all times, and by every means in our power, his just rights, and the interests of the British Empire. And to state to him, at the same time, that, although we must be supposed to feel the effects of his adversary's exertions against the commerce and manufactures of the country, yet we have no interests but what are identified with the dignity of his crown, and the independence of these kingdoms; and further, that we are fully satisfied it is only by persevering in prompt, wise, and vigorous measures, that we are to hope for the attainment of our wishes, a safe, honourable, and lasting peace."

An address, drawn up, agreeably to the tenor of this resolution, was agreed to with equal unanimity, and transmitted to the Secretary for the Home Department, to be presented to his Majesty.

This address, though so general in its terms, that all the nation might subscribe it, has given great joy to our ministerial papers, who have eagerly contrasted it with the meetings of the Yorkshire weavers, held for the purpose of petitioning for peace. On the other hand, it has been greatly ridiculed by the opposition papers, who tell some curious stories about the manner in which it was procured, and the circumstances which prevented its terms from being made more decisively painted in favour of the present ministers. These latter statements, however, rest merely on anonymous letters, and therefore deserve no credit.

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, JAN. 9.—The Protestant Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Freeholders of the County of Tipperary, have signed and published a Resolution, of which the following is an extract:—

"Actuated at all times by cordial good-will towards our Catholic Countrymen, and impressed by the wisdom and necessity of uniting all classes in the common defence at this crisis, we do publicly and unequivocally declare that we feel no repugnance whatsoever to the measure of imparting to the Catholics of these realms an equal and full enjoyment of all the civil and military privileges, franchises, and advantages of our happy Constitution, upon equal terms with their fellow-subjects, of what religious persuasion soever, and that we see no necessity or good cause for prolonging the restraints and disabilities which the Catholics suffer under the existing Penal Laws."

The above Declaration is signed by—

NORWICH, JAN. 13.—At the Norfolk Agricultural Meeting held in this city on Friday last, in addition to the usual premiums, one of 20l. was offered to the farmer who should, by feeding 20 cart horses in the cheapest manner, ascertain the smallest quantity of food necessary to maintain them in good working order, and premiums of smaller value were likewise voted in proportion to the number of horses on which the experiment was made. A fifth part of the money in addition was also voted to the servants attending them, as an encouragement to aid in the trial. Premiums were also offered to the consideration of the Society, to be given to cottagers tilling any garden, or other ground, who should render it the most profitable, and thus be enabled to maintain their families at less expence, and be less liable to want relief of their parish.

Some days ago a shocking affair occurred at the Old Anti Mill, near Hull:—A boy about 12 years of age, deaf and dumb, son to Mr. Bailey, the miller, had by some accident suffered his hand to get entangled between the cogs, in consequence of which, his arm was drawn in among the works. In this dreadful situation he is supposed to have remained near half an hour, when, owing to the friction occasioned by this accident, and the lightness of the winds, the mill stopped. On the miller running up to the height of eight stories to ascertain the cause, the poor boy was found in a shocking condition, and was extricated as soon as possible, having two or three ribs, his collar bone, and both the bones of one arm fractured, and the arm dreadfully lacerated in several places.—Surgical assistance was immediately procured, and the arm amputated below the elbow.

MANIFESTO OF THE MONITEUR.

The most important article of this week is a Commentary, in the Moniteur, upon the Answer of our Ministers to the Russian Declaration. It is intended as a complete defence of the Russian Government, and is, in some instances at least, very ingenious and plausible. With the usual prolixity of Frenchmen, it is extended to an intolerable length; and we shall, therefore, endeavour to present our readers with such a satisfactory abridgement of it, as may gratify their curiosity, without fatiguing their patience.

The first circumstance alluded to, is the affirmation of our Ministers that they had information of the secret engagements at Tilsit, which justified their attack upon Copenhagen. To this the Moniteur replies, by declaring, from authority, that no secret engagement was ever formed at Tilsit, which in any way concerned England. "Why, it is added, "does not the Cabinet of London make known these secret engagements which are contrary to the interests of England, if it be acquainted with them? Its Manifesto in that case would be unnecessary, and the mere communication of these Secret Articles would justify its conduct in the eyes of Europe, and redouble the zeal and energy of every English citizen;"—As the meeting of Parliament is so near, we have no doubt that such malignant insinuations will be effectually silenced, by the actual production of these documents in the constitutional channel. It is ungenerous, and even criminal, to allege that our Ministers are so destitute of common sense, as to have compromised their own honour and that of the nation, by asserting, and acting upon the assertion, that they had proof of a conspiracy against Britain, while no such proofs were really in existence. We trust that we shall soon be presented with the means of retaliating these insults upon the Moniteur.

But the Manifesto goes on to assert, that our Ministers not only had no proofs of any secret hostile engagements at Tilsit, but that they did not themselves believe such engagements existed. The following is the very curious reasoning employed on this occasion:—

"If, in fact, the Cabinet of London did believe in the existence of such engagements between France and Russia, why did it not, at the very instant that it made that discovery which induced it to attack Copenhagen, assail the Russian squadron in the Mediterranean, instead of permitting it to clear the Straits of Gibraltar? Why did three Russian vessels, which were coming from the North Sea, pass through the English squadron which was blockading Copenhagen? Why, if secret stipulations had been made at Tilsit to the disadvantage of England, did the Cabinet of London have recourse to the mediation of Russia, in order to conciliate its differences with Denmark? Let these Ministers be at least consistent with themselves, and let them not assert, a few pages lower, these very words—"But until the Russian Declaration was published (that is, until November,) his Majesty had no reason to suspect that any opinions which the Emperor of Russia might entertain of the transactions at Copenhagen, could be such as to preclude his Imperial Majesty from undertaking, at the request of Great Britain, that same office of Mediator." Thus the English have recourse to the mediation of Russia, in order to come to an arrangement with Denmark, more than three months after the Treaty of Tilsit; and they pretend, as we shall see still farther down, that they undertook the expedition against Denmark, only to 'oppose the execution of the arrangements at Tilsit, and to defeat one of the objects of those arrangements.' They seized Danish vessels, on account of arrangements which the Emperor of Russia had made at Tilsit: they permitted the vessels of the Emperor of Russia to pass freely; they were at peace with Russia, for they had recourse to her mediation; it is hence not true that they now believe in the existence of those arrangements. How is this unhappy nation fallen? by what miserable councils are her affairs directed! Her Ministers, in framing a Manifesto of a few pages, have not good sense and reflection enough to avoid contradictions thus gross!"

The lamentations of our Ministers over the degraded state into which ALEXANDER has brought himself, and the hopes they express that he would sooner have returned to a conduct more consistent with his dignity, are attempted to be turned into ridicule. We are told, that to have broken a treaty as soon as it was made, would have been a singular way to retrieve his honour; and perfectly similar to the conduct of Britain himself, who makes treaties merely for the occasion, and maintains them only as long as suits her convenience!

When our Ministers state the moderate manner in which they applied to the EMPEROR of RUSSIA, for the communication of the secret articles of the treaty of Tilsit; the Moniteur assures us, that the EMPEROR of RUSSIA flatly denied any such articles existed which at all concerned us, and that we still seemed resolved not to be satisfied unless he would actually forge such articles for us. To this we may answer, that we have as yet no authority, but that of the Monitcur, that the EMPEROR of RUSSIA actually has denied the existence of such articles.

The manner in which the Moniteur evades the unanswerable statements of our Ministers, that the cause of the KING of PRUSSIA was not more that of Britain than of Russia, is a singular display of unblushing sophistry. The war in which Austria was overthrown, and that in which Prussia was conquered, are confounded together: a discussion is then entered into with a view to prove our close connection with Austria, and the very particular claims she had on our assistance; and hence it is concluded that we were under much greater obligations than Russia to support Austria? No—to support Prussia! But the most singular part of this very whimsical piece of argumentation is the conclusion. The writer of the article, finding that he had fairly involved himself in a labyrinth of confusion, begins to rail at the English Government for the very folly into which he has himself fallen. "This confounding of the most recent events," says he, "this ignorance of the occurrences of our own times, is worthy of the present Ministers of England!!!"

A long dissertation follows, in which the Moniteur, after maintaining the charge that we deserted our allies, very ingeniously details the operations for their support, which we ought to have undertaken. This silly tirade, deserves neither repetition nor remark. In the second article of this paper, our readers will find a short statement of our sentiments on this question.

In answer to the assertion of our Ministers, that only one Russian ship has been condemned in our Courts, the Moniteur recounts the oppression of our cruizers in stopping and searching Russian vessels; and asserts, on what authority it does not think fit to tell, that twelve more of the detained ships have been condemned since our declaration of war was published.

The statement of our Ministers, that they had not immediately accepted the mediation of Russia, because she was so intimately connected with our enemies, and would not communicate the secret articles of the treaty of Tilsit, is noticed in the following singular passage, of which every one can judge.

"Sophistry and hypocrisy add to the sentiment of disgust which is felt at reading such absurdities. However horrible the principle of perpetual war may be, it would be less shameful to avow it: there is a sort of greatness in boldly proclaiming crimes. England says, that she has not refused the mediation offered by the Emperor of Russia; and yet the very day that her Note appeared in answer to that offer, her troops entered Copenhagen, declaring, in this manner, war, not only against Russia, but against Austria and the whole of the Continent. Her answer to the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh was read by the light of the conflagration of Copenhagen. And what was that answer? That England wished to know the basis of the negotiation. How wretched a shift, when the question involved such important interests! Lord Yarmouth and Lord Lauderdale knew those bases; let it be asked of them, whether they believed France wished for peace. The most desirable basis was disclosed in the Notes of Russia, since she offered her mediation for a just and honourable peace. England demanded a guarantee, and the Emperor of Russia offered his. Was there on earth a guarantee more powerful and more august? As to the communication of the Secret Articles concerning you, what right had you to ask for them, since none such existed? What was your real intention? To refuse the mediation. You have refused it; and the hand which signed the refusal was then reeking with the blood of the Danes, the dearest and oldest of the Allies of Russia."

The Moniteur asserts, that the KING of PRUSSIA, instead of being abandoned by the Emperor ALEXANDER, owes entirely to the mediation of that Monarch the possession of his Crown, and of that share of territory which has been restored to him. The affirmations, made by our Ministers, of certain barbarities committed in the Prussian territories by the French, are flatly denied; and a challenge given to the accusers to produce their evidence. A contrast is drawn between the conduct of the French and the English towards the places which they conquer; and the former are found to be uniformly the protectors of the vanquished, and the latter as invariably a band of unprincipled pirates! The following very curious piece of mingled reproach, boasting and affected moderation is then introduced:—

"But if it were true that the French have exacted a little from their enemies, why should they not in fact? They have 900,000 troops, and they are ready to make every sacrifice to double their force, if it should be necessary; not that war is their natural trade, and that they do not sensibly feel the sacrifices which they make in withdrawing so many hands from the cultivation of their so fertile soil. In possession of a fine country, they wish to addict themselves to the conquests of commerce and industry; but your tyranny will not suffer them. You have roused a giant, whom, having roused, you continue to irritate incessantly. During fifteen years, your injustice has only tended to add to his energy and power, which your perseverance in your tyranny will still increase. He not only will not lay down his arms, but he will augment his force until he has conquered the liberty of the seas, which is his first sight, and the patrimony of all nations. If the afflicting consequences of war are protracted, if the French troops continue a burthen to the territories which they occupy, you are the cause. All the calamities which oppress Europe, proceed from you alone. These great questions are not to be resolved by diplomatic commonplaces. When you are disposed to make peace, France will be ready to make it. Of this you cannot be ignorant; you well know it. An anecdote generally known may be quoted in support of this assertion: When the Imperial Guard set out for Jena, and it was known that the Emperor was to join the army a few days after, Lord Lauderdale asked M. Champagny, whether, if England made peace, the Emperor Napoleon would consent to stop and countermand the march of his troops against Prussia. The Emperor replied in the affirmative. With one word you could have saved Prussia. By preventing the fall of this power, you would have maintained on the Elbe that barrier necessary to your dearest interests, the re-establishment of which in future is impossible."

A large succeeding part of the Manifesto relates to the affair of Copenhagen: but although much is said, nothing new is produced. It is merely a repetition of what has already been advanced in the Moniteur. But our Readers will be interested to learn the terms which France and Russia propose to demand for Denmark:

"France, Austria, and Russia require that the Danish fleet should be restored; that reparation should be made to the Prince Royal; that the English people, following the example of the Romans upon a similar occasion, should surrender into the hands of the Prince Royal the person who advised the expedition against Copenhagen; that the houses destroyed in that city should be rebuilt at the expence of England, and finally that his Britannic Majesty should disavow the outrage offered to all Sovereigns. This is far distant from the proposals made by England."

In regard to the declaration of our Ministers that we are always ready to make peace with France on reasonable terms; that we broke off our last negotiation only for Russian interests, but will never consent to be dictated to by any power, the Moniteur declares the latter sentiment to be insulting to Russia; it affirms that if the interests of Russia are regarded, peace may immediately be concluded; and it asserts that France has never thrown any obstacles in the way of peace.

But the most important article in the whole Manifesto is the last paragraph. It relates to that declaration which our Ministers made, in defence of Russia's adherence to the principles of the armed neutrality, that we should resolutely maintain our principles of maritime law, and never allow them to be brought into question. It is as follows:

"It is because you do not wish for peace that you raise useless questions. France, Austria, Spain, Holland, Naples, say, as well as the Emperor of Russia, that they proclaim anew the principles of the Armed Neutrality. Those Powers have doubtless the right to declare the principles which are to be the rule of their policy; they have the right to say on what conditions it becomes them to be your enemies, or neutral. You, you proclaim anew the principles of your Maritime Laws. Well then! this opposition of principles will not be an impediment to the re-establishment of Peace. They have on neither side any effect during peace; they have no application except when you are at war with a Maritime Power; but in that case, each Government has the right and power to consider the first violation of its flag as an act of hostility. The circumstances in which you will then find yourselves will determine your conduct then. If it is with France that you are at war, you will not judge her a power sufficiently feeble to render it indifferent to you whether you draw other enemies upon you, and you will shew some consideration for the rest of Europe. You did not venture to insult the flags of every power, till you had the address to arm all the Continent against France. It was then your maritime principles were changed; and they became more unjust and more violent, in proportion as your Continental connections became more contracted, or your allies maintained with more difficulty the struggle in which you had engaged them. It was thus that when Russia was obliged to collect all her force against the French in Poland, you violated her flag, and refused her, in respect to her Commercial Treaty, concessions which you shewed yourselves disposed to grant when she had no longer any enemies to combat. The Powers of the Continent, in proclaiming anew the principles of the armed neutrality, do but announce the maxims upon which they purpose to act in the next maritime war. You cannot prevent their directing their policy as they understand it; they exercise in this the right which appertains to all Governments, and to the usurpation of which they would have nothing to oppose but the ultima ratio regum. On your part, you proclaim the principles of your maritime laws, that is, the maxims which you will employ in your next war. The Continent has no interest in demanding from you either declarations or renunciations. Declarations would have no effect, from the moment you might think you could forget them with impunity. Renunciations are without an object, since we cannot renounce what we do not possess. If we judge of what you will do, by what you have hitherto done, we may conclude, that you will not require from the Powers of the Continent either declaration or renunciation; and as they will demand none from you, there is hence no question to discuss, no difficulty to resolve; there is nothing which can retard for a day the blessings of peace. If, however, you should raise the strange and novel pretension of imposing upon France, and the other Powers of the Continent, by an act of your will alone, the obligation of subscribing to your maritime laws, this is as if you were to require that the Legislature and Sovereignty of Russia, France, and Spain should be transported to London—a fine prerogative for your Parliament. It would be the same as if you were to proclaim everlasting war, or as if you were to fix as the termination of war the moment when you should have seized on St. Petersburgh, Paris, Vienna, and Madrid. But if this be not at the bottom of your sentiment, there is no further obstacle to peace: for, according to your own expressions, negociations were broken off on points which touched immediately not the interests of his Britannic Majesty, but those of his Imperial Ally: for the Imperial Ally of his Britannic Majesty has informed you, that peace is henceforth the principal end of his wish, the principal object of his interest."

Our readers will perceive, with pleasure, that this article contains far more pacific indications on the part of France than have hitherto been uttered. She ingeniously finds out a mode of getting over the chief difficulty which stood in the way of pacification; and when this is once removed, certainly very little seems to stand in the way of opening negociations, if our Government is inclined.

The Austrian Ambassador, M. De Starremberg, has received his passports; but nothing is known of the time of his departure. If Ministers are engaged in negociations, they are kept a profound secret: but some papers, if we believe themselves, are quite in the confidence of the Cabinet, and pompously announce to the public, that they are to discuss the question of peace or war!

Some interesting accounts have been received of insurrections in Lisbon against the French. As they have come through different channels they seem entitled to some credit, and we have, therefore, inserted them; but we must observe, that the information comes through American captains, and we shall, therefore, defer our observations on them till they are better authenticated.

INSURRECTION AT LISBON.

(Extracted from a Dublin Paper.)

The following highly interesting intelligence has been just communicated at our Office, by the Captain of an American vessel, which arrived in our harbour this day, from Cadiz, which place he left on the 31st ult:—

"It appears, that previous to his sailing, letters from Lisbon, dated on the 12th and 17th of December, had been received, which stated that on the 12th, at night (the French having previously taken possession of all the forts, and the remaining ships of war, on which they hoisted French colours), the populace, in immense numbers, commenced an attack upon the French and Spanish troops; that a general engagement took place in the streets, and that great numbers were killed on both sides before the populace were reduced to submission. The following morning General Junot issued a menacing proclamation, threatening the ringleaders, which he said were well known, with the most dreadful punishment. The immediate execution of the prisoners taken by the French, followed this proclamation: some were shot, and many were hanged. These dreadful examples, however, were not of sufficient force to prevent a second insurrection, which took place three days after, on the 15th, more dreadful and sanguinary in its effects than the former, in which, our reports state, between "five and six thousand French and Spaniards were killed," and that the most dreadful disorder prevailed in the Capital when the last accounts were sent off. The greater part of the troops stationed there are Spanish. To the horrors of insurrection are added the miseries of want; as a scarcity of the most dreadful and affecting kind prevailed generally in and about Lisbon."

A private letter from Dublin, communicates some particulars in addition to the above:—

Dublin, Jan. 11.

"I have the pleasure to acquaint you, that the Isabella arrived here safely last night (Sunday), after a passage of ten days. She left Cadiz on the 31st ultimo. Before she came away, the Captain saw letters from Lisbon, of the 17th of December, which stated, that an insurrection had taken place there on the 12th, at night. The populace surprized the guards, and a very severe conflict ensued, and many on both sides were killed. On the 13th, many of the leaders of the populace were shot, which so incensed the inhabitants, that they arose again on the night on the 15th, when the slaughter was dreadful: above 5,000 persons on both sides were killed. The accounts add, that the inhabitants are dreadfully ill off for provisions. The greater part of the wealthy totally forsook the city. The French colours were hoisted on board the forts and ships of war. When the accounts left Lisbon, peace had not been entirely restored; but it was thought famine would rid the country of the French and Spanish soldiers. Captain Higgins threw overboard all his papers, being chaced by three privateers."

A Meeeting of the Committee of the American Merchants took place on Thursday, pursuant to adjournment, but the main business for which they were assembled—namely, that of presenting a Memorial to Ministers, relative to the late Orders of Council, was not gone into. The consideration of it was farther postponed till Thursday next. The Chairman, however, was delegated to wait upon Ministers, relative to the application of the merchants and manufacturers of Lancashire and Yorkshire, for licences to protect such cargoes as they were about to embark for America.—Mr. Sansom accordingly proceeded to the Treasury, where he had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Lord Bathurst, whose answer to his application was, we understand, to the following purport, "that he saw no necessity for such licences, as we are not at war with America;" but that, however, they had no objection to grant them, in order to satisfy the persons who applied.

The Recorder made his Report, on Wednesday, to his Majesty, of the following convicts under sentence of death in Newgate:—

viz. Mary Crooks, alias Viney, for stealing bank notes, &c. in a dwelling-house; Michael Brady, for stealing goods in a dwelling-house; Jane Mosenan, for a like offence; John Almond, for forgery; Elizabeth Tippett, for uttering counterfeit money; Margaret Norton, for stealing goods, &c. in a dwelling-house; and Michael Tuboy, for a like offence. John Almond was ordered for execution on Wednesday next.—The rest were respited during pleasure.—Bullock was not reported.

Bread.—Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be continued at 11d. the Quartern Loaf of Wheaten, and 9½d. Household.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Friday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Captain John Brook Samson was sworn into the command of the ship Earl St. Vincent, destined to Bombay.—The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

Friday the arrival of the Salsette frigate at Portsmouth was announced at the East India House, with Lord William Bentinck on board; William Petrie, Esq. succeeds to the government on his Lordship's resignation. The gale of wind having continued, it is conjectured, is the cause of no packets being received at the East India House.

The Sir Stephen Lushington, Cap. Gray, had arrived at St. Helena, and was to sail from thence about the 6th December.

FRIDAY,..... The Wanderer, with the pantomime.
SATURDAY,.. The Wanderer, with the pantomime.

The Wanderer is a play, which most amply merits our unequivocal commendation.

This piece was founded, by Mr. C. Kemble, two years ago, on a foreign play, which had been acted with great success at Paris, and which painted, in striking colours, the misfortunes of Charles Edward, commonly called the Pretender. Mr. C. Kemble having, by many alterations, erasures, and additions, new-modelled it, so as to suit the English theatre, presented his dramatic history of the Pretender at Covent-garden, where it was instantly accepted. But when it was laid before the Lord Chamberlain, whose licence is necessary for the performance of every new piece, his Lordship, apprehensive that it might excite, in the breasts of the English people, a spirit of rebellion and popery, refused to stamp it with his indispensable sanction!

The Pope and the Pretender are certainly the two most formidable persons in this whole world. What matters it that the Pope is now a temporal prince without dominions, and a vicegerent of heaven without believers in his celestial power? Though Bonaparte has subdued his territory, and though our Catholics themselves deny his infallibility and his jurisdiction over them, yet the Pope is so tremendous a being, that half a year ago we saw the English people resign their liberties at the mention of the Pope, merely for fear the Pope should take those liberties away. What does it signify that the Pretender has been dead for half a century? nay, that the last branch of his family, the poor old Cardinal of York, is now no more? The very memory of the Pretender is dreadful: he was a hovering vulture who threatened the small birds while he lived,—now that he is dead, he serves for a scarecrow, and when he is neatly nailed and stuck up in the field, he frightens the flutterers just as effectually as ever. What do the Lord Licensing Chamberlain and his colleagues conceive of that English constancy and loyalty of which they talk so much, when they suspect a traitor in every man of feeling, and conjure up the ghosts of dangers deceased, to distract us from the contemplation of the dangers that exist?

After all, we cannot but consider this refusal on the part of his Lordship, as the highest compliment that he could pay to the play of the Wanderer. For if it had not been pregnant with interest, if it had not abounded in the strongest feeling, he could not have found even a pretence for keeping up the alarm of the Pope and the Pretender.

Mr. C. Kemble then changed the names of the agents in his piece, and of the country where the scene was laid: and altering a few circumstances, contrived to make his plot correspond with some remarkable events in the Swedish history. The characters and the fable as they now stand, are as follows:

Prince Gustavus..... ...Mr. Claremont.
Prince Sigismund.....Mr. C. Kemble.
Count Valdenstein.....Mr. Pope.
Count Sparre:.....Mr. Brunton.
Colonel Bayner.....Mr. Blanchard,
Ramsay.....Mr. Fawcett.
Countess Valdenstein.....Miss Smith.
Christina.....Miss Norton.

Sigismund, the grandson of Gustavus Vasa, had been defeated in several attempts to recover the crown of his ancestor from the reigning monarch of Sweden. Deserted by his followers, he took refuge in the isle of Oeland, and in the last extremity of hunger and despair, entered the castle of Count Valdenstein, who was expected shortly to arrive from Finland. The Countess, touched by his misfortunes, provided him with apparel, and concerted means for his escape; but her scheme was foiled by the vigilance of the guard, under the command of Sparre and Bayner. We forbear to explain the manner in which these measures were frustrated, because we are unwilling to anticipate the pleasure which our readers will feel from the representation itself. Again, Prince Sigismund, assisted by the Countess, by Christina, and by Ramsay, attempted to escape on board the Danish fleet, which was hovering on the coast; and again he was prevented from accomplishing his purpose, by the intervention of Count Valdenstein. A very interesting scene then ensued, in which Valdenstein himself, though firmly attached to the crown, was induced to connive at the Prince's escape: Sparre and the guards were foiled in their turn; and a letter written with pencil, arrived to inform the Countess that Sigismund had safely joined the Danish fleet. Prince Gustavus, the son of the reigning monarch, then appeared; in consideration of the interesting circumstances of the case, he pardoned the Valdensteins for aiding the unfortunate enemy of the king, and the piece concluded with the union of Count Sparre and Christina.

From this outline our readers will perceive, that the Wanderer, like the modern melodramas, is, in its fable, founded on heroic situation; but in no other respect does it bear the least affinity to these fashionable afterpieces. For the Wanderer possesses character as well as incident, and while it interests by the strength of its situations, it charms by the elegance of its dialogue. We noticed, indeed, some passages of popular patriotism, which, though not violently introduced, are still unworthy to assort with the chaste simplicity of the language in general. But in every one of the great requisites for dramatic composition, Mr. C. Kemble has most honourably succeeded; and we have declared our objection to the two or three straggling clap-traps which are found in the first act, not for the sake of picking out a petty fault, but because where a piece approaches so nearly to perfection, we cannot but be vexed to see its claims obstructed by so slight an impediment. It continues to attract crowded audiences.

The author is himself the representative of Sigismund. It is a character of various passion; and both in its deeper and in its lighter tints, it is admirably coloured by the acting of Mr. C. Kemble. We should give equal praise to Mr. Fawcett's performance of the trifling character of Ramsay, if he would but talk in a Scotch dialect; but, perhaps, he considers that as none of the party would in reality be speaking English, it is not necessary for Ramsay to mark his country by his accent. Mr. Pope in Valdenstein, is loud, but not interesting; and Miss Smith, as the Countess, is too cold and declamatory. She has the habit of giving a great appearance of sentimental importance to passages which ought to be simply spoken. The other performers do little which demands either praise or censure. There are choruses, and one excellent overture to the play; these are the work of Mr. Russell and Mr. Davy. The Prologue is spoken by Mr. Brunton, and the Epilogue by Miss Norton.

KING'S THEATRE.

The Comic opera of La Francatana, was revived on Saturday the 9th, for the purpose of displaying the admirable powers of Madame Catalani. One of her songs received applause so loud and so reiterated, that she sang it three times. The opera has since been repeated, with the Ballet of La Belle Laitiere. In this piece Miss Cranfield has succeeded to the character formerly occupied by Mademoiselle Parisot, who is lately married to Mr. Hughes of Golden Square.

TRADE TO THE BRAZILS.

CIRCULAR LETTER FROM THE PORTUGUESE AMBASSADOR TO THE GOVERNOR OF THE ISLAND OF ST. CATHERINE.

Agreeably to the letter which I had the honour of addressing you, under date of the 4th January of the present year, in which I explained at large to your Excellency the motives which induced me to sanction the sending out of British Merchantmen to the Island of St. Catherine, provided that their cargoes consist of articles hitherto received into the Custom Houses of Portugal, I have now to request that you will be pleased to order that the ship —— should be admitted into the Custom House of that Island, the Captain or Master of which, (who is the bearer of this letter), you will permit to unload and sell his cargo, and give directions that no more duties shall be required of her, than were paid in Portugal for the same articles; and also that those duties should not be demanded until he has sold and dispatched his cargo, in every particular conforming to the practice of the Custom House at Lisbon.

And as it may possibly happen, that your Excellency may not yet find yourself authorised to consent to the sale of such cargoes, I earnestly request you that at all events you will be pleased to allow that they should be landed and properly warehoused, and that you will order that the ships should moor in that port, waiting there with their crews, without molestation, until your Excellency shall receive the instructions and orders of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent on this head.

Your Excellency will observe, that the bearer of this letter ought also to present to you with the manifest of the cargo, confirmed by me, and the licence of the British Privy Council; to fulfil the conditions of which, your Excellency will be pleased to order the Officers of Customs to deliver to the bearer a certificate of the regular discharge of the articles specified in such manifest.

Conditions agreed to by the Merchants, for the Admission (provisionally until his Royal Highness's Resolutions are known) into the Port of the Island St. Catherine, of all such Goods as were heretofore imported into Portugal.

1st. That all Merchants wishing to make adventures to the Brazils without waiting for the Regulations of his Royal Highness, should be obliged to take a licence from the Privy Council, which will point out the port that will be agreed on by his Excellency, Mr. Canning and me, and to which alone they must give bond to go.

2dly. That every Master, and every Shipper, will give the usual bonds at this Custom-house, for the due delivery at the Custom-house of the said port.

3dly. Besides, every Master and Shipper will bind themselves to pay at the Custom-house of the said port, the same duties that were paid in Portugal upon every such article, or in lieu thereof, such as may have been already established by his Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

4thly. According to your offer, and to ascertain that no contraband goods are exported thither, the manifest of the said cargo, sworn and authenticated as usual at this Custom-house, will be signed by the Agents and Consul-General, Mr. John Charles Lucena, and by me.

5thly. On these conditions, which contain all that fair trade can wish for at present, I will most willingly provide every Captain with a letter of mine to the Governor of said port, informing him of what I have done, and requesting him earnestly to require immediate instructions from the Rio de Janeiro, in case his Royal Highness is already arrived; and should his Royal Highness be not yet arrived, requesting him besides not to enforce the existing laws, but to suspend them until he receives the instructions required, which cannot be long in coming, and in the mean while not to molest, but permit the said ships to wait peaceably for the new orders; unless he should be authorised by his former instructions to admit the entry of such goods, on paying the same duties as in Portugal, and to allow the Captains to invest their proceeds in the produce of the country, in which case I will ardently request the Governor to facilitate this trade.

P. S. I need not say, that upon application with the licence of the Privy Council, &c. &c. &c. the Manifest will be signed by me, and my letter to the Governor will be delivered immediately without the least expence to any of the concerned.

To his Excellency D. Luiz Mauricio Da Silveira, or whomsoever is at present Governor of the Island of St. Catharine, Brazil.

N. B. I request their Excellencies the Viceroy and Governor of the different ports of Brazil, which this ship may enter in distress, that they will cause it to be accompanied by a guarda costa to the Port of the Island of St. Catharine, in order to avoid any unjust suspicion against the Captain, of illicit commerce.

From his Royal Highness's Envoy at London.

RE-APPEARANCE OF A THEATRICAL HEROINE!!

After an absence of two years, carefully employed in the acquisition of notoriety, this Lady has re-appeared upon the London boards—a fair candidate for public approbation!!!—When we saw her name first announced in the bills of Covent-Garden Theatre, we confess our astonishment. We were, however, silent, confidently expecting that the chastisement of vice would prove the consequence of its effrontery, certain that she would afford an useful lesson to future heroines, telling them if they cannot be virtuous, they should at least be prudent; nor, after having vilely sullied the purity of private life, presume to shew with what facility a virtuous public can be duped into forgiveness. The event, however, has not justified our expectation—the Lady has been tolerated, and we should consider ourselves neglecting the duties of a moral press, did we any longer withhold our sentiments on the subject. Much as the propriety of scenic exhibition has hitherto been questioned, we shall certainly never appear in the list of their opponents, so long as the stage continues to be the vehicle of public morality—the mirror in which vice may shrink at its reflexion—the voice through which virtue shall be consoled in its fall, and applauded in its elevation.

Now this effect we think can never be produced while immoral agents are employed in its fulfilment; and certainly when a thoughtless parent takes his child to witness the representation of a moral character by an actress notoriously the contrary, we can consider it in no other light than as inculcating to the youthful mind how easily virtue may be acted, and how effectually the hypocrite may deceive!—We are fully aware that this remark may be retorted by those who may choose to differ from us in opinion—there are certainly a class of characters in which the notoriety of Mrs. H. J's real situation need not destroy the illusion of her fictitious one, and so long as the lady confines herself in the line of the Bizarres and Millwoods, we will lavish on her all that panegyric which a perfect portrait of nature depicted with admirable talents must ever justify.

DREADFUL GALE.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM DEAL, JAN. 15.—"Yesterday the wind having shifted suddenly from about S. S. W. to N. W. it began to blow violently, and during the night increased to a perfect hurricane. The morning light presented a most distressing spectacle—ships parting from their anchors, others drifting; some with the loss of top-masts and bowsprits, and some standing out of the Downs without either anchor or cable left; but providentially none have drove on shore, nor can I at present learn that any have been lost. This day the wind continued with increased violence, and brought in a most tremendous sea, which at one time even threatened the destruction of the town. The foundations of a great number of houses next the sea have been undermined, store-houses have been swept away with their contents, and the ground tier of the dwelling-houses, filled with water. The sea, during the tempest, made a considerable breach between Sandown Castle and the battery No. 1, which has inundated the chambers, and forced such a torrent of water into the lower streets of Deal, that the cellars have been completely filled, and property to a large amount totally destroyed. In a row of houses adjoining to Alfred-square, the torrent was so deep that boats were obliged to be got down, and the miserable inhabitants taken out of their houses from the chamber windows. Several quays in the Beach-street, which had braved the fury of the elements for a series of years, have been totally destroyed, and the timber washed out to sea.—Quarter past four, p. m. The wind has now somewhat abated, but we fear a return during the night. I have this instant been told that a brig, name unknown, foundered at her anchors about three o'clock this morning, and all souls perished.—Pray God it may prove untrue!

MARGATE, JAN. 15.—In a severe gale last night this harbour and town suffered material damage: the wind during the night was at N.W. attended with a remarkable high tide, which has made a breach through the Pier Head, and completely washed away the parapet-walls from the Pier to the Marine Parade, destroying all the bathing-rooms except one.

The Isabella and Ann, Rook, from Newfoundland, and the El Percy, Meek, from Quebec, for London, have put in here, with the loss of anchors and cables; and the bark Betsey, of Poole, from Newfoundland, for London, is on shore, about three miles above this place; crew saved.

COWES, JAN. 15.—During the whole of yesterday and last night we experienced here a dreadful gale of wind, during which there arrived a large fleet of transports from Ireland, those late from Buenos Ayres, under convoy of a gun-brig, which, together with ten sail of the transports, and an American ship, were drove ashore between this place and Yarmouth. The gun-brig, with three sail of the transports and the American ship, got safely off, but the other transports still remain on shore. It is now more moderate, and it is hoped they will be got off without material damage. The numbers of three of them now on shore are 210, 115, and F. 1.

LAW REPORTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY, LINCOLN'S-INN HALL, JAN. 12.

PARTNERSHIP DEBTS.

The Court was occupied nearly the whole day in discussing Bankrupt Petitions. The only question of any public interest was, whether joint creditors can prove their debts against the separate estate of a joint debtor?—After hearing Sir Samuel Romilly and Mr. Cook, the Chancellor observed, that questions between joint and separate creditors had been frequently litigated during the last century, and various opinions and rules had been obtained. Lord Hardwick thought that joint creditors could not prove against the separate estate of a joint debtor:—Lord Thurlow, however, deeply considered the subject, and ruled the contrary opinion. Lord Rosslyn inclined to the former dictum, and said if there was any thing like a joint fund, were it only 5s. the joint creditors could not prove against the separate estate of a solvent partner. Such (his Lordship said) he had found to be the prevailing rule when he came into office, and though he might entertain doubts with respect to the principle, carried to its full extent, yet he thought it better to continue the rule, and decide according to circumstances when the question should be agitated, rather than to weaken the precedent by introducing modifications that might ultimately lead to litigation and confusion. In the case before him, he thought the joint creditors could not prove under the separate estate of the joint debtor.

The case of Purcell v. Macnamara, as far as certain exceptions taken to the Master's report are involved, was decided, and the order made by Lord Erskine and his Honour the Master of the Rolls confirmed, with some trifling deviation. The case, in its present stage, embraces no public interest. It is merely a matter of account.

ADMIRALTY SESSIONS.

MURDER.

William Chapman, the Captain of a Liverpool Slave ship, was indicted for the wilful murder of Robert Dunn, by exposing him naked to the weather, by starving him, and by repeated acts of cruelty and ill-treatment.

The Solicitor-General opened the case, in the absence of the King's Advocate, when George Scott, the Doctor on board the ship, and principal evidence, together with several of the ship's crew, were called to corroborate the case made out. The substance of their evidence was as follows:—

The deceased was sent out by one of the owners of the ship, and it appeared that the Captain had taken an early dislike to him, from a suspicion that he was placed on board as a spy on the conduct of the ship's officers. The ship had not left Liverpool more than a month, when the deceased having spilt some molasses, received five dozen lashes by the Captain's orders. From that time, Sept. 1805 till the 31st of March 1807, the deceased experienced an uninterrupted series of ill-treatment and privation. Every fault, though of the most trivial sort, was visited with the severest chastisement:—He was suspended hours together with a chain round his middle, and left swinging in an horizontal position—he was tied up by the neck, his toes just touching the deck, till he was nearly strangled; he was again suspended by the legs, with his head downwards, his fingers' ends resting upon the hatchways, till the blood, having overcharged the vessels of the head and brain, he became insensible. Again he was exposed naked to the weather, and compelled, in the midst of a cold rain, to wring out the swabs, and was employed to empty the tubs in which the slaves deposited their filth. On one occasion, when he had upset one of these tubs upon the deck, the Captain beat him with a handspike, and bruised and lacerated his body in a most pitiable way; the blood flowed from his head and covered his shoulders. He likewise had his head half shaved and painted, his body marked with colours, and suspended by his wrists, tied at the extreme end of a broomstick. In this way he left the slaves upon deck to laugh at him. His daily allowance was a pound of yam or bread, and three half pints of water, and, of course, his body became emaciated, and his flesh and strength dwindled away. He was also beat over the face and eyes with the handle of a cat, and these various acts of cruelty and chastisement repeated almost daily.—The last act of cruelty, however, was when the poor wretch was discovered lying in the place where the pigs were kept. He again used the handspike, and beat him with it from head to foot. The deceased crawled to the forecastle, where he lay with a mat to cover him, incapable of moving. He continued in that situation till he expired about three or four days after. The Captain was told of his death, and exclaimed—"D—n his eyes, throw him overboard." The Doctor's description of the dead body was as follows:—"The face was so swelled that his eyes could not be seen, his head was also swelled, and his hair clotted with blood—his breast bone stuck out like a wedge—his back appeared to be humped—his belly was shrunk in—his whole frame emaciated, and his body covered with bruises."

The Prisoner, when called on for his defence, gave in a written paper, stating, that he had the misfortune to have a turbulent and mutinous crew, and that he was compelled to have recourse to severities in order to maintain his command. Smith, the gunner, after disobeying his orders, said, he had the key of the magazine, and would blow up the ship; and on another occasion eleven out of twenty-five of his crew went on shore. In short, that the whole was a conspiracy to take away his life, and the charge had been made up by the Doctor out of revenge, he (the Prisoner) having punished him for his misconduct.

Mr. Justice Le Blanc summed up the evidence, and after commenting at great length, said it was a question purely with respect to the credibility of witnesses. If they believed the facts deposed on the part of the prosecution, they certainly amounted to murder; but if they thought the facts had been overcharged, and the case had been made out from motives of pique, rather than of public justice, then they would take the improbability of the case into consideration, and say whether, under all the circumstances, the Prisoner was not intitled to their acquittal.

The Jury withdrew at five minutes after nine at night, and did not return with their Verdict until ten minutes after three in the morning, when they pronounced the Defendant—Not Guilty.

The Prisoner appeared quite cool and indifferent during the whole trial; nor did he seem to feel the least emotion when the sentence of acquittal was pronounced.

OLD BAILEY.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 13.

The Sessions of Oyer and Terminer for London and Middlesex commenced, before the Chief Baron Macdonald, and Justices Rooke and Lawrence.

Isaac Castle was capitally indicted for assaulting and robbing Mary Little on the King's highway. In the course of the evidence it appeared, that while the prosecutrix, in the evening, was turning out of Sloane-street into Hans-place, the prisoner came behind her, and taking hold of one of her legs, pulled her down, and robbed her of a silk shawl, with which he ran off. He was, however, apprehended, carried before the Rev. H. B. Dudley, and committed. The case being now clearly brought home, he was found guilty—Death. The prosecutrix most earnestly recommended the prisoner to mercy.

Eliza Crosbie was capitally indicted for stealing 12 guineas, and 14 half-guineas, the property of Susanna Potter, in her dwelling house.

It appeared, that Mrs. Potter kept a public house at Brentford, and that the prisoner had lodged in her house the night before the robbery. Mrs. Potter had made up the sum of money mentioned in the indictment in order to pay some of her bills, and had it put into a bag, which she deposited in the till in the bar.—In the morning she happened to go out, and then left the prisoner in the tap-room. On her return the prisoner was gone and having occasion to look into the till, she found her money also gone, upon which she suspected the prisoner, and immediately raising a hue and cry after her, she was apprehended, and taken before a magistrate. Here the prisoner threw herself on her knees before the prosecutrix, and producing the bag with the money in it, confessed that she had stolen it. The magistrate, however, felt himself bound to commit the prisoner, and the fact being thus clearly established, she was found guilty, but recommended to mercy by the jury.

Before the London Jury five distinct causes were heard, in all of which the prisoners were under the age of 18; and what is most remarkable, they were all found guilty, and all, except one, recommended to the humane consideration of the Court

THURSDAY, JAN. 14.

John Little was indicted for burglariously breaking and entering the house of Mary Pavey, and stealing therefrom several articles of wearing apparel.—Verdict Guilty.

John Coates and John Badger, two very young boys, were indicted for a burglary, in breaking and entering the dwelling-house of John Doward, and stealing a piece of Irish cloth and two silk handkerchiefs, his property.—Both Guilty.

George Rudd and Thomas Donovan were indicted for stealing twenty-five sheep, the property of James Burnell and Robert Swain, on the 28th of December last. Eleven witnesses gave Rudd (who is a butcher at Pimlico) a most excellent character. The Jury withdrew, and at length found a verdict of Guilty.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 15.

Ann Thompson was indicted for the wilful murder of Joseph Walker, a black sailor, on the 26th of December last, in Denmark-street, Ratcliff Highway. It appeared in evidence that a quarrel had arisen between the prisoner and the deceased, in the course of which the former was much bruised; that she endeavoured to exclude him from her lodgings, but that he attempted again to get in, when a scuffle ensued, and the deceased received the wound which caused his death. Several persons gave the prisoner a good character.—The Jury found her guilty of Manslaughter.

The two following were capitally convicted:—

Martha Davis was convicted of the robbery of Charles Titswell, a lad about 13, putting him in fear, and taking from his person a half-crown piece, in Dyott-street, St. Giles's, on the 11th instant.

Elizabeth Minster, for stealing 12 yards of muslin, 25 yards of garnet, &c. of Thomas Morhall and Price James Evans, in their dwelling-house.

SATURDAY, JAN. 16.

John Adams was indicted under the Ellenborough Act, for wilfully and maliciously cutting and maiming William Bennett, a police officer, with intent to murder him.

William Bennett, the prosecutor, stated, that on the 19th of June, he went with Lee, a brother officer, to quell a riot in Noble-street, Stepney, and whilst advising a woman who stood in the street, to go home, a man, whom the prosecutor could not identify, rushed from a court, attacked him with a weapon which he supposed to be iron; he was knocked down, and had several cuts and bruises on the head, one of which fractured his skull, and he was several weeks under the hands of a surgeon.

A surgeon proved that the prosecutor had sustained a serious injury from the wounds and bruises he had received.—The prisoner was found Guilty.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

SATURDAY, JAN. 16.

CONSPIRACY.—The following fifteen journeymen boot-makers, in the employ of Mr. Limebeer, boot-maker, in Fleet-street, viz. Gilbert, Weston, Foster, Kelford, Thompson, Grisell, G. Grimbey, Curtis, R. Grimbey, Baker, Stuart, Williams, Nelson, Robson, and Baker, were indicted for unlawfully conspiring together to prevent other journeymen from working at their trade, without an increase of wages.

It appeared, by the statement of Mr. Knapp and the testimony of witnesses, that the defendants were workmen in the employ of Mr. Limebeer, some weeks previous to September last, when a general strike took place, in consequence of the prosecutor not choosing to submit to some resolution, passed at a shop-committee, in order to obtain an increase of wages. Gilbert acted as chairman of the shop-meetings. By the steps taken by these journeymen, the evil extended through the Metropolis, Northampton, and other provincial towns, and to the United Kingdom. The shop-committee sat at the Crooked Billet, in Shire-lane, and every considerable shop in London sent two Delegates to this Committee as their representatives. Gilbert, addressed the meeting, and Paster drew up resolutions, requiring an advance of wages; which, on being presented to Mr. Limebeer, were rejected, and a general strike was the consequence. All those who had struck were to be allowed seven shillings, provided they chose to go into the country, and an allowance made to their wives and children, from the shop fund. The case of the journeymen was represented as dangerous, and on Mr. Limebeer applying to Northampton for workmen, was disappointed. The journeymen there having corresponded with those in London. All the prisoners were found Guilty.

ACCIDENTS, &c.

A serious accident happened on Wednesday to Mr. G. B. Hearn, a young gentleman who resides in Portland-place, occasioned by the restiveness of his horse. Mr. Hearn had purchased the horse, which had a good deal of blood, so recently as Saturday last, and he had not mounted him but twice before. On taking him out of a stable in an adjoining mews, the animal began to play as usual by rising gently before; and a gentleman who accompanied Mr. Hearn advised him to dismount, to prevent an accident. The horse went quiet for a short distance and began to plunge, and on his rider clapping spurs to him he reared, and fell over on his back. Mr. H. was taken from under the animal with his shoulder dislocated, and his head dangerously fractured. He was taken into the house of Mrs. Hearn, but we understood that apprehensions were entertained of the accident proving fatal.

An Inquisition was taken last week, at a public-house near Newington, on the body of a young man of the name of Turner, who met his death in the fields, by following a companion with a gun, on Sunday morning.—It appeared in evidence that the deceased was clerk in a wholesale house in St. Giles's, and he went out with the porter belonging to the same house, on Sunday morning, to shoot small birds. The porter was making a leap down a bank over the ditch, when the butt of the gun dashed against the bank, by his missing his step, and it went off. The deceased was standing on the bank, ready to get over the ditch also, and he received the charge about the head and shoulders, and survived but a few minutes. A bye-stander witnessed the accident, and corroborated the testimony.—Accidental Death.

A young man, 22 years of age, the son of an opulent liquor merchant, stands charged with having committed a rape on a woman, 45 years of age, and a widow, in St. Anne's parish, at whose house he had apartments for the accommodation of a favourite female. The young damsel had recently eloped from her father, a shoemaker, in Bloomsbury parish, and her retreat having been discovered, she was taken home by the father on Sunday evening, which fact was not known to her protector until the following night, when he called for her at eleven o'clock; it was then that the rape is said to have been committed on the landlady of the house. The affair will be publicly investigated in a day or two.

Her funeral was attended by several Nobility, 100 Ecclesiastics in the habits of their orders, and a great number of Members of the Literary Societies at Rome. Some of her best pictures were displayed in the procession, borne upon the shoulders of the mourners.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FOUR.

HIS MAJESTY'S SPEECH.

Seldom has his Majesty's Speech excited more anxious expectation than at the present moment. The critical and extraordinary state of our foreign relations, the singular transactions and discussions in which we have lately been involved, and the question of peace or war so important to us and to the universe, would, it was expected, have the most interesting light thrown upon them by this official document. If these expectations be not wholly realised, they are so, at least, in part; and if there is much which we still wish to see explained, we can, however, pretty clearly discern the sentiments of our Ministers, and the line of conduct which they intend to pursue. We could have wished to find the Speech more satisfactory; but we shall at least endeavour, in a short commentary, to give the public an explicit view of its contents and defects.

The Speech immediately proceeds to inform us, "That no "sooner had the results of the Negotiations at Tilsit confirmed "the influence and controul of France over the Powers of the "Continent, than his Majesty was apprised of the intentions "of the enemy to combine those Powers in one general Con"federacy, to be directed either to the entire subjugation of "this kingdom, or to the imposing upon his Majesty an insi"cure and ignominious Peace.—That for this purpose, it was "determined to force into hostility against his Majesty, States "which had hitherto been allowed by France to maintain or "to purchase their neutrality; and to bring to bear against "different points of his Majesty's dominions, the whole of the "naval force of Europe, and especially the fleets of Portugal "and Denmark."

This paragraph affords much room for observation. No mention is made of the secret articles of the Treaty of Tilsit, which have formerly been stated to contain the actual terms of the confederacy against us: it is not even hinted that such secret articles are in existence. The use which will be made, by the enemies of Government, of this silent retractation, is not doubtful: they will insist that our Ministers were originally duped, by some false information, into a belief that secret articles did exist in the Treaty of Tilsit; that they have since discovered the falsehood of their informer; but that having acted too far upon his false intelligence, shame prevents them from disavowing it altogether, and they therefore confine themselves to speaking of it in general terms, and passing over in silence particulars which might be refuted and exposed. They will urge that we are now left wholly to conjecture, whether the hostile confederacy formed a part of the Treaty of Tilsit, or was a subsequent transaction; and that no hint whatever is given of the manner in which his Majesty became apprised of this combination. We should be heartily sorry to find that this were actually the case with our Ministers, and we still hope that they may be able to give more satisfactory explanation: but if they should not be able to do so, either from the deficiency of their information, or from the nature of the channel through which it was procured, deeply it is to be regretted that they ever rested their measures on this foundation. It will cause their good faith to be questioned by the present generation, and to be suspected by posterity.

The information respecting the enemy's intentions against Portugal was not derived from any vague or suspicious source; it was directly communicated by the government of Portugal. The friendly assurances of that Court, it is stated, prevented us from taking any forcible measures to secure its fleet and its fidelity. Why, it may be asked, was not the same reliance placed on the good faith of Denmark? At the time when the attack was made, it might have been difficult to answer this interrogation; but the result of the confidence we placed in the Portuguese, may now induce Ministers to think their treatment of the Danes the wiser measure. The Prince Regent of Portugal prepared indeed for emigration, but he still deprecated the arrival of our fleets in his harbours; and, at length, delivered himself entirely up to the schemes of Bonaparte, united himself formally with our continental enemies, and commenced hostilities against us by shutting his ports to our trade, and seizing the persons and property of British residents in his dominions. The secret approach of the French army to Lisbon, and the implacable hatred which Bonaparte denounced against the House of Braganza, again fortunately turned his affection to Britain, and induced him to withdraw his person and his fleet from the grasp of Bonaparte. Our Ministers may thus boast that their intentions were fulfilled in both cases, in the one by moderation, in the other by violence; but unfortunately the former has been followed by little praise, and the latter continues to be pursued by deep obloquy.

The speech proceeds to state the success of the enemy with Russia, Austria, and Prussia; and the departure of the Ambassadors of these powers from this country. It is stated, that neither Austria nor Prussia have given any reason for this proceeding, and indeed they must be considered as wholly passive instruments in the hands of France.

It is stated that the Emperor of Russia has attempted to justify his hostile conduct by a statement of wrongs and grievances which have no real foundation; that his Majesty did not refuse the mediation of that Prince; but that he could not accept of it until his Majesty should have been able to ascertain that Russia was in a condition to mediate impartially, and until the principles of the basis on which France was ready to negociate were made known to his Majesty.

The reason urged against accepting the mediation of Russia, would certainly be very conclusive, were the arbitration between two great nations at all similar to the arbitration between two individuals. In the latter case, the arbitrator is chosen to decide upon the points in dispute, and by his decision the parties pledge themselves to stand: it is therefore of the utmost consequence that his impartiality be ascertained beforehand, otherwise the interests of the one party may be directly sacrificed to the other. But the part of a mediator between two great nations is altogether different. He is called upon to decide nothing: his task is merely to receive and transmit the first overtures of both powers, to sooth by his friendly offices any rising animosities of the interested parties, and to be the organ of communication when the etiquette and forms of deplomacy might occasion dangerous delays and obstructions. None of the principals in the negociation is bound to accept any proposal of the mediator, unless he chuses; and it is entirely the fault of the ambassador, if the interests of their country are at all injured by any undue impartiality. In this point of view, we see no good reason for rejecting the mediation of Russia, because she was suspected of being friendly to France. If France was sincere in her desires for peace, Russia, if actuated by congenial sentiments, must also have been desirous of peace; and in this case her mediation could only have tended to accelerate that most enviable event. If France and Russia were both hollow in their pacific professions; an actual negociation would soon have enabled us to detect their insincerity, and to expose it to the world.

The other objection of our Ministers to the acceptance of the Russian mediation, their ignorance of the basis on which France was willing to negociate, seems equally untenable. To arrange the basis itself was a matter of preliminary negociation, in which the mediating power might well bear a part; nor can we see any reason whatever, why the acceptance of the Russian mediation should be deferred, until this arrangement should be completed by France, and approved by our Government.

His Majesty mentions his concern that the enemy has succeeded in rendering the Ottoman Porte our enemy. The friendship or the enmity of this worst of governments, or rather this worst of anarchies, is of so little importance, as scarcely to deserve mention among our other truly great and interesting concerns.

The Speech extols the fidelity and magnanimity of the King of Sweden; it hints that it is a sacred duty to render assistance to that Monarch; and expresses a hope that Parliament will enable his Majesty to discharge any obligations contracted for this purpose. The conduct of the King of Sweden towards this country has certainly been meritorious; but we doubt his ability to resist the powerful combination of the surrounding powers; and we are apprehensive that our subsidies to him will prove as fruitless as they have done in every other country of the Continent of Europe.

With regard to America, it is stated that an attempt has been made by that Government to connect with the affair of the Chesapeake, pretensions inconsistent with the maritime rights of Britain: such pretensions, it is added, his Majesty is determined never to admit. We cannot but give our hearty assent to this determination of his Majesty, in the sense in which we understand it: it is surely absurd in the Americans to imagine that we should gratify them by renouncing our right of searching either for deserters, or for contraband goods, on board their merchant vessels. The rights which we here claim, are accorded equally to every state by the law of nations.

The Orders in Council are spoken of as a mere measure of retaliation, indispensably necessary to counteract the previous Edicts of Bonaparte; and Parliament is called upon to give vigour to these measures by its sanction. We never doubted of the justice of these Orders, as they were plainly an act of retaliation; but we must own that we entertain great doubts of their expediency. The commerce of neutrals was the only means remaining to us of diffusing our manufactures over the Continent of Europe; and experience seems to show that no efforts of Bonaparte could have entirely repressed this commerce, unless our Orders of Council had come to his aid.

In averting to the state of the revenue, his Majesty gives us the agreeable information, that both the temporary and permanent taxes have proved more productive than in the preceding year; and that he hopes the necessary supplies for the present year may be raised without any material addition to the public burdens.

Towards the conclusion of the Speech, mention is made of peace and war; but not in such terms as can justify any expectation of the speedy restoration of tranquillity. "If ever there was a just and national war," says the Speech, "it is "that which his Majesty is now compelled to prosecute. This "war is in its principle purely defensive. His Majesty looks "but to the attainment of a secure and honourable peace; but "such a peace can only be negociated upon a footing of "perfect equality."

From these expressions we may distinctly perceive that the present does not appear to our Ministers a proper season for negociation; but to what more favourable conjuncture they look forward, it is difficult to conceive. Do they expect insurrections on the Continent, in consequence of the present restrictions on trade? Or do they imagine that Bonaparte will be moved by the miseries of his people to renounce any of his present pretensions? There is something in the phrase of not negociating unless upon a footing of perfect equality, which we do not well understand. Has Bonaparte ever proposed to treat with us as a subordinate nation? Has he ever presumed to insinuate that the independence of Britain was not as complete as the independence of France? Of such pretensions we have never heard the least intimation; and it is therefore to something else that the language of our Ministers must refer. Perhaps they expect that those allies whom we were unable to defend, should be restored to their territories and to independence, in order that Britain and France might be placed, at the commencement of negociation, on an equal footing as to their respective influence in Europe.—If such wild speculations ever enter into their Counsels, in vain shall we pray for the return of peace, in vain lament the devastation of perpetual war.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. IV.

THE INDEPENDENT WHIG.

We shall never cease to be the advocates of the free and manly publication of every one's sentiments, through the medium of the press. The full and independent discussion of every public measure, the clear exposition of all the arguments which can be brought forwards, both by its friends and enemies, and the universal diffusion of these reasonings among all the inhabitants of the kingdom, we consider as the most certain preservative of public tranquillity, the most impregnable bulwark of our Government and Constitution. The British Government rests, not upon fear, but upon public opinion: its only danger proceeds from that ignorance of the great mass of the people, which makes them liable to become the dupes of designing men, and is apt to precipitate them into disorders, and even rebellion, from mere misapprehension. When the people are well informed with regard to the measures of Government, when they are accustomed to discuss them freely in their families and in their clubs, there is no danger of misapprehension ever leading to violence: if the measures of Government be really wise and good, the arguments in their favour will at least silence the disaffected; and even when these measures are unjustifiable, men accustomed to discussion will declaim, will print, will take every method of rendering their disapprobation public, but will never have recourse to the old barbarous practice of mobbing and burning houses, which, they know, will only bring down speedy punishment upon themselves, and render every wise man their enemy.

While, on these accounts, we are anxious that political knowledge should be diffused among every portion of the lowest classes of the community, we are the more inflamed with indignation at those declaimers who attempt to gain the favour of the common people, by exciting their resentment against their rulers; who are incessantly employed in rivetting vulgar prejudices instead of removing them, and who are glad to gain a circulation for their papers, at the price of rendering the people discontented, clamourous, and seditious. These are the real enemies of Government and good order; these are in truth the most dangerous enemies of the people, whose passions and prejudices they flatter. They convert that knowledge which would be the great source of national happiness, into a corrupting and destroying poison; and prolong the reign of darkness and delusion, by the triumph which they give to the haters of improvement and civilization.

These considerations have drawn from us some observations on The Independent Whig, a paper, which, we understand, has acquired a considerable circulation among the lower orders of the people. The Whig seemed, at first, to be a scion of that faction, from which it derives its name; but it has since entirely coalesced with a party which professes to hate Whig and Tory equally; a party which as yet is only distinguished by having Sir Francis Burdett at its head. The chief characteristic of this paper is unusual vehemence of language, an application of epithets so coarse and violent, that few would venture, for their own credit, to employ them; and a determined and uniform reprobation of all the measures of our Government. Such topics and such a style are very apt to become popular among the common people, to whose habits rudeness and discontent are congenial; but it is evident that in proportion as they do become popular, they contribute to interrupt civilization, and sap the foundations of our public prosperity.

The uniformity with which The Independent Whig rails at every measure of our own Government, and extols every measure of the enemy is truly curious, if it were not truly criminal. Every political economist knows that however great as a conqueror, Buonaparte has talked and acted more wildly with regard to commerce than any other Prince who has sat on a throne. He imagined that, by his simple mandate, he could cover the seas with his merchantmen and ships of war; and when he found this could not be done, he resolved to destroy our commerce forsooth, by completely ruining that of his own subjects, and of every nation he could overawe. Yet all these measures appeared to The Whig the consummation of wisdom; while every retaliating order of our Ministers was considered as the height of folly and absurdity. When the Russian Declaration made its appearance, it was panegyrised as unanswerable, as manly, explicit and energetic: it was found to have no weak side; Alexander's complaints, that we had deserted him, were declared to be well-founded; and his word was at once taken for the numerous grievances which he said his commerce had sustained. When our counter-Declaration appeared, it was flatly stigmatised as containing "nothing but vague and flimsy reasoning, assertions "unsupported by proof, declamatory invective substituted for "logical deduction, substantiating scarcely any thing but the "impotency of our Ministers!" But the remarks on our Declaration, which lately appeared in The Moniteur, met with a far different fate. "This able and eloquent production," says The Whig, "which, in our opinion, completely exposes the "absurdity and refutes the falsehoods of our Ministers, in their "answer to the Russian Declaration, certainly merits the se"rious and deliberate attention of every rational and reflecting "mind." A discussion follows in which The Moniteur is found, in every instance, to be perfectly unanswerable. Such is the manner in which The Whig uniformly proceeds, rendering the people discontented, by traducing our own Government, and exalting every measure of our enemies.

The manner in which The Independent Whig courts popularity, by converting to its use all the prejudices of the common people, is not less scandalous than its perpetual declamations in favour of our enemies. We shall not select a political instance, where some might doubt what is prejudice and what is not: we shall only advert to a recent instance, in which it has endeavoured to gain credit with all the weak women and gossiping mates in the kingdom, by calumniating the greatest blessing conferred on society in our days—the discovery of the cow-pox. The Whig does not scruple to announce the complete failure of this remedy, the horrid spectacles it has produced: and promises a still more thundering essay on the subject, when we have no doubt that there will be introduced the cows' horns and tails, with all the other stories which Drs. Moseley and Squirrel, and numerous other old women, have sedulously circulated. What heart must the man have who, from selfish motives, can thus alarm the fears and prejudices of the common people, and prevent them from enjoying the protection of that safeguard from death and deformity, which heaven has sent in mercy to their families?

The Independent Whig has at present two heroes—the Emperor Napoleon, and Sir Francis Burdett. Of the former it speaks in the loftiest terms: of its style on this subject, the following extract from one of its late numbers will afford a specimen:—"The Emperor Napoleon has set out on his journey to "Italy. Like the sun, he appears to hold on a perpetual unde"viating course; and, like that glorious luminary, travels over "the wide extent of his vast dominions, to vivify and invigorate "them by his presence! Extraordinary man! Wherever he "moves, the earth appears to tremble at his frown; and Kings "and Emperors crouch beneath his feet!" Such are the panegyrics with which Napoleon is incessantly loaded, while no expression is omitted to make our Government appear oppressive, feeble, and contemptible. It is for the Editor of The Whig to explain what other effect these panegyries and reproaches can have, when circulated among the most ignorant classes of the people, than to render them enemies to the British Government, and eager to exchange it for the domination of the magnificent Napoleon!

FRANCE.

PARIS, JAN. 6.—The four sail of the line and four frigates, which the French army found at Lisbon, are fitting out for sea.—The House of Braganza has lost Portugal, and shares the fate of all the Princes who place confidence in England. To have deprived the English of the excellent ports of Lisbon and Oporto, is an important advantage obtained by France. Another part of the ancient Continent is thus rescued from English influence. If the independence of the United States has proved useful to France, the new establishment of the House of Braganza in another part of the new Continent prepares fresh advantages for her.—The relations of the Court of Brazils with Portugal, and the commercial connections which it will be necessitated to form with Europe, cannot but prove beneficial to France and her allies.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, DEC. 23.—The Court Gazette of this day contains the following article from Turkey:—

"Field-Marshal Prince Prosorowski left Bucharest the 2d of December, with Generals Tzitzere, Hanting, Kinchnikow, and General Apravin. The Servian insurgents, who were included in the armistice of Slobosia, continued, notwithstanding, to act in a hostile manner against the Turks. Several engagements have lately taken place between them and the Ottoman troops. The Porte addressed, in the last day of November, a Firman to all the Pachas in the European and Asiatic provinces, stating, that as all the conditions of the armistice have not yet been fulfilled, they must immediately put themselves in march with their troops, to reinforce the Grand Vizier's army in cantonments between Schumla and Adrianople, the strength of which has considerably decreased.

The Dardanelles, as well as the whole coast, as far as Alexandria, are again closely blockaded by the English. According to the last letters from Trieste, that port is put in the most respectable state of defence.—Moniteur, Jan. 5.

In consequence of the convention, concluded the 10th of October, at Fontainbleau, between the Courts of Austria and France, the town and fortress of Braunau was delivered up, on the 10th of this month, by M. Otto, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, from the Emperor of the French to the King of Bavaria, into the hands of Commissioners appointed for that purpose.

The same day, at eight in the morning, the French garrison, under the orders of the General of Division, Merle, set out from Braunau, and took the road to Munich.

DENMARK.

ELSINEUR, DEC. 17.—Two Masters of ships, M. M. Petersent and Wichmann, from Altona, who have arrived at Gottenburgh, report, that, at their departure, intelligence had been received that above fifty vessels, making part of the last English convoy, had been forced, by stress of weather, to take refuge in the ports of Norway, where they had been declared legal prizes.—Moniteur, Jan. 2.

HOLLAND.

AMSTERDAM, DEC. 28.—Extracts are circulated here of the Official Note by which England has given an answer to the offer of mediation, which was made by Russia. That note, signed Canning, contains in substance—

"That His Britannic Majesty would have accepted, with pleasure, the mediation of Russia, if he had received information respecting the cases upon which the Mediator hoped to have re-established the general peace. But his Majesty the Emperor of Russia, after having repeatedly promised to his Britannic Majesty not to conclude any peace with France, without having assumed the independence of the German Provinces, had, notwithstanding, by the Treaty of Tilsit, which, far from containing any stipulations on that head, seemed to submit the whole of Germany to the wishes of France. Now His Britannic Majesty cannot enter into any negociation with France, unless the complete restitution of the Electorate of Hanover be admitted as a preliminary basis. By an unconditional acceptance of the Russian mediation, His Britannic Majesty would have reason to fear lest his German States should become a French Province. Therefore, his Britannic Majesty places his confidence in the efforts of his people, in order to force his implacable enemy into more conciliatory measures," &c. &c.—The Argus.

TURKEY.

SEMLIN, DEC 18.—All the Russian troops which were in Wallachia, Moldavia, and Bessarabia, have withdrawn into their winter quarters, and this movement they made as soon as it was known that the army of the Grand Vizier had evacuated Lower Bessarabia. Some regiments only remain in the entrenched camps formed before Giurgewo, Brailow, and Ismael, were barracks have been constructed; other troops have returned to Poland. The greatest part of the above troops are in cantonments in Wallachia. Prince Prosorowski, Commander in Chief, has been promoted to the rank of Field-Marshal.—The three free corps of Ypsilanti, Milviadorsi, and Nilkitch, which were raised last year, are to be disbanded.—All the troops who composed the army of the Grand Vizier were dismissed, as soon as the army had reached the environs of Adrianople, pursuant to a Firman of the Grand Seignior.—Moniteur.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

THURSDAY, JAN. 21.

This day the House met pursuant to his Majesty's Proclamation. At three o'clock the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Camden, Lord Aylesford, and Lord Dartmouth, sat in their robes, as his Majesty's Commissioners, and the Commons being in attendance, the Chancellor informed them that it was inconvenient for his Majesty to attend in person to open his Parliament, but had issued a Commission for that purpose, which the Clerk would read. The Commission being read, the Chancellor then delivered the following

SPEECH FROM HIS MAJESTY.

"MY LORDS AND GENTLEMEN,

"We have received his Majesty's commands to assure you, that in calling you together at this important conjuncture of affairs, he entertains the most perfect conviction, that he shall find in you the same determination with which his Majesty himself is animated, to uphold the honour of his Crown, and the just rights and interests of his people.

"We are commanded by his Majesty to inform you, that no sooner had the result of the Negociations at Tilsit confirmed the influence and controul of France over the Powers of the Continent, than his Majesty was apprized of the intentions of the enemy to combine those Powers in one general confederacy, to be directed either to the entire subjugation of this kingdom, or to the imposing upon his Majesty an insecure and ignominious peace.

"That for this purpose, it was determined to force into hostility against his Majesty, States which had hitherto been allowed by France to maintain or to purchase their neutrality; and to bring to bear against different points of his Majesty's dominions the whole of the naval force of Europe, and specifically the fleets of Portugal and Denmark.

"To place those fleets out of the power of such a confederacy, became therefore the indispensible duty of his Majesty.

"In the execution of this duty, so far as related to the Danish fleet, his Majesty has commanded us to assure you, that it was with the deepest reluctance that his Majesty found himself compelled, after his earnest endeavours to open a Negociation with the Danish Government had failed, to authorise his Commanders to resort to the extremity of force, but that he has the greatest satisfaction in congratulating you upon the successful execution of this painful, but necessary service.

"We are further commanded to acquaint you, that the course which his Majesty had to pursue with respect to Portugal, was happily of a nature more congenial to his Majesty's feelings.—The time and unreserved communication by the Court of Lisbon of the demands and designs of France, while it confirmed to his Majesty the authenticity of the advices which he had received from other quarters, entitled that Court to his Majesty's confidence in the sincerity of the assurances by which that communication was accompanied.

"The Fleet of Portugal was destined by France to be employed as an instrument of vengeance against Great Britain. That fleet has been secured from the grasp of France, and is now employed in conveying to its American dominions the hopes [illegible] of the Portuguese Monarchy. His Majesty implores the protection of Divine Providence upon that enterprize, in the preservation of a Power so long the ally of Great Britain; and in the prospect of its [illegible] the New World with augmented strength and

"We have it in command from his Majesty to inform you that the determination of the enemy to excite hostilities between his Majesty and his late Allies, the Emperors of Russia and Austria, and the King of Prussia, has been but too successful; and that the Ministers from those Powers have demanded and received their passports.

"This measure, on the part of Russia, has been attempted to be justified by a statement of wrongs and grievances which have no real foundation. The Emperor of Russia had indeed proffered his Mediation between his Majesty and France. His Majesty did not refuse that Mediation, but he is confident you will feel the propriety of its not having been accepted until His Majesty should have been enabled to ascertain that Russia was in a condition to mediate impartially, and until the principles of the basis on which France was ready to negociate were made known to his Majesty.

"No pretence of justification has been alledged for the hostile conduct of the Emperor of Austria, or for that of his Prussian Majesty. His Majesty has not given the slightest ground of complaint to either of those Sovereigns, nor even at the moment when they have respectively withdrawn their Ministers, have they assigned to his Majesty any distinct cause for that proceeding.

"His Majesty has directed that copies of the Correspondence between his Majesty's Ambassador and the Minister for Foreign Affairs of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, during the Negociation at Tilsit, and the official Note of the Russian Minister at this Court, containing the offer of his Imperial Majesty's Mediation between his Majesty and France, together with the answer returned to that note by his Majesty's command; and also copies of the official notes, presented by the Austrian Minister at this Court, and of the answers which his Majesty commanded to be returned to them, should be laid before you.

"It is with concern that his Majesty commands us to inform you, that, notwithstanding his earnest wishes to terminate the War in which he is engaged with the Ottoman Porte, his Majesty's endeavours, unhappily for the Turkish Empire, have been defeated by the machinations of France, not less the enemy of the Porte than of Great Britain.

"But while the influence of France has been thus unfortunately successful in preventing the termination of existing hostilities, and in exciting new war against this Country, his Majesty commands us to inform you, that the King of Sweden has resisted every attempt to induce him to abandon his alliance with Great Britain; and that his Majesty entertains no doubt that you will feel with him the sacredness of the duty which the firmness and fidelity of the King of Sweden impose upon his Majesty, and that you will concur in enabling his Majesty to discharge it in a manner worthy of this Country.

"It remains for us, according to his Majesty's command, to state to you that the Treaty of Commerce and Amity between his Majesty and the United States of America, which was concluded and signed by Commissioners duly authorized for that purpose, on the 31st of December, 1806, has not taken effect, in consequence of the refusal of the President of the United States to ratify that instrument.

"For an unauthorised act of force committed against an American ship of war, his Majesty did not hesitate to offer immediate and spontaneous reparation. But an attempt has been made by the American Government to connect with the question which has arisen out of this act, pretensions inconsistent with the Maritime Rights of Great Britain; such pretensions his Majesty is determined never to admit. His Majesty, nevertheless, hopes that the American Government will be actuated by the same desire to preserve the relations of Peace and Friendship between the two Countries which has ever influenced his Majesty's conduct, and that any difficulties in the discussion now pending may be effectually removed.

"His Majesty has commanded me to state to you, that in consequence of the Decree by which France declared the whole of his Majesty's Dominions to be in a state of blockade, and subjected to seizure and confiscation, the produce and manufactures of his Kingdom, his Majesty resorted, in the first instance, to a measure of mitigated retaliation; and that this measure having proved ineffectual for its object, his Majesty has since found it necessary to adopt others of greater vigour, which, he commands me to state to you, will require the aid of Parliament to give them complete and effectual operation.

"His Majesty has directed Copies of the Orders which he has issued with the advice of his Privy Council upon this subject to be laid before you, and he commands us to recommend them to your early attention."

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

"His Majesty has directed the Estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before you, in the fullest confidence that your loyalty and public spirit will induce you to make such provision for the public service as the urgency of affairs may require.

"His Majesty has great satisfaction in informing you, that notwithstanding the difficulties which the enemy has endeavoured to impose upon the Commerce of his subjects, and upon their Intercourse with other Nations, the resources of the Country have continued in the last year to be so abundant, as to have produced, both from the permanent and temporary revenue, a receipt considerably larger than that of the preceding year.

"The satisfaction which his Majesty feels assured you will derive, in common with his Majesty, from this proof of the solidity of these resources, cannot but be greatly increased, if, as his Majesty confidently hopes, it shall be found possible to raise the necessary Supplies for the present year without any material addition to the public burthens.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"We are especially commanded to say to you, in the name of his Majesty, that, if ever there was a just and National war, it is that which his Majesty is now compelled to prosecute.—The war is in its principle purely defensive. His Majesty looks but to the attainment of a secure and honourable Peace; but such a Peace can only be negociated upon a footing of perfect equality.

"The eyes of Europe and of the world are fixed upon the British Parliament.

"If, as his Majesty confidently trusts, you display in this crisis of the fate of the Country, the characteristic spirit of the British Nation, and face unappalled the unnatural combination which is gathered around us, his Majesty bids us to assure you of his firm persuasion, that under the blessing of Divine Providence, the struggle will prove successful and glorious to Great Britain.

"We are lastly commanded to assure you, that in this awful and momentous contest, you may rely on the firmness of his Majesty, who has no cause but that of his people, and that his Majesty reciprocally relies on the wisdom, the constancy, and the affectionate support of his Parliament.

Lord Galloway rose to move an Address of Thanks. The Speech, of itself, he said, joined to the notoriety of the events to which it referred, left him but little to do in calling for their unanimous concurrence in the Address which he should propose to be carried to the foot of the Throne. It had, it was true, been reported that a difference of opinion prevailed respecting one of the topics in his Majesty's Speech, but this rumour, he trusted, was unfounded; for he was wholly unable to conjecture by what arguments it could be sustained. The restoration of peace between Russia and France was immediately followed by a plan for the general armament of the Continent against this country. To this scheme Denmark and Portugal were called upon to subscribe their navies. It became the indispensable duty of Ministers to take the most effectual measures to frustrate that intention; and this with a promptitude which entitled them to the gratitude of the country, they had accomplished. The hostile dispositions of Denmark had been evinced at various periods during the last seven years, and the success of the expedition to Copenhagen enabled those who could look with a seaman's eye to convince themselves she was on the eve of declaring herself a party to the confederacy against our maritime rights. Her arsenals were surcharged with stores, and her fleet was in a forward state of preparation. Of the justice and necessity of the attack, the country at large entertained the highest approbation; and had it not been adopted, he had not the least doubt that the forbearance of Ministers would, in such case, have furnished a copious topic of censure. Of the emigration of the Court of Lisbon he could not speak in terms too high. He had the most confident expectation that, with a spirit of liberal policy and strict friendship on both sides, it would produce the most beneficial effects to the commercial and naval interests of this kingdom. This event was one more to be rejoiced in, when he looked to our rupture with Russia. If sufficient encouragement was given for the raising of hemp and flax in the Brazils, and in some of our own dominions, we should have cause to bless the day which, by suspending our intercourse with Russia, for ever relieved us from that dependency upon her, in which we were hitherto held, for the supply of articles so indispensably necessary for naval purposes. With regard to America, every disposition towards conciliation had been evinced by his Majesty's Government, and particularly by their disavowing the attack on the Chesapeake. If he differed from them on this head, it was in thinking that they had been rather liberal in their concessions. His Lordship then briefly touched on the remaining topics of the Speech, and earnestly urged the importance of unanimity in Parliament, both with a view to its impression upon the people of this country and the Confederated States of the Continent, and as to its obvious tendency to accelerate the period of a secure and honourable peace. He concluded with reading a long motion, which echoed the leading particulars of his Majesty's Speech.

Lord Kenyon seconded the Address.

The Duke of Norfolk said, there was one point, with regard to which he was under the necessity of disturbing the unanimity of their Lordships' vote on the occasion; namely, that part of the Speech which related to the attack upon Copenhagen. No information whatever had yet been laid before Parliament to justify that measure. Ministers stated the reluctance evinced by his Majesty with regard to it: he wished they could shew that they entertained a similar feeling. Parliament was told, in the King's Speech, that the eyes of all Europe were now upon them. It was for that reason, he wished Parliament to postpone its decision upon the conduct of Ministry, as to Denmark, until the fullest information was presented them to shew that she had entered into hostile engagements against us. He should, therefore, move, as an Amendment, to leave out the whole of the paragraph in the Address relative to the attack upon Copenhagen.

Lord Sidmouth expressed the extreme regret with which he found himself compelled to concur in the Amendment. He had come down with an anxious hope that nothing would be inserted in his Majesty's Speech which should create a difference of opinon. He was sorry that he had been disappointed. He long clung to the opinion, and he would not now abandon it, that Ministers would furnish Parliament and the country, with cogent reasons, founded on justice and sound political expediency, for their conduct towards Denmark, but till they did so, no man could be required to give up the honest feelings of his heart and understanding, and his attachment to the ancient policy of the British Nation. Admitting, with the Noble Mover of the Address, that the arsenals of Denmark abounded with naval stores, it was clear to his mind, that they could not have been intended against this country, because at the time they were collecting, Russia, who was supposed to have the greatest influence over her councils, was at war with France. To the alledged secret articles at Tilsit, Denmark could not have been a party at the time the attack upon her was meditated, for the Treaty of Tilsit was signed on the 8th of July, and on the 3d of August Zealand was invested. He was indeed very much misinformed if the Crown Prince of Denmark did not owe the capture of his fleet to his leaving Zealand destitute of defence, with the view of accumulating a respectable force in Holstein, for the avowed purpose of resistance to the French army, then menacing that Province. He had, in fact, collected an army in Holstein to the number of 26,000 men, a measure which was totally irreconcileable with the idea of intentional hostilities against us. Sufficient time had not elapsed for making him a party to the Continental system by compulsion. But supposing such a measure to have been in the contemplation of the two Emperors, how stood the question? Ministers alleged, that Holsteinbeing once in the possession of France, Zealand was at her mercy. The force of this allegation was completely destroyed by their offering to defend that island, and to guarantee the whole of the Danish territories, should their terms be accceded to. The Crown Prince could have had no idea of an effectual defence of Holstein, but he seemed to have no doubt of his ability to defend Zealand; and if he was not adequate to this, how could the small force we could spare place him in a state of complete security. He was sorry to see a paragraph in the King's Declaration, calculated to pervert the moral feelings of the British people. We were told, that we should fight the enemy with his own weapons. What! were we to imitate that monstrous system of iniquity and oppression, which characterised the progress of French dominion? This was not the principle by which we had risen to our present enviable condition. —From the æra of our glorious Revolution, it had been our boast to act on that homely maxim, which was in the mouth of every Englishman, as the standard of his private conduct. He agreed entirely with an illustrious statesman, now no more, (Mr. Fox) that in our treatment of other states we should so act, as that, though the arms of their inhabitants might be uplifted against us, their convictions, their feelings, and their good wishes, must be with us. With respect to America, he recommended a continuation of conciliating conduct, but without sacrificing a single iota of what was essential to national security. He deprecated the invidious terms of "our maritime rights, and our maritime sovereignty;" we asserted no rights, but those which formed part of the law of nations. He approved of the disavowal of the principle on which the attack of the Chesapeake frigate took place. He was sorry to hear the language which was held as to the unimportance of a contest with America, for it would prove a great calamity to both states. With regard to peace, he thought it was not to be obtained by talking of it, or petitioning for it; but he would never countenance any attempt to throw obloquy on the efforts of any portion of people who, thinking differently, availed themselves of their undoubted constitutional right to state their sentiment. On this topic he adverted to, and highly panegyrised, the language held by Lord Milton to his constituents. He concluded with again expressing his regret that Ministers had called for the approbation of Parliament to the attack of Copenhagen without previous information.

Lord Grenville pursued a similar course with Lord Sidmouth. He reprobated the silence with regard to the information which caused the attack on Copenhagen, the Orders of Council, and the severity of our conduct to America. He blamed Ministers highly for not making the State of Ireland a part of his Majesty's Speech.

Lord Hawkesbury, in a long speech, defended the attack on Copenhagen. The Ministers could not state their authority, nor lay their information upon the table, from obvious motives; but they had information that justified their proceeding. He enumerated the several heads of information. First, they learned that there were secret engagements in the Treaty of Tilsit; and that the view of the parties was to confederate all the Powers of Europe; and particularly to engage or seize on the fleets of Denmark and Portugal to annoy this country. They heard this from their public Ministers then abroad.—They heard it from their faithful Ally, Portugal. They also received information of the hostile intentions of Denmark from a quarter to which they had often been indebted for the first knowledge of the designs of Bonaparte; from, or rather through the disaffected in Ireland. They learned that Ireland was to be attacked from two points—Lisbon and Copenhagen; and they never found the information of these persons, however they come by it, false. And, finally, they had a confidential communication, that, in the Council of the highest authorities in Copenhagen, the matter was discussed, whether, on an option being put to them, that they should join either England or France, an option which they understood was to be put to them, they resolved that they would join France. Having learnt this, Ministers would have been traitors if they had not taken steps to secure the fleet. The Noble Lord then went over the several other topics of Lord Grenville's speech—Portugal, America, the Orders in Council, and the State of Ireland. On the two last he declined saying much. The one would come regularly before them on a future day, and the less that was said of the other the better.

After several other Noble Lords had delivered their sentiments on each side, the amendments were negatived, and the Address carried without a division.—Adjourned to Wednesday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, JAN. 21.

After his Majesty's Speech was read, Lord Hamilton rose to move the Address. It was his maiden speech; and if it contained nothing new, it was, at least, appropriate to the occasion. He spoke highly of the warlike triumphs of the nation, and he anticipated more. It had been, and it must be, said he, that war must be the only channel and source of our national security. Such was the uncertainty of any peace lasting, that in his mind it is more than probable the expence of a peace establishment would be great, and always attended by the hazard of being suddenly and unexpectedly violated. The Noble Lord then made a transition to his Majesty's Ministers, whom he highly complimented for husbanding the resources of the country in the manner they had done. They had done their duty, and were doing it daily, and they highly merited the countenance and support both of that House and the country at large.

Mr. Ellis seconded the motion.

Lord Milton vindicated his conduct with respect to the different meetings in Yorkshire, but could not but regret, notwithstanding what he had heard from his Majesty's Speech, of the flourishing state of the finances of the country, that there were many hundred mechanics at this moment destitute in the county he had the honour to represent, from the evil tendency of the policy pursued by his Majesty's Ministers.

Mr. George Ponsonby observed, that the Speech now read from the Chair was the longest he had ever heard of, and embraced a greater variety of topics than any other. It appeared, by the Address, that Ministers required the unqualified approbation of Parliament, for the affair of Copenhagen, and differed materially in opinion with the Noble Mover and Seconder, for he could never reconcile himself with the idea that the Ruler of France had the intention of seizing on the Danish navy, he was bound to say that Ministers could not produce the least ground for the supposition. Ministers had, therefore, only anticipated what they imagined he might do. With respect to America he had nothing to say, as the papers were not laid upon the table, that question must rest for the present; but the state of Ireland, on which the Speech was silent, required an immediate consideration.—He pledged himself to bring forward, as soon as possible, the affairs of Copenhagen, which he considered involved with its disgrace the character of the British nation.

Mr. Milnes at great length vindicated the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers, and took a clear and comprehensive view of the situation of the Powers of Europe, with their influence and connections with France: but yet, war in the present instance was absolutely necessary for our existence as a nation.

Mr. Whitbread then rose, and said, that from what he heard, it was impossible for him to remain silent after what had fallen from the last Speaker. He deprecated in strong terms the Copenhagen expedition, which he considered not only unjust, but extremely dishonourable. The nation was told, it was a measure of necessity to plunder the stores of 16 or 18 hulks, a few tons of hemp and iron, when at the same time Ministers had not the slightest proof that Denmark was to make a common cause with the enemy against this country. After alluding to the emigration of the Royal Family of Portugal, which Ministers took the merit of to themselves, which he as an individual totally denied, as it appeared clearly from the Proclamation of the Prince Regent, that they had no share in influencing that Court in its final determination. He then said that there was now as good an opportunity of making Peace with France as ever, and he had not the smallest doubt, if Ministers were serious, but they might obtain it on honourable terms. Mr. Whitbread concluded with calling the attention of Ministers to the state of Ireland; something must be done, otherwise that country would be inevitably lost to the British Empire.

Mr. Secretary Canning, at considerable length, and with peculiar force, vindicated the measures which he and his colleagues adopted towards Denmark and other Powers; but did not think it either prudent or expedient to disclose the source of information which guided their determination respecting the former Power.

Mr. Sheridan contended, from good information, that all the naval stores taken from Denmark were not sufficient for the wear and tear of the British Navy for one month; and also that the Danes had even captured 35 or 36 of our merchantmen, laden with naval stores; so that we had not much to boast of on that score. He concluded by giving notice of a motion on the state of Ireland in the course of the Session.

Lord Henry Petty spoke at considerable length against the Address, as did also the Hon. Colonel Montague Matthew.

The question was at length carried without a division, and the House adjourned at one o'clock in the morning.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22.

The House met about half past three o'clock, and after passing some private Bills, the Speaker issued his writ to elect a Burgess for the Borough of Castle Rising, in the room of the Hon. Charles Bagot, who has accepted of the Chiltern Hundreds.

Sir Francis Burdett took the usual oaths and his seat on the second row of the Opposition Bench. He appeared in excellent health and spirits.

A Messenger from the Board of Military Enquiry presented at the Bar the Fifth Report of that Board, which was ordered to lie on the table.

The usual Committees were appointed and the Standing Orders of the House renewed, when new writs were issued by the Speaker for the borough of Tregony, in the room of Godfrey Wentworth, Esq. who has accepted of the Chiltern Hundreds; and the borough of Tiverton, in the room of the Hon. Richard Ryder, appointed one of the Commissioners of his Majesty's Treasury.

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Petitions, complaining of undue elections, were presented against the returns of Members for the following places, which were ordered to lie on the table, and to be taken into consideration, viz. Two for Banbury, on Tuesday, the 2d of February, at three; Saltash, on the same day, at half past three; Chip-ham, on Thursday, the 4th of February, at three; Saltash Right of Election, on Tuesday, the 9th of February, at three: two for Horsham, same day, at half past three; Evesham, on Thursday, the 11th of February, at three; County of Sussex, on Tuesday, the 16th of February, at three; Dublin University, same day, at half past three; Renfrewshire, on Thursday, the 24th of March, at three; County of Nottingham, on Thursday, the 18th of February, at half past three; and Penrhyn, on Tuesday, the 23d of February, at three.

Lord Folkstone gave notice, that he would on Tuesday next name a certain day to take into consideration the Oude Papers.

Mr. Banks likewise gave notice, that he would on Tuesday next submit a motion, the intention of which is to prevent the disposal of places and pensions in reversion.

The Hon. G. Ponsonby gave notice, that he would on Tuesday next move for the production of certain papers relative to the Expedition against Copenhagen.

The Speaker gave notice that no Private Bill would be received after the 26th of February, nor no Report after the 28th of March next.

On the Report of the Address to his Majesty, voted yesterday, being brought up, Mr. J. M'Donald rose and said, that after having heard his Majesty's Speech read from the Chair, and the debate which ensued, he was astonished that Ministers should, for their own sake, refuse to give, not only Parliament, but the Public, explicit information respecting the affair of Copenhagen, which in the present instance he, and every other person who thought independently, considered mysterious and disgraceful. He then contended, that silence was a proof of their having no information of the Secret Articles of the Treaty of Tilsit; and that Denmark was sacrified to the chimerical dreams of fatal anticipation, for it was impossible, if an eagle had flown with the intelligence of the Treaty of Tilsit, it could possibly be in Downing-street before Admiral Gambier appeared off Copenhagen.

Mr. Fuller, in a few words, defended the policy of crippling Denmark, and wished that "all the birds which had been at the Treaty of Tilsit, had been caught by his Majesty's able and distinguished Ministers."

Mr. Hibbert highly applauded the conduct of the Clothiers of Yorkshire, for petitioning his Majesty for peace, as the sentiments their petition contained were absolutely wrung from them by their sufferings.

Mr. M. A. Taylor very forcibly censured the conduct of Ministers in the affair of Copenhagen. He then said, that the Committee at Leeds applied to him for his advice, but he told them, in the first instance, he would not harrass the Government of the country. They then applied to him to be Chairman of their Meetings, which he declined; but, notwithstanding, the Clothiers were certainly justified in their proceedings, they were actuated by direful necessity; they were, he lamented to say, starving; and hunger will, according to the proverb, break through a stone wall. The late Orders of his Majesty in Council were lamentably the cause of that calamity which they now endured, for the Clothiers were indisputably convinced, that had it not been for those Orders, their manufactures would, in spite of every other obstacle, find their way into every part of the Continent of Europe. He then very forcibly called upon the Public in general to be unanimous in petitioning the King, to dismiss his present disgraceful Ministers, who, by their weakness and wickedness, involved this country in ruin.

Mr. W. Smith stated, that there never, in the annals of the world, had occurred such a case as that of Denmark. With regard to Petitions for Peace, he represented a large and populous city, that of Norwich, the trade of which had suffered materially by the war. The citizens of Norwich had consulted him on the propriety of petitioning the King for Peace, but he had set his face against any thing of the kind at present, from an idea that Ministers were well disposed to negociate, and that they were as eager for peace as the poor starving manufacturers of that city. If, however, it turned out, that Ministers had rejected any proposition—any means of negociation—or any thing like an overture, his objections to petition for peace would be done away, and he should, without any scruple, lend his aid and assistance to his constituents in addressing his Majesty in the way recognized by the Constitution, as the inherent right of the subject.

Mr. Secretary Canning, in explanation of what he had stated last night, said that Ministers received a copy of the Treaty of Tilsit on the 8th of August last, but they had information of its nature some time before. There was nothing in the public Treaty which adverted to the measures alluded to in the Speech delivered by the Lords Commissioners. Ministers had not got the secret Articles of the Treaty, but only the substance of them. These articles were known before the projected expedition, destined to another quarter, sailed. The armament had been prepared for Stralsund, but after Ministers had attained a knowledge of the private stipulations in the Treaty of Tilsit, it was applied to another purpose. A large portion of the armament destined for Stralsund had actually sailed, when its destination was changed, and it was sent against Copenhagen.

The question was then put and carried, and the Report of the Committee appointed to frame the Address was brought up, read, and agreed to. It was ordered to be presented to his Majesty by such Members as were of his Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council.—Adjourned to Monday.

PROTEST.

DIE VENERIS, 21, JAN. 1808.

A motion was made to omit the fourth paragraph in the motion for an Address to the Throne (viz. the paragraph respecting the Seizure of the Danish Fleet), and the question being put, "That the said paragraph do stand part of the motion," the same was carried in the affirmative.

"DISSENTIENT,

"Because no proof of hostile intention on the part of Denmark has been adduced, nor any case of necessity made out, to justify the attack upon Copenhagen, without which the measure is, in our conception, discreditable to the character and injurious to the interests of this country."

W. FREDERICK	VASSAL HOLLAND.
RAWDON.	NORFOLK.
LAUDERDALE.	SIDMOUTH.
GREY.

DISSENTIENT, for the above reasons, and for those that follow:

Because, it has only been through the slow and painful progression of many ages, that civilised nations have emerged from a state of continual insecurity and violence, by the establishment of an universal public law, whose maxims and precedents have been long acknowledged to be of the same force and obligation, as the municipal constitutions of particular states. A system which has gradually ripened with the advancement of learning and the extension of commerce, and which ought to be held sacred and inviolate by all governments, as binding the whole civilized world under one politic and moral dominion.

Because, Alleged departures from the principles and authority of this public law in the earliest stages of the French Revolution were held out by the Parliament of Great Britain, as the origin and justification of the first war with Revolutionary France, and because in all its subsequent stages, the continuance of hostilities was uniformly vindicated in various acts of state, as being necessary for the support of the moral and political order of the world, against the avowed disregard and subversion of it by the different governments of France, in their groundless and unprovoked attacks upon the independence of unoffending nations.

Because, The people of Great Britain, on being repeatedly called upon by the King and Parliament to support the public law, thus alleged to have been violated, and to exhibit an example to the most distant ages, of inflexible national virtue, submitted to the heaviest burthens, and sacrificed the most essential advantages, rather than consent to any peace, which was considered by their Government as an abandonment of their Allies, or as an inadequate security for the rights and privileges of other nations: And Because, it appears in many state papers during the progress of the wars with the different Governments of France, that it was the duty and the interest of Great Britain, and her pledge to the world, to maintain inviolate the acknowledged principles of public law, as the only foundations upon which the relations of peace and amity between nations could be supported.

Because, It is the first and most indispensible maxim of public law, founded indeed upon the immutable principles of justice, that no violence should be offered by one State to another, nor any intrusion made upon the rights, property, independence or security of its inhabitants, except upon an aggression by such State, and the refusal of adequate satisfaction; or in the rare instance of indispensible necessity, involving national destruction, such as in the case of an individual would justify homicide, or destruction of property for self preservation; and because the observance of this rule should, if possible, be held more sacred by great and powerful nations, it being the very end and object of universal law to give perfect security to the weakest communities under the shadow of an impartial justice.

Because, The late attack upon Copenhagen, in a season of profound peace with the Crown and People of Denmark, and immediately following the solemn Declaration by the Crown Prince, of his resolution to maintain his neutrality, and to consider any nation as an enemy which should seek to disturb it, would, without some just cause, which in this case is wholly unsupported by proof, be a most manifest and unprincipled departure from the whole system of moral policy and justice, which the British Government had, as above, professed to act upon, inasmuch as any contempt or violation of public law by the Government of France, though it might release Great Britain from all observance of it, as far as regarded such offending belligerent, could not possibly destroy or affect its protective sanctions in her intercourses with friendly and peaceable states. On the contrary, it ought to have invested the Law of Nations with a more binding and sacred obligation, since the professed object and justification of our war with France at that very moment was to restore to a suffering world the good faith and security which had been lost by a contempt of its dominion.

Because, Information of a projected confederacy between France and Denmark, assumed, without evidence, to have been communicated to Ministers through channels which called, on their parts, for inviolable secrecy, might be a foundation for acquitting them from blame, if the question before the House had been the propriety of their acquittal or condemnation, yet it cannot possibly justify, in the absence of all proof, an Address to his Majesty, pronouncing their attack upon Copenhagen to be an act of indispensible duty; because, giving credit to the declarations of Ministers, that they had informations of such projected confederacy, it is impossible for this House to know whether they ought to have been acted upon to so dreadful an extent, without having before it, most precisely and distinctly, the specific nature of such communications so as to be able to estimate the credit due to them, not only from the facts themselves, but from the situations and characters of the persons by whom they were made.

The conduct, besides, of Ministers, in the whole transaction, is in manifest opposition to this principle of the attack.—They made no such charge upon Denmark when before Copenhagen, nor even pretended to have invaded her with the cause of war. Their language upon the spot, and even in the Address proposed to his Majesty, is the language of regret, a language utterly inconsistent with the vindication of a proceeding, which would have been as mild and forbearing against an enemy, as it was barbarous and treacherous against a friend. The position also of Denmark, when the assault was made upon her, is the strongest evidence to resist the presumption of an understanding with France. Her army was in Holstein, which France was menacing, whilst Zealand was left defenceless, and the ships dismantled, at a moment when the consciousness of a treaty or confederacy must have suggested to all the contracting or confederating parties, the necessity of concentrating the whole force of Denmark, to defend her capitol, and so secure her fleet.

Because, No evidence whatever has been laid before the House, to establish any hostile confederacy between Denmark and France, nor any design on the part of the former to depart from the strictest neutrality; on the contrary, the above-mentioned solemn declaration of the Crown Prince to the British Minister, ought to have been received by his Majesty's servants as the pledge of a firm resolution to maintain neutrality; and because nothing short of a hostile design in the Government of Denmark could justify the demand of her fleet, or the bombardment of Copenhagen to enforce the surrender of it.

Because, It was completely in the power of Great Britain to have protected the Danish Fleet from any hostile attack of France, which destroys the pretence of such an indispensible necessity as could alone justify even the slightest trespass upon a peaceable and unoffending state.

Because, Still assuming, in the absence of all evidence to the contrary, that the Government of Denmark was faithful to her neutrality, no speculation of the probable fall of her fleet into the possession or power of France, could possibly justify its hostile seizure by Great Britain. Such a principle would be utterly subversive of the first elements of Public Law, as being destructive of the independence of weaker States, in as much as it would create a jurisdiction in the stronger nations to substitute their own security and convenience for the general rule, and invest them also with the sole privilege of determining the occasions upon which they might consider them to be endangered; and because, to justify the attack and plunder of a weak unoffending Power, upon the assumption that a stronger Belligerent might otherwise attack and plunder her, would be to erect a new Public Law upon the foundations of dishonour and violence, making the tyranny of one nation a warrant for substituting the dominion of oppression for the sacred obligations of morality, humanity, and justice.

Because, Supposing it to have been not only probable, but even certain, that France could have succeeded in carrying away in the winter the ships and stores from Copenhagen, but without the consent of Denmark, faithful to her neutrality, the iniquity of that act, in sound policy, independently of all considerations of justice, ought to have been left to the French Government to perpetrate; because the carcases of the ships would have been the only fruit of an act of the deepest atrocity, whilst the indignation of a brave and generous people, now too justly directed against Great Britain, would then have been pointed against France; and Denmark, with the protection of our fleets, might have kept open the Baltic to our commerce, and extended our maritime means of restoring the tranquillity of the world.

Because, Until this attack upon Copenhagen shall receive vindication by proof of its justice, or condemnation, in the absence of it, from the Parliament of Great Britain, she has lost her moral station in the world, since the very system of wrong and violence, which she has so long confederated Europe to destroy, at the expence of her blood and resources, will have been established and confirmed by her own example.

Because, A whole nation ought not in the mean time to be dishonoured, nor its immemorial characteristic brought into question for the acts of Ministers; and because it is the duty of those subjects, who, by the Constitution of the Government, have the high privilege of perpetuating their sentiments upon the public records of their country; to vindicate themselves from the imputation of having acquiesced in acts of the greatest injustice.

LEEDS MEETING.—On Tuesday last a meeting of the Merchants, Manufacturers, and Inhabitants of Leeds and the adjacent neighbourhood, was held in the great area of the Mixed Cloth Hall, pursuant to public notice, for the purpose of petitioning his Majesty for Peace. The meeting was composed chiefly of the manufacturers in that part of the country, and consisted of between 8 and 10,000 persons. Mr. John Firth was called to the Chair.

The Chairman addressed the Meeting in a neat and appropriate speech, disclaiming all party views or motives, stating the object of the meeting to be solely for the general and national good of the country at large, and exhorting the Meeting to quiet and peaceable demeanor. He then proceeded to read several Resolutions, expressive of the feelings of the manufacturers, &c.

Mr. Bakewell, of Wakefield, read a draft of the intended Petition, in substance nearly as follows:—

The Petitioners assure his Majesty of their attachment to his person, and the principles of Government which placed his Majesty and his august Family on the Throne; and represent to his Majesty the distressed state to which great numbers of our merchants and manufacturers were reduced by the long continuance of the war, depriving them of foreign markets, whereby many workmen are left without employment, and the smaller manufacturers unable to provide for their families; and they express their apprehension of these calamities being increased by a war with America. They allude to the heavy taxes and addition to the national debt, and the increased annual expenditure of the country; while the power and territories of the enemy have been enlarged, and our allies have deserted us to seek his friendship and protection.

The Petitioners further express their fears, that should the war continue, many of the former allies of this country will be drawn into closer connection with France, and make amity with this country very difficult to be resumed. It implores his Majesty, as the father of his people, to adopt such measures as may appear expedient to restore to us the blessings of peace, and concludes with assuring his Majesty of their loyalty, attachment, and support, should the restoration of peace be retarded by any demand of the enemy, inconsistent with the honour and security of the realm, &c. &c.

The Petition was heard with approbation, and immediately afterwards the Meeting dissolved.

Neither Mr. Fowkes, Lord Milton, Mr. Wilberforce, nor any leading Gentlemen of the county, were present at the Meeting.

EXETER, JAN. 20.—This day Lieut. Halifax, of the Royal Lancashire Militia, whose engagement to walk thirty miles per day, for twenty successive days, has completed his laborious undertaking, and he was ushered into this city in triumph, preceded by the Regimental Band of Music, and accompanied by an immense concourse of people, both on horseback and on foot, who celebrated his victory with repeated huzzas.

LONDON GAZETTE EXTRAORDINARY.

Downing-Street, Jan. 20.

Captain Murphy, of the 88th regiment, Brigade-Major of his Majesty's forces at Madeira, has arrived at the Office of Lord Viscount Castlereagh, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, with a Dispatch, of which the following is an extract, from Major-General Beresford, dated Madeira, Dec. 29, 1807.

Extract of a Dispatch from Major-General Beresford, to Viscount Castlereagh, dated Madeira, Funchal, Dec. 29, 1807.

I have the satisfaction to communicate to your Lordship the surrender of the Island of Madeira, on the 24th inst. to his Majesty's arms.

We had, previously to the ships coming to anchor, sent to the Governor to surrender the Island to his Britannic Majesty, offering the terms we were authorised, which were acceded to. The troops were immediately landed, and before dark were in possession of all the forts, and had the 3d and 11th regiments encamped, with their field-pieces, a little to the west of the town.

In regard to unanimity and cordial co-operation, it is sufficient to say, it was Sir Samuel Hood I had to act with; and the object, the service of his country. His ardent zeal communicated to all the same sentiments, and the utmost unanimity prevailed.

I had the fullest reason to be satisfied with the zeal and ardour of all the officers and troops under my orders.

I have the honour to inclose the Articles of Capitulation which have been agreed upon.

Captain Murphy, of the 88th regiment, Brigade Major to the forces, will be the bearer, and communicate any further particulars your Lordship may be desirous of knowing; and I humbly recommend him to his Majesty's most gracious consideration.

Terms of Capitulation for the Island of Madeira and its Dependencies, agreed upon by his Excellency the Governor and Captain-General, Pedro Fagundes Bacellar d'Antas e Menezes, on the part of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, and by Rear-Admiral Sir Samuel Hood, Knight of the Bath, and Major-General Beresford, on the part of His Britannic Majesty.

Article I. That on the signing of the present treaty, the Island of Madeira and its dependencies shall be delivered up to the Commanders of His Britannic Majesty's forces, and to be held and enjoyed by his said Majesty, with all the right and privileges, and jurisdictions, which heretofore belonged to the Crown of Portugal.

II. It is agreed the said Island shall be evacuated and re-delivered to his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal, or to his heirs and successors, when the free ingress and egress to the Ports of Portugal and its Colonies shall be re-established as heretofore; and when the Sovereignty of Portugal shall be emancipated from the controul or influence of France.

III. For the present the arms and ammunition of all kinds to be delivered and placed under the possession of the British.

IV. Public property shall be respected and delivered at the same time, and under the same circumstances, with the Island. His Britannic Majesty, during the period his troops shall occupy the Island, reserving the use of all such property, and the revenues of the Island, to be applied to the maintenance of its religious, civil, and military establishments. For the above purpose all the public property, of whatever description, to be formally delivered up, and received by the Commissaries respectively appointed for that object.

V. All private property on the Island of Madeira, belonging to the subjects of his Royal Highness the Prince Regent of Portugal to be respected.

VI. The free exercise of religious worship to be maintained and protected as at present established.

VII. The inhabitants to remain in the enjoyment of the civil constitution and of their laws, as at present established and administered.

Admiralty Office, Jan. 20, 1808.

A Dispatch, of which the following is an Extract, has been received at this office, from Rear Admiral Sir Samuel Hood, K. B. &c. addressed to the Hon. Wm. Wellesley Pole, dated on board his Majesty's ship Centaur, Funchal Bay, Madeira, Dec. 29, 1807.

Extract of a Dispatch from Rear Admiral Sir Samuel Hood, K. B. dated Centaur, Funchal Bay, Madeira, Dec. 29, 1807.

Sir—I have the pleasure to acquaint you, for the information of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, the Island of Madeira has surrendered to his Majesty's forces confided to the command of Major-General Beresford and myself; and I have the honour to enclose you a copy of the Articles of Capitulation.*

The squadron named in the margin,† and transports, arrived on the 23d, off the Island of Porto Santo, and off this bay in the forenoon of the 24th; and though the ships were rather baffled by the light winds under the land, on entering the bay, every ship was anchored conformable to my wishes; and being placed within a cable's length of the forts, and the army ready to disembark, the troops were immediately allowed to land and take possession of the principal forts. Next day we met the Governor at the Palace of St. Lorenzo, and arranged the Articles of Capitulation, which were signed on the 26th, in presence of the Civil and Military Officers of the Island.

As Major-General Beresford will give all the other particulars relative to the Island to his Majesty's Secretary of State, I shall only add, from the cordial good understanding that has subsisted between us, as well as between the whole of the army and navy, had there been resistance, every thing we could have desired was to be expected from both services.

I have to express my entire satisfaction of the Captains, Officers, and men of his Majesty's ships on this service; and send my First Lieutenant, George Henderson, with this dispatch. He is a very excellent Officer, and I must refer their Lordships to him for any further information; and I beg leave to recommend him to their Lordships' notice.

* See Major-General Beresford's dispatch.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The attention of the Public has this week been chiefly engrossed by the Meeting of Parliament. The Address, by pointedly bringing forward the most important and most disputed political topics, has at once called forth all the energy of the Opposition. The chief point against which they have directed their attacks is the affair of Copenhagen: and the refusal of Ministers to give any direct proof that they had received previous information of the hostile disposition of Denmark, afforded them a scope too ample for censure and invective. It had been reported, that there existed some difference of opinion on this head between the Members of Opposition; but the contrary was very clearly demonstrated, by the energetic and decided disapprobation expressed by Lord GRENVILLE, of the measures adopted by Ministers. It is still more worthy of remark, that Lord SIDMOUTH, who has always been noted for the coincidence of his sentiments with those of HIS MAJESTY, expressed his disapprobation of the attack ON Copenhagen, with a degree of vehemence and acrimony which his Lordship seldom employs. This circumstance might give rise to some speculations, especially as HIS MAJESTY'S reluctance to the measure has not been concealed: but Lord HAWKESBURY, whose connection with the Court remains unimpaired, strenuously defended its propriety.

The Opposition did not chuse to try their strength against the Address, and therefore it was carried in both Houses without a division: but a Protest has since been entered on the Journals of the Lords by several Peers, against that clause in the Address approving the attack of Copenhagen, because no proof had been brought of any hostile intention on the part of Denmark, nor any case of necessity made out. Lord ERSKINE, in addition to the reasons adduced by others, has entered into a detail of his own reasons: he has examined the question by the law of nations, and minutely considered the respective conduct of the British and Danish Courts: from all which he concludes, that "Until this at-"tack on Copenhagen shall receive vindication by proof of "its justice, or condemnation in the absence of it, from "the Parliament of Great Britain, she has lost her moral "station in the world, since the very system of wrong and "violence, which she has so long confederated Europe to "destroy, at the expence of her blood and resources, will "have been established and confirmed by her own exam-"ple." Those important Protests we have inserted.

The official accounts have been published of the surrender of Madeira into our hands, as a deposit during the war. This is a matter of some consequence to this country, but of far more to the island, which derives its whole opulence from its wine trade with Britain. Had it fallen into the hands of our enemies, its inhabitants must have been ruined; and we cannot, therefore, wonder that the arrival of the British troops should have been so heartily welcomed. To this country, it might have been of some disadvantage had Madeira fallen into the hands of the enemy; but we can scarcely derive any new benefit from its possession. It affords no room whatever for mercantile speculation, as its whole trade has, for a long course of years, been engrossed by this country. It is a very convenient halting-place for our fleets on their voyages to the West and East Indies; but this convenience they fully enjoyed while it remained in the hands of the Portuguese. It may perhaps afford greater facilities as a station for our cruizers, while in our own hands; and for this advantage we shall have to maintain the garrisons of the island.

The Ambassadors of Austria, Prussia, and Russia have at length taken their leave of this country. The noted affection of Count STAHREMBERG to the interests of Britain, makes his departure be particularly regretted. He has left behind him a Secretary of Legation, to watch any favourable occurrences. The forced hostility of Austria can scarcely produce to us any sensible disadvantage; unless the interruption of our trade with her southern provinces. Prince STAHREMBERG sailed from Dover on Friday morning, for Calais, which place, it is thought, he reached about eight o'clock in the evening.

Their MAJESTIES and the Royal Family arrived at Windsor at three o'clock yesterday, escorted by a party of Dragoons, it having been a custom for the Royal Family to attend St. George's Chapel, at Windsor, every Sunday in the year, excepting during Lent.

Dispatches were said to have been received from Lord Collingwood at the Admiralty yesterday, but their contents have not transpired.

It was rumoured yesterday, that the Rochfort squadron, consisting of six sail of the line, had put to sea, and was pursued by Sir Richard Strachan. No intelligence of this sort had been received at the Admiralty, nor can the report be traced to any authentic source.

A vessel is arrived at Greenock, which left New York on the 22d of December. The evening before, she was informed that a general embargo was about to take place.—About two o'clock, when off Sandy Hook, she heard the firing of cannon, and saw several vessels that had been under weigh brought to in the Narrows. Neither Mr. Monroe nor Mr. Rose, it is said, had then arrived.

The King of Sweden has declared his unalterable determination to remain attached to the interests of Britain; and hence a war between him and Russia is deemed inevitable.

The following is the substance of the Charges preferred against General Whitelock:

1. Having, contrary to the tenor of instructions, in the summons to Buenos Ayres, required that the Civil Officers and Magistrates should be Prisoners of War, which, it is averred, is contrary to all the customs of War, and had a decided effect in inflaming the civil population to resistance.

2. Exposing the Army, in marching against Buenos Ayres, to a destructive discharge of musquetry from the town, without furnishing that Army with any means of defence or attack.

3. Not being present personally on the advance against Buenos Ayres; also not keeping open a communication between the main body of the troops and the detachment under General Craufurd, which compelled that Officer to surrender.

4. Surrendering the fortress of Monte Video without necessity, which was capable of making an effectual resistance against any force which could be brought against it.

In France a most important Decree has been issued by Buonaparte. All exportation is to be prohibited from the ports of France, without any exception. No merchantmen will sail from any port, with goods of any description whatever. By this measure, this ground of complaint is removed, which had been considered as a grievance by the Dutch, that the French were permitted to trade, while their allies were compelled to bear every privation. Now the French are the first who are called to endure all the sufferings inflicted by the barbarous policy of a tyrant, who would have been the fit sovereign and representative of the 10th to the 14th centuries. This same decree, it is expected, will be extended to Holland.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

HER MAJESTY'S BIRTH-DAY.

The festival in honour of the Birth of our most gracious QUEEN, who completed her sixty-third year on the 19th day of May last, took place on Monday last.

Soon after nine o'clock THEIR MAJESTIES, the Princesses, the Dukes of York, Clarence, Kent, Cumberland, and Cambridge, breakfasted together at the Queen's Palace. At a quarter past ten o'clock the Dukes of York and Cambridge mounted their chargers and rode to the Parade, where they inspected the brigade of Grenadiers and Light Infantry of the Guards, previous to which the Duke of Cambridge presented them with their State colours, bearing the Egyptian Sphinx, and other devices allusive of their services abroad. The Band appeared in new uniforms. The Blacks wore new turbans, adorned with blue beads and a profusion of silver lace. After parade, they proceeded to St. James's to do the Birth-day duty, pursuant to previous appointment.

At eleven o'clock the Princess Charlotte of Wales arrived at the Queen's Palace, to pay her respects.

About half-past twelve o'clock, HER MAJESTY, the five Princesses, the Princess Charlotte of Wales, the Dukes of Kent and Sussex, in three carriages, left the Queen's Palace, and went to St. James's.

Soon after two o'clock HER MAJESTY and the Princesses proceeded to hold the drawing-room. In an anti-room the Archbishop of Canterbury, as usual, delivered to HER MAJESTY a suitable oration on the occasion.

Forty boys belonging to Christ's Hospital attended, according to their charter, and were presented to HER MAJESTY by Alderman Shaw, in the room of Alderman Anderson, the President.

HER MAJESTY having taken her station, the New Year's Ode was immediately performed.

MEETING OF BANK PROPRIETORS.

Thursday a meeting was held at the Bank, of the Proprietors of Bank-Stock. At twelve o'clock a considerable number of persons were assembled, when the chair was taken, and after a few introductory observations, a letter from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, dated the 19th inst. was read. The letter respected, in part, five terms on which the national accounts were to be conducted by the Bank, if the proposition should meet with the concurrence of the Proprietors, until the public debt shall be reduced to three hundred millions. The accounts were to be kept on the same plan as that which had been hitherto adopted, without any alteration whatever, in consequence of the increased magnitude of the concern. The letter contained, further, a requisition of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the Bank Proprietors, to advance to Government three millions without interest; the payment to be secured by Exchequer Bills payable in six months after the signing of a definitive treaty of peace; the money to be advanced on the 5th of April next. This requisition was assented to. It was also resolved to present Government with 500,000*l.* as a consideration for the unclaimed Dividends, and benefits derived from the Charter from Government; and that the Bank, instead of receiving 270,000*l.* of Government, for the attention and assistance given to its affairs, would be satisfied to receive 200,000*l.* annually in future.

At six o'clock the glasses were closed, and delivered to the scrutineers, J. Layton, and W. H. Burgess, Esqrs. who declared the question to have been carried in the affirmative.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY LANE.

The performances of the last week have been:—

MONDAY,.... The Castle Spectre, with the new pantomime of Furibond.

TUESDAY,.... A Trip to Scarborough, with the pantomime.

WEDNESDAY, The Cabinet, with the pantomime.

THURSDAY,.. The Honey Moon, with the pantomime.

FRIDAY,..... Never acted, Something to Do, with the pantomime.

SATURDAY,.. The Siege of Belgrade, with the pantomime.

In the Castle Spectre Mrs. Eyre, the wife of a Gentleman who holds a respectable situation in Drury-lane Theatre, played Angela, without either delighting or offending us. Her person is not particularly beautiful, nor her conceptions exceedingly forcible; but her deportment appears unaffected, and her voice, though not powerful, is pleasing. We understand she wishes to engage herself for a secondary line of character, and, as far as we have had an opportunity of judging, we think her well qualified for such a situation. But, if we have been rightly informed as to the modesty of her expectations, we cannot help conceiving that she would have done more wisely in selecting for her first appearance a character of less importance, in the representation of which something less would, of course, have been expected.

On Wednesday, the 20th, a Mr. I. Smith appeared as Lorenzo in the Cabinet. The character was written chiefly for the introduction of music; and as far as music is concerned, it was very well performed by Mr. Smith. His voice is a counter-tenor; its compass is not great, and the lower tones are neither strong nor agreeable, but the upper notes are of a very superior quality.

We now proceed to the principal object of our theatrical notice.

We critics are obliged to take the good and the bad together. Other people may wait to hear the general opinion on a new piece, before they trouble themselves to see it; but we, as tasters for the town, must witness every new performance on the first night, and, like the Persian cup-bearers, if there be poison in the draught, we are the first who suffer. Most heavily, indeed, we did suffer on Friday last, from the representation of a new Comedy, called Something to Do. This title seems to concern, not the author, but the audience: for to sit still through five such acts as those of Friday night, is indeed something to do for a spectator, but to have composed five-and-twenty such acts would have been nothing to do for any writer.

A part of the play was taken from a French piece, called La Diligence de Joigny: and the rest of it might be either translated or original, for aught we could discover. If it was translated, we should advise the author to use more care in his next selection: if it was original we should advise him never to attempt dramatic composition again. The principal character is a young counsellor, eagerly hunting for the first fee: and in search of that fee he is contented to be barrister, attorney, conveyancer and rogue. Now, though the last of these titles is generally supposed to agree very well with any of the three former, yet the three former are seldom united in any society but the society that is painted in these comedies. There was a young officer desirous of marrying an heiress—that character, we believe, is quite in nature. We had an Irishman too, with all the propensities that are usually ascribed to the natives of the Sister Kingdom: but then he was always puffing himself: and though we may admit the propriety of painting an Irishman brave and generous, ardent and honourable, we are a little astonished when we see him coming forward to be the only publisher of his own praises. There were two old gentlemen, stingy and knavish, and our acquaintance with them did not lead us to desire any further knowledge of the family; but we were introduced per force to two young gentlemen, their nephews. One was a male creature of that character which is sometimes found in school-girls who have imbibed their minds with German novels; and he talked in the genuine style of the sentimental absurd. The other was a jockey prodigal, the exact counterpart of Goldfinch in Mr. Holcroft's Road to Ruin.

The ladies in this play appear to have been introduced as a dramatic illustration of Pope's famous aphorism.

Most women have no characters at all. And the women of this play had not only no characters, but, with the exception of the heroine alone, no business neither. And even the heroine seemed to be a very namby-pamby personage, walking about a good deal, but seeming to know as little what she meant to do, as the spectators themselves. However, if we may venture a guess at the intention of the author as to this part, we shall say that the young lady must have been intended for a girl of sentiment and gaiety mixed.

So much for character.—As to story, we could gather none; for the Author, aware perhaps of the difficulty which his audience must have in listening to his dialogue, was unwilling to fatigue their attention still further by requiring them to trouble themselves with plot. The Irishman made some bulls by way of points: but they were as remote from nature as were the jokes of the other characters from wit.

The Play was treated with the greatest fairness. The first Act, and a part of the second, went off extremely well. In the third, the disapprobation of the audience evidently shewed itself. In the fourth, discontent was for a little while allayed by a song from Mrs. Bland; but when she had disappeared, the tempest revived. The beginning of the fifth Act was greeted with coughing and hissing: and then the stage discovered a court, where on a sudden a Judge appeared. But the audience by this time were determined to judge for themselves: and the sacred officers of justice were so overwhelmed by the rage of the multitude, that lawyers themselves forget their impudence, and the curtain fell amid one universal uproar. After the Epilogue, which was terribly bold and patriotic. Mr. Decamp announced The Siege of Belgrade for the following night.

The condemnation of a play is not often undeserved; but it frequently happens that the hissing begins sooner than justice demands. On this occasion the author can lay no such "flattering unction to his soul;" for the sentence of last night was pronounced by one of the fairest and most impartial audiences we ever beheld. The unhappy poet has not declared himself; and as the piece came forward from darkness, so it has proceeded to oblivion.

CRIM. CON.

The conduct of a dashing female, the wife of a distinguished officer of considerable rank, will afford another opportunity for the display of eloquence amongst the lawyers in Westminster-hall; and it will also disclose some curious particulars, relative to the conduct of the lady, for the last three years, and that of her paramour, who is a Surry Esquire. The husband of the lady had been absent for three months previous to the 20th inst. on his duty as an officer, and his lady occupied apartments in Wigmore-street. By the vigilance of an old servant, who had served in the army 30 years, he had strong grounds to suspect that the conduct of his lady amounted to adultery with the squire; and some incidents having given him a full conviction of that fact, he made his Master acquainted with his suspicions. Some plans were laid out for the purpose of proving the lady's conduct, and it is reported that one of these proved her inconstancy to her husband, whom she dishonoured, at an Inn on the Western road, but a few miles from London, on Monday last. We are in possession of the names of the parties, which we must decline, at present, even hinting at; suffice it to say, that the old servant, and the waiter and chambermaid at the inn, are the witnesses to prove the act of adultery. The lady has one child, and she now lives apart from her husband.

OLD BAILEY.

No trial of importance occurred either on Monday or Tuesday.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 20.

RING DROPPING.—Edward Owen, a decent looking man, of the age of 68 years, was indicted for stealing a gold watch and a 5*l.* bank note, the property of Jane Croucher. The prosecutrix in this case was a very old lady, and was defrauded by the stale trick of the prisoner's pretending to find a diamond cross. She stated the transaction as follows:—that on the 4th of December, she was walking down Piccadilly, when the prisoner accosted her. He looked like an honest country farmer, and among other things he said, he had not been in London for seven years before, and that he would not live in such a dirty place if they would give him a house for nothing. As they approached the Park Gate, he stooped down, and said he picked up a little brown paper parcel; he observed that somebody must have lost it, and he wished the right owner had it; she said she wished so too; but she added, she wondered what it contained. He said they would go into the Green Park, where it was a little private, and they would examine. They accordingly went through the gate to the second seat; and there they opened the parcel, and it contained a red leather case which inclosed a glittering cross; a man passed by at that moment, and the prisoner spoke to him, telling him what they had found, and produced a receipt which was also in the parcel; the man read it, and said it was a receipt for 210*l.* for a brilliant diamond cross; he said they were both entitled to it as they had both found it, and proposed that the prisoner should give the lady a sum of money as security for her half when it was sold: the prisoner said, there was a man in town who had 50*l.* of his money in his hands, and proposed that they should go and get it; but the other man said it would be better to put the cross in the lady's hands, and she should give what money she had as a security for her producing the cross the next day: she said she had but 5*l.* which would not be enough; the man said, but you have a watch, ladies, and she accordingly gave up the 5*l.* note and the watch, and she was to be sure to take great care of the cross, and produce it the next day when he called upon her. She went home with the cross, when she discovered she had been duped: She immediately went to Bow-street, and, having described the man, an Officer took her the next morning to Leicester-fields, and there saw the prisoner passing; the Officer immediately apprehended him.

Colonel De Watteville proved that he paid the prosecutrix the 5*l.* note produced. Verdict—Guilty.

At six o'clock, when the Jury were to be changed, only eleven Jurors appeared, and neither of the summoning officers were present; the Court was therefore obliged to adjourn, having first fined the summoning officers 10*l.* each.

THURSDAY, JAN. 21.

This day sentence of death was passed on the following prisoners, viz.; Mary Carroll, alias Mitchell; Joseph Webb, John Davison, John Adams, George Russell, Elizath Minster, Martha Davis, George Rudd and Thomas Donavan, Isaac Castle, Elizabeth Crosby, George Humphries and Charles Brown, John Coates and Robert Badger, and John Matthews. Sarah Ward's judgment was respited on account of illness.—Twenty-six were ordered to be transported for seven years; three were ordered to be imprisoned in the House of Correction, Clerkenwell, for two years; six for twelve months; sixteen for six months; one in Newgate for two years; nine for lesser periods; two to be publicly, and six to be privately whipped; and eight were fined one shilling and discharged. The Sessions were adjourned to Thursday the 18th of February next.

Wednesday morning was executed, in the Old Bailey, John Mansel, for the crime of forging the will of a working man, his acquaintance, appointing himself sole executor, and receiving at the Bank of England, under that will, 300*l.* stock, the hard earned savings of his friend. The unhappy culprit has left behind him a wife far advanced in pregnancy. In his last interview with the Sheriffs he acknowledged the justness of his sentence.

PORT NEWS.

PLYMOUTH, JAN. 20.—Arrived from off Rochefort, the Defiance, 74, Captain Hotham, to refit, with the Neptune, a merchantman, her prize—She having been out on constant service nearly twelve months.—Came in a fine French West Indiaman, of near 500 tons burthen, with an extremely rich cargo of gum, coffee, sugar, indigo, &c. bound from the Isle of France to L'Orient; captured on the 8th of this month close in with the enemy's coast, by the Cambrian, of 44 guns, Captain Paget.—She sailed from the Isle of France about five months ago, in company with a corvette of 16 guns, and parted company in a gale of wind.—She had money on board, and the French Officers of the above prize, L'Acteon, are very anxious for her safety.—The Revolutionaire, of 44 guns, parted company with the Cambrian but the night before thy above rich capture. Admiral Lord Gardner, under whose orders the Cambrian sailed, is of course entitled to the 1-8th of the above valuable prize.

LLOYD'S LIST.

On the night of the 14th and the morning of the 15th was experienced a most violent gale of wind, at about WNW. The following accounts of losses and accidents to shipping, occasioned by it, have already been received.—The Lovell, Lake, from London to Weymouth, was deserted by the crew in the Downs, having been run foul of by the Flora, Salter, Master; it is supposed she sunk.—The Nottingham, Hawes, from Deptford to Portsmouth, run on shore on the Goodwin Sands, and was abandoned by the crew; she was afterwards got off by two boats from Ramsgate, but had received so much damage that she sunk in eight fathoms water.—The Betsey, Melhuish, from London to Portsmouth, foundered in the Downs; three of the crew drowned.—The Levant, Miller, from London to St. Michael's, was run foul of in the Downs by a large loaded collier brig, which carried away her bowsprit, foremast and all her main rigging, and broke both her cables; she then drove foul of three other vessels, and stove in her sides; in which state she was abandoned by the Master and the crew, who escaped most providentially in the boat. The Master is of opinion the Levant foundered soon after he quitted her.—The Ketch Hope, of Southampton, John Miller, master, was driven on shore near Walmer, but expected to be got off.—The Venus, White, from Shields to Gibraltar, was driven on shore at the North End of Deal Town, and is full of water.—The William and Henry, Selks, from London to the Cape of Good Hope, lost her foremast and bowsprit in the Downs, and is on shore near Ramsgate.—Many vessels cut or slipped their cables in the Downs, and went to sea; among them the Phœnix, Buna, bound to the Cape of Good Hope.—The Betsey, Lesby, from Newfoundland to London; the Frederick, Taylor; the Jenny and Phœbe, Erskine, both belonging to Sunderland; and a large Dutch-rigged hoy, were driven on shore near Margate.—The Mary and Ann, Cooch, from Surinam to London, was lost between the Downs and Margate. The Isabella and Ann, Rookes, from Newfoundland to London; the Earl Percy, Meek, from Quebec to London; the Richard of Chepstow, Fisher, put into Margate with loss of anchors and cables.—The Maida, Newcombe, from Cork to London, was driven on shore in Westgate Bay, near Margate, but is expected to be got off after taking out part of the cargo.—The American ship Union, Jacobs, got on shore near Margate, knocked off her rudder, lost an anchor and cable, but was carried into the Downs by two Margate boats, and is since got into Ramsgate.—The Shannon, Daniels, from London to Limerick; the Ann, Ball, from London to Meira; the Nile, Andrews, from Archangel to Falmouth; the Thomas and Judith from London to Portsmouth; the William from Cork to London, put into Ramsgate, with loss of anchors and cables.—The Success, Martin, from London to Portsmouth; the James of Sunderland, Liverstone, bound to Weymouth; the Nancy, of Blakeney, bound to Plymouth; the Baron Nelson, of London, Forster, bound to Gibraltar; the Yare, of Yarmouth, Holland.

ACCIDENTS.

A fire broke out at one o'clock yesterday morning at the Bedford Coffee-house, Covent Garden, which is situated contiguous to Covent Garden Theatre. The flames were discovered by a waiter issuing from a bed-chamber where a gentleman had recently gone to bed; but by the exertions of a host of attendants, and there being a plentiful supply of water, the flames were subdued after the room and furniture had been destroyed.

Early on Thursday morning, a young man of the name of Scott, son of Mr. Scott, Stationer, in Knightsbridge, Westminster, left his house for the purpose of skaiting on the canal in St. James's Park, and in two hours after he was conveyed to his father's house a corpse. It appeared the ice had given way from the number of persons who incautiously ventured on it, before it was sufficiently strong to bear the weight, and the deceased, in plunging to reach the shore, got under the ice, from which situation the spectators could not extricate him.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FIVE.

THE GRAND QUESTION EXAMINED;

WHETHER PEACE BE AT PRESENT ATTAINABLE, WITH SAFETY AND ADVANTAGE.

How far it is practicable to obtain the restoration of the blessings of secure and permanent tranquillity, is the great subject which at present occupies the attention, not only of our own countrymen, but of all surrounding nations. The wars of Britain and France may indeed be termed the wars of the universe; nor is there any nation so distant as that it may not dread to be involved in the disastrous consequences of their hostilities.—The present question ought therefore to be considered as connected with the dearest interests of the human race; and should claim our most serious attention, both as patriots and as men. With these considerations in view, we propose to give to the public the result of our serious reflection; and to examine how far a peace with France is attainable in the present circumstances, how far it would be safe for us to accept it, if it could be attained, and how far even a secure peace would be attended with advantages superior to those which we enjoy in a state of warfare. Party shall be out of the question, where the subject concerns the universe; and we shall laugh to scorn the miserable insinuations of those men who may represent our sentiments as unpatriotic, when they do not correspond with the views of an ignorant or a selfish faction.

Whether peace be attainable, must depend upon the nature of the points in dispute, and the disposition of the hostile governments. With regard to the points in dispute, the question is reduced within very narrow limits. In the year 1806, it was found, on opening a negociation, that all the circumstances which had for so many years kept the French and English Governments at variance, were done away. The Ruler of France offered to give up to us Hanover, Malta, the Cape, Pondicherry and its dependencies, to which he voluntarily added the island of Tobago; in return he only desired the cession of Sicily, for which he offered such a compensation in territory and money, as might be accounted adequate. Our own Ministers allowed that every concession was made by France which the interests of Britain required; and when they broke off the treaty, they confessed that it was solely done because the demands of our Ally, the Emperor of Russia, were not gratified as well as our own. If, therefore, there be any points in dispute, which render peace at present unattainable, they must have arisen since the failure of the last negociation. But in regard to our own immediate interests, we know nothing of this sort which has occurred; and the Ally, whose demands formerly caused the rupture of negociation, is now become the Ally of France, and a proffered mediator.

Let us now attend to the disposition of the French Government. Since the elevation of Bonaparte to the head of the French empire, peace has always been his interest as well as his avowed desire. He perceived how France was exhausted and impoverished by a long and wasting war, nor was he ignorant of the vast advantages which she might derive from internal improvement: he was therefore anxious to consolidate his empire, and to fix the affections of the people, by restoring to them those blessings of peace for which they so ardently longed, and which were become so indispensable to their prosperity. Hence we find, that all the continental wars, in which he has since been engaged, have been forced upon him; and that he has always readily entered into negociation as soon as his successes have rendered his enemies willing to listen to terms of accommodation. To this country, against which his resentment was supposed to be particularly inflamed, he has repeatedly made overtures for peace, even during the present war. At the commencement of 1805, he offered to negociate with us; but we were then busy in forming a great coalition against him, and we therefore refused to listen. After he had broke this coalition to pieces on the plains of Austerlitz, his language again became pacificatory; "I desire peace with England," said he to his Senate; "no resentments of mine shall retard it." At present, he has adopted many wild measures against our commerce, but with a view, as he affirms, of forcing us to peace; and though he has brought forward pretensions inconsistent with our naval superiority, he has frankly told us that these pretensions would, in a time of peace, be a mere dead letter. However active and keen an enemy he has been to Great Britain, he has never shewn any aversion to conciliation; nor can we wonder that such should be his disposition, when we consider what plans of empire he has formed, how much is still requisite for their permanent consolidation, and how greatly requisite a maritime peace is both for the satisfaction, the comfort, and the prosperity of his people.

But, however pacific the dispositions of Bonaparte may be, there are many who look upon our present Ministers as entirely bent upon the continuance of hostilities: their political antagonists brand them as a portion of the war-faction, and a similar opinion of them seems to prevail on the Continent. It cannot, however, be supposed that any Ministers would be anxious to continue their country immersed in the calamities of war, during which they themselves must encounter so many difficulties, if they thought that a safe and advantageous peace could be procured without compromising their own reputation. Some of our Ministers may, indeed, be led away by the opinion of those who imagine that scarcely any peace could, at present, be safe or advantageous; an opinion which we shall presently examine. Others might be very willing to waste the blood and treasure of their country, in showy enterprises, which might exalt their own name as war-ministers; but no opportunity for them now remains:—the iron coast of France is secure, and she would does not afford another Copenhagen. We suspect, however, that if Ministers are really averse to negociation, they are so, not from inclination, but from a dread of the clamour of a powerful faction at home. Some men, from selfish interest, some from apprehension, some from presumption, would be satisfied with no peace which could be negociated: even were Bonaparte to divest himself of all his conquests, and to reduce France within her ancient limits, scarcely would it appear sufficient to these men, unless he would also consent to burn all his ships, and demolish all his harbours. The fatal effects of the keen and incessant clamours of this war-faction, in harrassing and degrading the framers of the peace of Amiens, are still well remembered; nor can it be expected that even the pacifically inclined among our Ministers will subject themselves to such outrageous charges of folly and pusillanimity, until the public opinion has been distinctly and generally manifested in favour of peace.

Having thus shewn that there are no essential obstacles to the attainment of peace, let us now endeavour to estimate how far it would be safe for this country.—There unhappily exists in this country a degenerate class of men, who have so far lost the wonted magnanimity of Britons, as to believe that peace is utterly incompatible with safety; who see no security, unless when surrounded with vast fleets and armies; and who dread that they shall be every moment conquered and destroyed, unless the national bayonets are continually fixed, and the national cannon pointed against the enemy. These men are exactly of the same frame of mind with those miserable and suspicious tyrants, who lived in a perpetual apprehension of death, who never appeared in public, unless surrounded with guards and loaded with armour, and who at night barricadoed their doors against their very centinels.—And what was the result of such precaution?—Tyrants of this description seldom failed to perish in the manner they dreaded; while few monarchs, who have feared no injury because they intended no harm, have failed to live and to die in complete security.—Magnanimity produces the same effect in regard to an individual and a nation; and both the individuals and the people who seem always agitated by fears, never fail to provoke insult and aggression.

But let us examine the foundation of these apprehensions for our safety and peace. It is feared that Bonaparte will construct new flotillas, that he will build ships of war; that he will replenish his dock-yards with naval stores, and that he will be able again to recover that commerce which is now almost annihilated. But can we in war prevent Bonaparte from building flotillas? and was it not during war that he built the only flotilla which he ever built? The same may be said of ships of the line—was not that fleet constructed during war which it cost the life of Nelson to conquer? It is true that the dock-yards of France will be more readily replenished in peace; but so will also the dock-yards of Britain, which are at present debarred from their usual and most commodious resources. The commerce of France would revive, and the Continental commerce of Britain would also recover its pristine vigour: but these rivals would set forward with very unequal chances of success, while the one was possessed of capital, of skill, of unbounded credit, and the other obliged to struggle against the want of all these advantages.

But, in truth, Bonaparte, if we allow him to pursue his course in tranquillity, has far more momentous objects in view, than to attempt the conquest of Britain, which, he has himself declared to be a desperate undertaking, both in express words, and by his so long refraining from making the attempt. He has to regulate and establish that favourite plan of empire, in which France is to be the centre and ruler of the surrounding dependent kingdoms; he has to estimate from experience, the talents and the fidelity of his Viceroys: he has to tranquillize the minds of the numerous and various inhabitants of his dominions, who have been so long distracted by war, and are still agitated by ancient animosities: he has to attach the people to himself, his family, and his laws, by diffusing among them that quiet and prosperity which can only be obtained by the restoration of peace. He has no resources to spare for expensive and desperate armaments, and so far is he from being overburthened with troops, that he has already been obliged to anticipate the conscription of two years to provide for the defence of his extended Continental dominions. He will build no flotillas, nor undertake any desperate invasions, unless we compel him to it by frustrating his favourite plans for the consolidation of his empire.

But should he really have such attempts in view, should he actually prefer the desperate enterprise of conquering Britain, to the fulfilment of all his other great schemes; still his plans for this purpose could not be carried on in a corner, could not even be well commenced, before our vigilance should be aroused to check them in the outset. During the Peace of Amiens, the very report of armaments in the harbours of Holland and France, though now acknowledged to have been unfounded, threw the whole nation into alarm and made them hasten to arms. Peace must open to us the ports of the enemy, and place continually under our eyes every symptom of hostile movement.

But though peace might both be safe and desirable to the nation at large, yet there are men who imagine that it would be prejudicial to their own particular interests, and who would therefore make no scruple of entailing for ever on their country the calamities of war. It is not long since we have heard the Exchange resound with the ideas that war was the means of making the Commerce of the whole world flow into our harbours; and that peace would necessarily tend to diminish our prosperity, by dividing these advantages with other nations. These opinions are now at least consigned to silence, since Bonaparte has actually accomplished the gigantic scheme which was once accounted so chimerical, and has succeeded in excluding not only our own ships, but even the ships of neutrals laden with our manufactures, from every port in Europe. War has lost to us all the Commerce of Europe; it threatens to lose to us the whole Commerce of America; and surely it will not now be alleged that war enables Great Britain to command the whole Commerce of the World.

But it appears astonishing, that the most blind speculator could ever have maintained that war was advantageous to our commerce, in opposition to the most clear and best substantiated facts, contained in the official returns of the Custom-House presented to Parliament. In the years of peace preceding the commencement of the last war, the exports of this country were annually acquiring a considerable increase, and in the years 1791 and 1792, this annual increase amounted to upwards of two millions: But in the very first year of the war, 1793, our exports were at once diminished; and though this falling off was afterwards made up, the rate of our peace increase was never recovered. Had we continued at peace, and had the increase of our exports been only two millions a year, as was the case in 1791 and 1792, our exports for 1807 would have amounted to upwards of fifty millions, whereas in fact they were for that year upwards of twenty millions short of that computation. The comparative effects of peace and war on our commerce are still more distinctly illustrated by what took place in 1802, the only interval of peace which we have enjoyed for the last fifteen years. In that fortunate year, our exports made a sudden start of nearly four millions above those of the preceding year of war; but in the following year, in which the mournful renewal of hostilities took place, our exports suddenly fell nearly ten millions below those of 1802, and have not yet recovered this rapid diminution. Such striking facts require neither comment nor illustration.

But if it can be thus demonstrated that peace would be so advantageous to the commercial world, it will not be denied that it would be still more essential to other classes of the community, to the manufacturer who is ruined by the accumulation of unsold stock on his hands, or to his starving workmen, whom his own exigencies compel him to dismiss.

Such, then, is the result of our enquiry into this important subject, that peace might be obtained, and might be attended with safety and numerous advantages. Such is the result of calm reflection, in which we feel that we are not biassed either by pusillanimous apprehensions, or by factious clamours. Were we convinced that the nation really had any great interest at stake; that there was any object essential to its prosperity which could better be obtained by war than by peace, we should be among the first to rouse up all its energies: we should then only tell our countrymen of their former triumphs; of the lofty rights and privileges which they have to defend: of the inexhaustible resources of their industry and magnanimity. But, convinced as we are that no great interest is at stake; that there is no object in dispute which may not better be obtained by peace than by war, we shall continue to lift up our hands to our country, and to heaven, against the wanton effusion of human blood; against wasting and dispiriting the nation by the protraction of unnecessary disasters. Let the first opportunity for opening negotiation be seized; and, if the enemy prove unreasonable, then, and not till then, shall our voice be heard among the loudest invitors to War.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. V.

COBBETT'S POLITICAL REGISTER.

For some weeks past, this gentleman has been amusing himself with repaying upon his old friends the American Republicans, the wrongs which were formerly sustained by Peter Porcupine. He has earnestly laboured to set this country upon them, and was not a little angry with our Ministers for not applauding the affair of the Chesapeake, and asserting the principles on which our officers acted: but he declares that he suspect the Yankies are too cowardly, and can never be brought to face us fairly either by sea or land. No wonder indeed, that they should be a little backward; for he assures us, that they have not an instrument to fight with, except wooden pikes and a few Birmingham fowling-pieces: nay, what is still more, that they must inevitably be obliged, in a short time, to run naked in the midst of the snow, from the want of our manufactures, and thus perish to a man without our having occasion to strike a single blow! This helpless state of the Americans, however, appears to Mr. Cobbett only an additional inducement to hector and belabour them without mercy; and after having blown the trumpet of war to that quarter, he has last week begun to sound a still louder note towards the Continent of Europe.

Mr. Cobbett seems to glory in being thought of the true English bull-dog breed; and certainly no one will deny him the distinction of having as keen an appetite for blood and carnage, as any canine hero in Leadenhall-market. On his arrival in this country, he began to blow the flames of war with a vehemence that astonished even the Anti Jacobines; and when the people, tired of a fruitless and disasterous contest, at length hailed with transport and illuminations the restoration of the blessings of Peace, Mr. Cobbett, true to his ferocious propensities, preferred to have his house half demolished by the mob, rather than set up a single rush-light in his window." During the interval of tranquillity procured by the peace of Amiens, he left no means untried to set France and Britain again by the ears; and in the meantime he amused himself with defending and panegyrising bull-baiting, prize-fighting, the Slave Trade, and every other scene where bloodshed and domineering were found in considerable perfection. The renewal of hostilities gave fresh scope to his natural propensities; and he continued by the most stinging reproaches to incite Ministers to form new coalitions, and again set the Continent in a conflagration.

Sometime ago, his sentiments appeared to have undergone a wonderful revolution. In the course of declaiming against all in power, his opinions happened to tally very closely with those of Sir Francis Burdett; and Mr. Cobbett began, without hesitation, to declare Sir Francis the only honest politician, the only man to whom this country could look for salvation; although, two years before, traitor, and firebrand, and incendiary, were the best names which he was accustomed to bestow on the Baronet. People began to wonder what an union between these hostile elements would produce; and certainly the effects were very wonderful, for Mr. Cobbett now began to rail fiercely against Anti-Jacobins, and even to aim many sly thrusts at Nobility and Royalty. But nature is not so soon overcome. No sooner were the burning of Copenhagen, and the capture of the Danish fleet announced, than Mr. Cobbett felt all his former propensities awakened. He shouted aloud his applause to the measure; declared that it must be just because it was vigorous; and leaving poor Sir Francis and his pacific friends on one side, he has since entered with new zest into his former course, calling out for war, perpetual war!

The late supposed overtures for peace, through the medium of the Austrian Ambassador, gave him much uneasiness; but in his last number, he gaily tells us in that sportive style, which suits the protraction of national disasters, that "this pacific ogling is now "at an end." He then proceeds to discuss the observations of the Moniteur on our answer to the Russian Declaration; and is very angry with that paper for asserting that our ancestors did not maintain their maritime power by acting "on tyrannical prin-"ciples." He insists that they did act on what are called tyrannical principles; and that "from the time this country bore the "name of England, it claimed a right of sea dominion, as abso-"lute as that which any Sovereign, or State, has upon the "land." This is a curious piece of historical information, and we should be glad to know where Mr. Cobbett came by it: but it were needless to question him on this subject; he despises old musty records; he never looks into such food for book-worms; and when he finds occasion for an old historical fact, he takes a far more clever way—he fancies it. It would, indeed, have been rather curious in our Saxon ancestors, had they begun to vapour about the exclusive Dominion of the Seas, when the Danes not only beset their coasts on all sides, but even landed great armies without molestation, and at length conquered England. If Mr. Cobbett would draw historical facts from records, and not from fancy, he would find that the first formal assumption of the Dominion of the Seas, in the sense in which it is now understood, took place in the reign of an Usurper, in the reign of Cromwell; and that when this Usurper, in conjunction with the Long Parliament, enacted the Navigation Laws, the Lord Chancellor Clarendon declared it as his opinion, that the Dutch would rather endure any extremity than submit to such an extraordinary encroachment on the rights of maritime nations.

Mr. Cobbett, however, seems desirous not altogether to lose the praise of moderation. He declares that he is not absolutely the advocate of eternal war, but that there are certain terms on which he would be willing to make Peace with Bonaparte. He even offers this Usurper an alternative. He tells him that we shall be ready to make Peace with him, if he will either evacuate Denmark, Holland, Spain, and Portugal, and restore them to full and complete independence; or stipulate that no ships of war shall be built in these countries, or sail out of their harbours during Peace. And what return would he make Bonaparte for doing so much which we could not oblige him to do? Why, he would allow him to seize as much territory as he chose in the interior, provided he never approached the sea-coast, or took any steps to be able to defend himself against our maritime dominion.

Mr. Cobbett, indeed, in one respect, is a very particular advocate of Bonaparte. He accuses him of no injustice in conquering and appropriating the countries around him: he frankly declares that "conquest gives right of dominion;" and he recognises Bonaparte's title to his conquests as perfectly valid. He only claims the same rights for England; and insists that we are very justly entitled to prevent a single flag but our own from sailing on the seas, because we have the power to do so! This is admirable political morality; and will prove as useful to the highway robber as to the conqueror. If superior force constitutes right, then the ruffian who plunders a defenceless traveller, has a perfectly good right to his booty: and it is on the very same principle that a stronger state has a right to seize and plunder a weaker neighbour. Such tenets may be very congenial to the mind of Mr. Cobbett; but one is surprised that he should venture to publish them to the world, lest his Hampshire neighbours should be afraid to accompany him to town across Bagshot-heath. Nations have often been guilty of extreme violence, but they have usually endeavoured to veil it under some specious pretext, nor have ventured to avow that they had only the plea of the robber for their crimes. But the patriotic Mr. Cobbett, the friend of his country, the scourge of political vice, would have Great Britain boldly to throw off the mask, and avow that she thought herself entitled to act unjustly because she has the power!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JAN. 14.—The following Imperial Decree, additional to the Decrees containing measures against the maritime system of England, has just appeared in the bulletin of laws:

At the Palace of the Thuilleries, 11th Jan. 1808.

Napoleon, &c. upon the report of our Minister of Finances, seeing our Decrees of the 23d November and 11th December, 1807, with the concurrence of our Council of State, we have decreed, and do declare as follows:

ART. I.—When a vessel shall enter into a French port, or into that of a country occupied by our armies, any man of the crew, or a passenger, who shall declare to the principal of the Custom House, that the said ship comes from England or her colonies or countries occupied by English troops, or that it has been visited by any English vessel, shall receive a third part of the produce of the net sale of the ship and cargo, if it is known that its declaration is exact.

ART. II.—The Principal of the Custom House, who shall receive the declaration mentioned in the preceding article, shall in conjunction with the Commissary of Police, who shall be called on for that purpose, and the two Principal of the Custom House Officers of the port, shall cause each of the crew and passengers to undergo, separately, the interrogatory prescribed by the second article of our decree of the 23d November, 1807.

ART. III.—Any functionary or agent of Government, who shall be convicted of having favoured the contravention of our ART. IV.—Our Ministers are charged, each in his respective department, with the execution of the present Decree.

GERMANY.

FRANKFORT, JAN. 14.—The wish to humble England animates all minds. The German politicians are particularly employed on the means of attacking her in the Indies, and striking her to the heart. The alliance of Russia, France, and Persia, appears to them adapted to accelerate this project. The public papers of Germany are therefore filled with plans relative to this expedition. Among those which have appeared, the following, published in the Journal of Manheim, has attracted considerable notice.

The author supposes that the expedition will be made not only with the consent of the King of Persia, but that that Monarch will furnish the armies that shall pass through his territory with every thing necessary for their subsistence. He chuses Astracan for the place of rendezvous of the French and Russian armies, and he adds, the Russian army will not only be sufficiently provided with artillery and ammunition, but the Russian Generals will take care to have them in readiness for the French, which, to facilitate its march, will take with it neither cannon, ammunition, nor horses. The Russian army will easily be collected at Astracan, but it will be necessary to shorten and facilitate the march of the French army. It has two points of departure, consequently two routes to follow to arrive at Astracan, one from the Duchy of Warsaw, and the other through Dalmatia.

By the former, the army will proceed in a right line to Zarozun, making a march of about 460 leagues (or 280 German miles). There it will embark on the Volga for Astracan, from which Lazazum is distant about 100 leagues. Thus the French army setting out from Warsaw will have 560 leagues to go to reach Astracan, 100 of which will be by water—a march that will employ two months and a half or three months.

By the second route, that is to say, from Dalmatia, the French army will make a march of about 140 leagues, to reach the Danube at a place proper to embark. It will go down the Danube to its mouth on board vessels brought from the Black Sea. When arrived at the Black Sea, it will pursue its route; and passing by the Strait of the Crimea, will land at Sangaroc, on the Sea of Azou. From Sangaroc it will march to the Don, which it will pass near Piati Isbianka, and proceed to the Zarozun, where it will embark for Astracan; it is only about 140 leagues from Sangaroc to Zarozun; it appears, that by this route the French army has only about 240 or 250 leagues to march by land, in going from Dalmatia to Astracan.

The time which will be employed by the French in this march, may be estimated at about six weeks; that is to say, about half the time of the former. Having joined at Astracan, the two Franco-Russian armies, with their artillery, ammunition, horses, &c. will embark in vessels put in requisition on the Caspian Sea, will traverse that sea, and arrive at Astrabat, in Persia, after a passage of ten or twelve days. From Astrabat the two armies, furnished with provisions by the King of Persia, will pursue their route through that kingdom for the Indies, where they will arrive, after a march of seven or eight weeks.

It results from this plan, that a French army of 30,000 men, setting out from Dalmatia, and a Russian army (which may likewise be joined by a Persian army) may arrive in the East Indies at the end of five months at latest.—(Journal de l'Empire, 19th Jan.)

HOLLAND.

UTRECHT, JAN. 19.—His Majesty being desirous to give still further vigour to the regulations respecting the Blockade of the British Islands, hath for that purpose on the 8th inst. expedited the following Cabinet Order to the Minister of the Finances, who is rendered responsible for its strict execution:—

"All vessels, without exception, which shall have been visited by an English ship, which shall have touched at an English port, or which shall have paid a duty of any kind whatever to the English Government, shall be regarded as English property, and in the case of being afterwards captured by our ships of war, or cruisers, shall be declared good prizes."

In consequence of our present relations with Sweden, his Majesty yesterday passed the following Decree:—

Louis Napoleon, by the Grace of God and the Constitution of the Kingdom, King of Holland, and Constable of France.

Whereas we have received information that the Orders adopted relative to the Blockade of the British Islands, have not been carried into execution with like force against Swedish ships; and whereas this kingdom is equally at war with Sweden and England,

We have decreed, and hereby decree as follows:—

ART. I. Every Swedish ship which shall enter the ports of this kingdom shall be immediately seized, and also all Swedish merchandize shall be confiscated.

II. All Swedish subjects, who may have heretofore exercised diplomatic functions within our kingdom, or who may have served as Consuls or Commercial Agents, and who still remain in Holland, are required to leave the kingdom immediately upon the publication of this Decree.

III. All other Swedish subjects who may be found in our ports, or other parts of our kingdom, shall immediately be arrested, and treated as prisoners of war.

IV. The measures at present in force for the Blockade of the British Islands, shall, in like manner, and without exception, be made applicable to Sweden.

V. Our Ministers of Finance, Justice, and Police, are charged with the execution of the present Decree, which shall be proclaimed at all places where its publication may be necessary.

Given at Utrecht this 18th Day of January, in the Year 1808, and of our reign the third.

(Signed) LOUIS.

By His Majesty's Command,
J. H. APPELIUS, Sec. of the Council of State.

SPAIN.

MADRID, JAN. 8.—On the 3d of this month the King issued a Decree, declaring, that all the measures adopted in France, against the commerce of England, should also have effect in his dominions.

ITALY.

FLORENCE, DEC. 10.—In pursuance of a convention between their Majesties the Emperor of the French and King of Italy, and the King of Spain, Tuscany has been ceded to his Imperial Majesty; and yesterday evening the Queen (to whom other States are to be assigned) departed hence with a train of between forty and fifty carriages, containing baggage and private property; after which the Etrurians were discharged from their oath of allegiance, and the Government declared to be dissolved, by the following proclamation:—

Charles Louis, Infant of Spain, King of Etruria, &c. and on the part of his Majesty, her Majesty Maria Louisa, Infanta of Spain, Queen Regent of Etruria.

Whereas, his Majesty the Emperor of the French and King of Italy has informed us, that by virtue of a treaty concluded with his Catholic Majesty, other states are appointed for us in exchange for the kingdom of Etruria, ceded to the most illustrious Emperor by the aforesaid treaty; we consider our reign in Etruria as dissolved from this day, and hence discharge the Etrurian nation from every oath of allegiance towards our Royal Person.

Yet we cannot separate from subjects so dearly beloved, without publicly assuring them of our entire gratitude, and of the memory which we shall at all times retain of the faithful attachment which they have displayed during the time of our government.

Yet if there is a thought which can diminish our affliction at such a separation, it is this, that the kingdom of Etruria—that so obedient a nation becomes subject to the happy government of a Monarch who is adorned with the most heroic virtues, among which the constant care is pre-eminent with which he labours to assure the prosperity of the people under his authority. MARIA LOUISA.

Given the 10th of December, 1807.

AMERICA.

WASHINGTON, DEC. 22.—Congress passed the following Act, for laying an embargo, in consequence of the Message from the President, in the Senate—Yeas 22—Nays 6; and in the House of Representatives—Yeas 82—Nays 44.

An Act laying an Embargo on all Vessels in the Harbour of the United States.

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that an embargo be, and thereby is laid, on all ships and vessels in the ports and places within the limits or jurisdiction of the United States, cleared or not cleared, bound to any foreign port or place; and that no clearance be furnished to any ship or vessel bound to such foreign port or place; except vessels under the immediate direction of the President of the United States; and that the President be authorized to give such instructions to the officers of the revenue, and of the navy and revenue-cutters of the United States, as shall appear best adapted for carrying the same into full effect. Provided, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the departure of any foreign ship or vessel, either in ballast, or with the goods, wares, and merchandize, on board of such foreign ship or vessel, when notified of this Act.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That during the continuance of this Act, no registered or sea-letter vessel, having on board goods, wares and merchandize, shall be allowed to depart from one port of the United States to the other within the same, unless the master, owner, consignee, or factor, of such vessel, shall first give bond with one or more sureties to the collector of the district from which she is bound to depart, in a sum double the value of the vessel and cargo, that the said goods, wares, and merchandize, shall be relanded in some port of the United States, dangers of the seas excepted; which bond, and also a certificate from the collector where the same may be relanded, shall, by the collectors respectively, be transmitted to the secretary of the Treasury. All armed vessels possessing public commissions from any foreign powers are not to be considered as liable to the embargo laid by this Act."

The following are the terms in which Mr. Jefferson has communicated his wish of retiring from the Presidency of America

"GENTLEMEN,

"I received some time ago from the Speaker of the Senate and House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, an Address from the two Houses, to which, on public considerations, it was thought advisable the answer should be deferred awhile. I now ask permission to convey the answer through the same channel, and to tender you the assurance of my high consideration and respect. T. JEFFERSON."

To the Hon. P. C. Lane, Speaker of the Senate.—T. Sanders Speaker of the House of Representatives.

TO THE GENERAL ASSEMBLY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

"I received in due season, the Address of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, under cover from the Speaker of the two Houses, in which, with their approbation of the General course of my administration, they were so good as to express their desire that I should consent to be proposed again to the public voice, on the expiration of my present term of office: Entertaining, as I do, for the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, those sentiments of high respect which would have prompted an immediate answer; I was certain, nevertheless, they would approve a delay which had for its object to avoid a premature agitation of the public mind, on a subject so interesting as the election of the Chief Magistrate.

"That I should lay down my charge, at a proper period, is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully. If some termination to the service of the Chief Magistrate be not affixed by the Constitution, or supplied by practice, his office, nominally for years, will, in fact, become for life, and history shews how easily that degenerates into an inheritance.

"Believing that a representative government, responsible at short periods of elections, is that which produces the greatest sum of happiness to mankind, I feel it a duty to do no act which should unnecessarily impair that principle; and I should unwillingly be the person, who, disregarding the sound precedent set by the illustrious predecessor who first furnish the first example of voluntarily [illegible] the [illegible] term of office.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28.

Lord Hawkesbury rose to move a Vote of Thanks to the Military and Naval Commanders employed in the Expedition to Zealand. It was his wish, in doing so, to separate entirely from the present question any consideration of the political merits of that measure. Were the original grounds of the Expedition as unwise and as unjust as he would contend they were wise and just, the objects thereby gained were as little advantageous as he had asserted them to be the reverse, still, upon every consideration of sound policy and precedent, the skill, valour, zeal and activity displayed in the operations before Copenhagen, justly demanded the distinction of their Lordship's Thanks. His Lordship contended that, whether the magnitude of the advantage procured to the country, or the manner in which the service was atchieved, were taken into consideration, the subjects of his present motion were eminently entitled to the high reward of a specific declaration of the approbation of Parliament. His Lordship concluded with moving the Thanks of the House to Lord Cathcart in the usual form.

Lord Holland found himself under the painful necessity of dissenting from the opinion expressed by the Noble Lord who had just sat down. He was influenced on this occasion by no reference to the policy or justice of the Expedition for which the naval and military Commanders were wholly irresponsible; but exclusively by a due regard to the principle which should regulate the conduct of the House in bestowing its Thanks. For the individuals to whom the question applied he had all possible respect; nor did he doubt that, had an opportunity offered itself, they would have displayed all that gallantry and military skill, which would have entitled them to the special approbation of the House; but such an occasion for displaying their talents had not occurred. The mere magnitude of a service had not been considered a sufficient reason for such proceedings.—The taking of the comparatively insignificant post of Bastia, had, on account of the resistance made and overcome, furnished a just ground for thanks to Lord Hood; while the acquisition of the port and fleet of Toulon had been passed over in silence. The way to prevent such honours from being held too cheap, was to imitate the policy of that State from whose history more was to be learnt than from that of any other nation which had ever existed. The Romans, in the time of their Republic, never granted a triumph without a rigid scrutiny into the merits of the Commander who applied for it.

Lord Moira and Lord Auckland supported the Motion.

Lord Grey de Howick repeated and enforced the various observations of Lord Holland, and declared himself compelled, though with unfeigned pain and reluctance, to give a negative to the motion.

The motion was then put and carried without a division, as were also a motion to the same effect, with respect to the Generals and subordinate Officers, serving under Lord Cathcart, and a Vote of Approbation regarding the Non-Commissioned Officers and Privates.

Lord Hawkesbury then moved a similar proceeding with regard to Admiral Gambier and the Navy.

When the motion for thanking Sir Home Popham was read, the Duke of Norfolk enquired whether there was a precedent for that proceeding. He was answered by Lord Hawkesbury, that Vice-Admiral Dommet who was Captain of the Fleet in 1801, was thanked by name. Upon this Lord Grey remarked, that Vice-Admiral Dommet was actually at the time in possession of the rank of Admiral, besides being Captain of the Fleet. Lord Hawkesbury, after a moment's consultation with Lord Chatham, stated, that the case of Sir Roger Curtis, who was Captain of the Fleet under Lord Howe, in the action of the 1st of June, was exactly in point. After some further conversation on particular expressions in the motions, they were severally agreed to, and the Lord Chancellor was empowered to communicate their purport to Lords Gambier and Cathcart in their places, and to the other Officers in the usual form.

Lord Holland gave notice, that on Monday next he should submit a motion, so framed as to obtain a copy of any accredited information which might have reached Government, relative to Bonaparte's explanation to Neutrals, of the Decree of November, 1806.

Lord Grey gave notice, that he should on the same day move for a copy of Lord Granville Leveson Gower's answer to Baron Budberg's Note of the 28th of June.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, JAN. 29.

Lord Hawkesbury rose to rectify two omissions in the Resolutions of Thanks passed the preceding evening. From a mistake of the clerk who copied them, the name of Major-General Thomas Grosvenor had been left out. His Lordship further stated, that at the conclusion of the Resolutions respecting the Navy, the customary forms of desiring the Captains to communicate the acknowledgment of that House to the Seamen had been also omitted. His Lordship's motions, for rectifying these inaccuracies, were then put and agreed to.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, JAN. 25.

Viscount Stopford presented at the Bar his Majesty's Answer to the Address of the House, thanking them for their loyalty and attachment to his person and family.

Mr. Johnson, from the Commissioners of Enquiry in Ireland, presented their Second Report, which was ordered to be laid on the table.

The Hon. Mr. Wellesley presented the Report of the Commissioners appointed last Session for the purpose of inquiring respecting the expiring laws.

Mr. Sheridan gave notice, that he would, on Monday se'nnight, make a motion, respecting the state of Ireland, so far as related to Catholic Emancipation. The Hon. Member said he did not wish to make this a party question, or harrass his Majesty's Ministers relative to the affairs of that country.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

On the motion of Mr. Wm. Dundas, the Renfrewshire Petition was ordered to be taken into consideration on March 22; Great Grimsby, February 23; Downpatrick, February 25; Newcastle-under-Line, March 11; Great Yarmouth, March 3; Grampound, same day; Stirling, March 24; County of Wexford, March 8; New Malden, March 8; Malmsbury, March 10.

GRANTING PLACES IN REVERSION.

Mr. Binkes said it was not the intention of that House to encroach on the prerogative of the Crown, but to prevent the improper application of Places in Reversion. His Majesty had a right to bestow favours on deserving objects, who had rendered great services to the State; yet it was palpably evident, that Places in Reversion were granted, even to sucking infants, who were incapable of performing the duty attached to their office; he therefore concluded with moving, for leave to bring in a Bill, to prevent the granting Offices in Reversion or upon Joint Lives.

Mr. W. Dundas opposed it, and contended, that the Crown had a right to exercise its prerogative, and grant the Reversion of any Office whatever, which it did not become the House to question.

Mr. Whitbread said, the Hon. Member who spoke last, opposed the Bill, because it encroached on the privileges of the Crown; but this was a period, which, more than any other, required economy; but the Hon. Member had another motive, which was the more interesting—he was in possession of an office, which he obtained in reversion, therefore it was his duty to oppose this Bill, which struck at the very root of corruption. This Bill, however, did not intend to take away the prerogative of the Crown, but to see that its powers are properly exercised. It is well known that offices have been given to infants in the cradle. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, for instance, had one bestowed upon him, when he was sucking, which his brother (Lord Arden) now enjoys, but requires no more ability than counting a few halfpence.

Sir J. Newport said, the Collectorship of the Port of Dublin was, to his knowledge, granted three deep.

Leave was given to bring in the Bill, which was read a first time, ordered to be printed, and read a second time on Wednesday next.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, JAN. 26.

The Speaker acquainted the House that he had received from T. Boucher, Esq. Clerk of the Crown in Ireland, a list of Barristers of five years standing, who had, in terms of the Act of the 42d of the King, agreed to act as Commissioners on Controverted Elections in that part of the United Empire.

A new writ was ordered, on the motion of Mr. Lethbridge, for a Citizen of Bath, in the room of John Palmer, Esq. who, since his Election, had accepted the office of Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds.

Petitions, complaining of undue Elections and Returns for the following places were presented, which were ordered to be taken into farther consideration on the undermentioned days: Poole, (double return), Tuesday, the 2d of February; Maldon, in Essex, Tuesday, the 15th of March; Beverley, in Yorkshire, same day.

Mr. Secretary Canning presented, at the Bar, certain Papers, promised to be laid before House in the Speech delivered by the Lords Commissioners. Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. G. Ponsonby wished to learn from the Right Hon. Secretary when the Papers relating to the application made by Ministers to the Emperor of Russia, touching his Mediation with Denmark, would be laid before the House.

Mr. Secretary Canning replied, that if the Right Hon. Gentleman meant to move generally, for the information Ministers had upon that subject, it would be readily produced: on the contrary, if he meant to move for that information specifically, he would be pleased to understand, that no such papers existed.

Mr. Whitbread wished to know whether it was meant to lay before the Secret Treaty entered into by his Majesty with Portugal?

Mr. Canning replied, that the Treaty alluded to by the Hon. Gentleman, was a Treaty of a secret nature, and contained various articles that could not be divulged till that secrecy was, by mutual consent, put an end to.

Mr. Chancellor Perceval presented, by Royal Command, the several Orders in Council referred to in the Speech delivered on the first day of the Session. Ordered to be printed.

Sir John Newport asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he intended to ground any measure on the Fourth Report of the Commissioners of Inquiry in Ireland, relative to Ireland Revenue of the Crown. Unless the Right Hon. Gentleman did bring forward the subject, he should think it his duty to take an early opportunity of doing so.

The House then went into a Committee on the Resolution of yesterday, that a Supply be granted to His Majesty, Mr. G. Johnstone in the Chair. The Resolution was carried, and the Report ordered to be received to-morrow.

The Fifth Report of the Board of Military Enquiry was ordered to be printed.

Mr. G. Ponsonby moved an Address to his Majesty for copies of such parts of the Correspondence as took place between the Secretary of the State and the Ministers of Russia, as related to the restoration of Peace between his Majesty and the Crown Prince of Denmark.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 27,

Mr. Rose postponed his motion respecting the American Intercourse Bill till to-morrow, when it would be referred to a Committee of the whole House. Mr. Rose therefore reserved what he had to say respecting it till to-morrow.

The following Election Petitions were ordered to be taken into consideration on the following days:—Bridgewater, March 17; Westminster, (against the return of Lord Cochrane), March 22; Christchurch, March 29; Dungarvon, ditto; Navy, ditto; Saltash, (double return), the 25th of February; and the Saltash Right of Election, on the same day.

The Bill to prevent the Granting of Offices in Reversion was read a second time.

In a Committee of Supply, the Annual Estimates for the Army and Navy were brought up, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, that it was his intention to give notice, on an early day, of a motion which he intended to bring forward, relative to modifying the obnoxious parts of the Bill passed last Sessions, relative to the Assessed Taxes, and for the more immediate means of collecting them.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Lord H. Petty asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer, across the table, whether he intended to bring forward a Bill of Indemnity, as the late Orders of Council were absolutely illegal.

The Chancellor said, he did not think there was any necessity at present to give the business a thought.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, JAN. 28,

On the motion of Mr. Rose, an order was made for the House, on Wednesday next, to resolve itself into a Committee on so much of the Act of the 12th of Charles II. called the Navigation Act, as relates to allowing the importation to Great Britain, of articles the produce of the Brazils.

Mr. Rose then moved the Order of the Day for the House resolving into a Committee on the American Intercourse Act. On the question being put that Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair,

Mr. Ebrington said, he beheld, with much satisfaction, the present measure for enquiring on the intercourse between this country and America. It was a means, he trusted, of reconciling the two countries. But while he said thus much, he could not refrain from expressing his astonishment that Ministers were about to continue an Act carrying into effect a Treaty of Amity and Commerce entered into with the United States, by Lord Grenville, during the first Administration of the late Mr. Pitt, after that Treaty had expired. That Treaty had stipulated a free commerce, and now we heard of the American Non-importation Act, and of the embargo laid upon American ships.—The Hon. Gentleman argued, therefore, that there was no necessity for continuing the American Intercourse Act, as it was still in force, and would not expire for five weeks. It would be proper to wait until it should be ascertained what impression our Orders in Council had made upon America, by which the ships of that country were allowed to trade to British ports only.

Mr. Rose denied that it was unbecoming in this country to continue commercial advantages to the Americans. The Act of 1797, granted those advantages for twelve years, originally bestowed by the Act of 1794, in the event of certain arrangements between the two countries being come to. On that principle, the Intercourse Act had been continued last year, and it remained in force till six weeks after the commencement of the present session. The Hon. Gentleman would readily perceive that that time would be nearly elapsed before the present Bill could go through both Houses, and receive the Royal Assent.

The House then went into the Committee, Sir C. Price in the Chair.

Mr. Rose then moved, that the Chairman be instructed to move the House for leave to bring in a Bill, to continue for time to be limited, several Acts of Parliament for carrying the Treaty of Trade, Commerce, and Navigation, between His Majesty and the United States of America. The Report was received by the House on its resumption, and the question put and carried.

THE LATE SERVICES IN THE BALTIC.

Lord Castlereagh rose, and after bestowing much applause on the officers concerned, he concluded with a motion similar to that of Lord Hawkesbury in the House of Peers for thanks to Lord Cathcart and those under his command.

Mr. Wyndham said, that in a measure of this kind there was always to be found a third party who were eagerly looking forward for a share of the applause. The Tower guns were not to be fired for nothing; but in this case Ministers were as emulous of approbation as those who had done the greatest service for their country. He had no doubt but the army and navy had done their part, and it was well known that single ships distinguished themselves during the present war, and particularly a packet lately in the West Indies, and he was astonished, since votes of thanks became so common, that the Noble Lord did not move for one for the commander of that packet, for his bravery. The public did not approve of the Expedition, and was at a loss to comprehend why Ministers would press a question of a nature so odious. He was also astonished, why Lloyd's Coffee-house was so backward in giving their vote of thanks to the army and navy on this occasion; that might, however, be accounted for, when the Captain of the Fleet was ransacking the town for old hammers and bits of iron, while the trade in the Baltic was suffering by the activity of the enemy's privateers, which ultimately touched the pockets of the gentlemen at Lloyd's. The Hon. Member was likewise surprised why the Transport Board was not included in the Vote of Thanks, for the Commissioners had a great share of the merits attached to that expedition, particularly in furnishing plenty of ships to bring home the stores. It was true, Lord Cathcart had distinguished himself as a subaltern in the American war, and lately as a commander in Ireland; but further the public did not know him: and as for Admiral Gambier, his naval exploits were limited; however, he did not see any thing splendid in the affair of Copenhagen to entitle them to those high honours lately conferred on them, and he was sure, when they found their new honours and titles in the Gazette, they must be equally astonished, as they claimed no merit from their services. Ministers in this business reminded him of a man going to a Lord Mayor's shew, who had a wooden leg, and for the sake of being distinguished from the vulgar, had it gilded; so it was with the Noble Lord, who wanted to impress on the public mind the great importance of the attack upon the defenceless city of Copenhagen.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer wished it to be understood that the merits or demerits of the Expedition should be entirely set aside on the present question. The army and navy had done their duty, which entitled them to the thanks of that House; and had not the service been performed, he was certain the navy of Denmark would have ultimately been employed in the invasion, if not the destruction, of this country.

Mr. Tierney condemned the titles given by his Majesty to Lord Cathcart and Admiral Gambier, on the score that their services did not merit them.

The Speaker was requested to communicate the thanks of that House to Lord Viscount Cathcart, and the officers and men under his command, at the capture of Copenhagen; to Admiral Lord Gambier, Admiral Stanhope, and Sir Home Popham, as well as the Marines and Seamen.

FINANCE COMMITTEE.

On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Committee of the last Session was revived, with the exception of Mr. Ryder, who was not at present a Member, but Mr. Charles Ellis was appointed in his room.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, JAN. 29.

The Speaker said, that as the Petitions presented last Session against the returns for Shrewsbury, Liverpool, and New Malden, had not been renewed this Session, the recognizances were of course forfeited.

Mr. Mitford presented an account from the Commissioners of the Customs in Scotland, respecting the number of ships and tonnage employed from that country in the Greenland Fisheries, and the number of tons of oil imported.

Sir C. Pole gave notice, that he would on Wednesday next move for leave to bring in a Bill, amending an Act to invest Pelham House in the hands of the Trustees of the Naval Asylum, and to appoint a Chaplain to that institution. The Hon. Member also said he would at the same time, move for a List of the Officers and their salaries belonging to the said institution.

On the motion of M. A. Taylor, Esq. the 11th of February next was fixed for taking the Pool Election Petition into consideration.

ORDERS OF COUNCIL.

Mr. Horner said his views in making this motion was to bring before the House all the information that could be obtained respecting these Orders, and to ascertain how far they could be legally granted. He, therefore, moved that his Majesty be graciously pleased to lay before that House a list of the number of licenses granted, from the 1st of May, 1803, till the 1st of Nov. 1807, together with the amount of fees paid or received on such licenses.

Mr. Rose did not object to the motion, but said it was impossible to carry on trade without these licenses; independent of that they were perfectly legal, as they were granted under the authority of an act passed in the year 1798. With respect to the fees, there was not an office in the kingdom where fees were not paid; but in this instance the public were led to believe they were extravagant; however, instead of that they were extremely moderate, viz. for the Sign Manual, 9*l.* 3*s.* 6d.; Stamps, 11*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*; clerks, 3*l.*; office-keeper, 10*s.*; in all 14*l.* 4*s.* Last June the Committee of Trade had looked into the practice of taking these fees, and if possible to restrict them, but they found the custom so blended between one office and another, that they gave up the inquiry, because they could not apply a remedy.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Ponsonby postponed his intended motion relative to the affairs of Copenhagen, from Monday till Wednesday next. He then moved, that there be laid before the House Copies of the Proclamations issued by his Majesty's Military and Naval Commanders in the Baltic; also a Copy of the Articles of the Capitulation of Zealand; likewise the Substance of the Information which his Majesty's Ministers had received respecting the Danish Dock-yards, and the condition of the Danish ships before, and after their arrival; which, together with the Papers relative to the Russian Mediation, was ordered to be laid before the House on Monday.

Mr. Whitbread said, that on Monday next he should move, that an Account of the Number of Transports in the Baltic Expedition, together with the Number of Men employed; as also the Number brought home, should be laid before the House.

On the motion of Mr. Ward, the House resolved itself into a Committee of Supply, Mr. Warton in the Chair, when the following items were granted to his Majesty, viz. for Wages of 130,000 Seamen, including 31,000 Marines, (at 1l. 17s. per man per month, for thirteen months) 3,126,500l.; for Provisions, 3,211,000l.; Wear and Tear, 5,010,000l.; Ordnance 591,000l. The Report of the Committee was ordered to be brought up on Monday.

The Report of the Offices in Reversion Bill was brought up with Amendments, and ordered to be read a third time on Monday and engrossed.—Adjourned till Monday.

Both Houses of Parliament met on Saturday, pro forma, and the Members of the House of Commons went in Procession to the Lords, and the whole proceeded to St. Margaret's Chapel, where Divine Service was performed by the Right Reverend the Bishop of Norwich, it being the Anniversary of the Martyrdom of King Charles.

STATE PAPERS.

RELATIVE TO AUSTRIA AND RUSSIA,

PRESENTED TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT, ON TUESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1808.

PAPERS IN RESPECT TO AUSTRIA.

No. I.—Note from the Count De Starhemberg to Mr. Secretary Canning, dated London, April 18th, 1807.

His Majesty the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, having resolved upon offering to the principal Powers interested in the present war, his amicable mediation, in order by his intervention, to bring on a negociation for peace, the Count de Starhemberg, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, has received orders to transmit to the Ministry of his Britannic Majesty, the accompanying Note, containing the offer of mediation which his Imperial and Royal Majesty has caused to be presented in the same manner, and at the same time, to the Cabinets of Petersburgh and of the Thuilleries, as well as to that of Berlin. In acquitting himself of this commission, the undersigned requests his Excellency Mr. Canning will have the goodness to lay this offer of mediation of his Imperial Majesty before the King of England, and he ventures to hope that his Excellency will not refuse to inform him as soon as possible of the resolutions taken by his Britannic Majesty on this subject.

The Count de Starhemberg embraces this opportunity to renew to his Excellency the assurance of his high consideration.

London, April 18, 1807.

(Note referred to in No. I.)

The Emperor Francis II. could not behold without the deepest concern, the rupture which took place last Autumn, between his Majesty the Emperor of the French, King of Italy, and his Majesty the King of Prussia; and he was shortly afterwards still more painfully affected, by the extension of hostilities over a considerable part of Europe. If by observing a strict and scrupulous impartiality from the very commencement of the war, his Imperial and Royal Apostollck Majesty, has had the satisfaction to maintain his system of neutrality in circumstances so critical, and to preserve his people from the ravages of war, he did not enter the less fully into the miseries which were multiplied around his states; and in his just solicitude for the tranquillity and the security of his Monarchy, he could not but be sensible to the continually renewed alarms upon his frontiers, or to the fatal effects which they inevitably produced in various branches of his interior Administration. The Emperor, uniformly animated with the same dispositions, has had no other view from the commencement, and during the course of hostilities, than to endeavour to bring about a reconciliation, and to avail himself of every proper opportunity to put an end to the calamities of war; he judged he could not better effect this desirable result than by constantly impressing the Bellegerent Powers with his sentiments of moderation and of conciliation, and in giving his whole attention towards producing in them a similar disposition. The reception which his first overtures to this effect have obtained, appears to announce that the moment of so desirable a reconciliation is not far distant. In the confidence inspired by so consolitary a prospect, the general welfare and the interests of his own dominions call upon his Imperial Majesty to offer to the Bellegerent Powers his friendly intervention: and in consequence of this, he does not hesitate to make to his Britannic Majesty the offer of his meditation, and of his good offices.

But in considering how very complicated and extensive the present war is become, the Emperor would think that he had but imperfectly expressed his fervent desire for peace, and the hope of its compleat and speedy re-establishment, if he did not at the same time state the entire conviction he feels, that it is only by the united endeavours of the Powers principally concerned in the war, and by a negociation in common, which should embrace the whole of their reciprocal interests, that permanent tranquillity and a secure and solid peace can be attained, a peace which should secure the future political relations of Europe.

His Imperial Majesty, from that firm persuasion (which the frankness of his sentiments will not permit him to dissemble), conceives that this pacific overture should be made by him in common to those Cabinets which are, in the first instance, to take a part in the conferences; and it is therefore with earnestness that he equally invites the Cabinets of Petersburgh, of Berlin, and of the Thuilleries, to adopt the same conciliatory views, and to enter into negociations for a peace, in which the essential relations of all the parties interested should, as far as it is practicable, be combined.

Digitized by Google

The Emperor has thus generally testified his wish for peace. He will not take upon himself to suggest the particular mode of negotiation, and still less to anticipate the intentions of other Powers, or to decide upon those measures which it may be thought necessary previously to settle, in order to determine the principles of the preliminary overtures between the Belligerent Powers.

Nevertheless, in the hope that this friendly offer of his interposition will be appreciated in such a manner as the rectitude of his intentions authorizes him to expect, his Imperial Majesty is ready to open (in order that the opening of negociations may be facilitated by his good offices) any place in his dominions, the neutrality and locality of which might be reciprocally convenient, and which, from this consideration, ought not to be too near the theatre of war; and, in this respect, as in every other point, the Emperor will feel pleasure in contributing to accelerate the period of so desirable a meeting.

LOUIS COMTE DE STARHEMBERG.

London, April 18, 1807.

No. II.—Note from Mr Secretary CANNING, to the Count DE STARHEMBERG, dated April 25*th*, 1807.

The Undersigned, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has laid before the King his Master, the Note delivered to him by the Count de Starhemberg, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, in which his Imperial Majesty offers himself as the Mediator of a General Peace.

The Undersigned has received the orders of the King, to transmit to the Count de Starhemberg the inclosed official Answer to the Note of his Imperial Majesty. Rendering the fullest justice to the motives which have actuated his Imperial Majesty, in the proposal of such a mode of negociation, as can alone, by embracing the interests of all parties, conduce to the establishment of a solid peace, and to the permanent tranquility of Europe, the King accepts, so far as his Majesty is concerned, the offer of his Imperial Majesty's mediation, subject only to the condition of a like acceptance of it on the part of all the other Powers who are engaged in the present war.

In executing this duty, the Undersigned is happy to seize the opportunity of renewing to the Count de Starhemberg the assurance of his high consideration.

Foreign Office, April 25, 1807. GEORGE CANNING.

(Official Note, referred to in No. II.)

His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, has received, with a just sense of the consideration which is due to every communication from his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary and Bohemia, and of the motives by which, on this occasion, his Imperial Majesty has been actuated, the offer of his Imperial Majesty to become the Mediator of a General Peace.

The King, who has never ceased to consider a secure and durable Peace as the only object of the war in which his Majesty is engaged, and who has never refused to listen to any suggestions which appeared likely to conduce to the attainment of that object, cannot hesitate to declare His entire concurrence in the opinion expressed by the Emperor and King, that a Peace of such a description is only to be attained through Negociations, which shall be common to all the Powers principally engaged in the war.

To such negociations, whenever the consent of the other Powers interested in them shall be obtained, the King will willingly accede; and his Majesty will loose no time in communicating with such of those Powers as are connected with him by the bonds of amity and confidential intercourse for the purpose of ascertaining their views; and if those views shall be favourable to his Imperial Majesty's proposal, of concerting with them the mode in which such negotiations should be opened, and of agreeing upon the principles which (according to the suggestion of his Imperial Majesty) it might be expedient previously to establish as the basis and foundation of a general discussion and arrangement,

With respect to the place which should be selected as the seat of the negociations, his Majesty would not object to any place which, in addition to the indispensable qualification, proposed in the Note of his Imperial Majesty, of being sufficiently remote from the immediate influence of the events of the war, should have that of affording to his Majesty, in an equal degree with all the other Powers concerned, the opportunity of a prompt and unembarrassed communication with the Plenipotentiaries who should be appointed to represent his Majesty at the Congress.

Foreign Office, April 25, 1807. GEORGE CANNING.

No. III.—Note from the Prince DE STARHEMBERG to Mr. Secretary CANNING, dated November 20, 1807.

London, Nov. 20, 1807.

The Undersigned has the honour to inform his Excellency Mr. Canning, Secretary of State for the Department of Foreign Affairs, that he has received positive orders from his Court, to make to the British Ministry the most earnest representations on the importance of putting an end to the struggle which still exists between England and France; and the effects of which may produce to the rest of Europe the most fatal consequences. His Majesty the Emperor and King, animated by a constant desire to effect the restoration of repose and tranquillity, does not hesitate to request officially and earnestly his Britannic Majesty to declare his intentions on this point in evincing to him his disposition to enter into a negociation for a maritime peace upon a basis suitable to the reciprocal interests of the Powers who may take a part in it.—The Cabinet of St. James has explained itself too often respecting its desire for the re-establishment of peace, for the Undersigned not to flatter himself that he shall now obtain the formal assurance wished for by his Court, which will completely prove to all the nations of Europe the sincerity of the pacific views of England. The Undersigned avails himself of this occasion to request his Excellency, the Secretary of State, to accept the offer of his high consideration.

(Signed) LOUIS PRINCE DE STARHEMBERG.

No. IV.—Note from Mr. Secretary CANNING to the Prince DE STARHEMBERG, dated November 25, 1807.

THE Undersigned, his Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has laid before the King his Master the official note presented by Prince de Starhemberg, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Austria, in which the Prince de Starhemberg expresses, by order of his Court, the earnest desire of his Imperial Majesty for the termination of the present contest between Great Britain and France, and requires a sincere and formal declaration of His Majesty's sentiments upon that subject.

His Majesty having repeatedly and recently declared his disposition and desire to enter into negociation for a peace on secure and honourable terms, and this declaration having been made in the most regular and authentic manner to the Austrian Government, in the answer which the undersigned was commanded to return to the official offer by the Prince de Starhemberg (in the month of April last) of his Imperial Majesty's Mediation; and in that which his Majesty has since directed to be returned to a similar offer on the part of the Emperor of Russia, and which has been communicated to the Court of Vienna; his Majesty cannot receive without surprise an application for a renewal of the declaration of sentiments of which the Court of Vienna has been so long and so formally in possession.

His Majesty will not believe that any farther declaration can be necessary for the purpose of proving to the nations of Europe a sincerity which the nations of Europe cannot question. But in compliance with the wishes of a friendly Power, expressed with so much earnestness and anxiety, His Majesty is, nevertheless, willing to repeat once more the assurance, already so often repeated, that his Majesty is now, as he has at all times been, prepared to enter into negociation for the conclusion of such a peace as shall settle on equal terms the respective interests of the Powers engaged in the war, as shall be consistent with His Majesty's fidelity to his Allies, and shall provide for the tranquility and security of Europe.—The Undersigned has the honour to request the Prince de Starhemberg to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

Foreign Office, Nov. 28, 1807. GEORGE CANNING.

No. V.—Note from the Prince DE STARHEMBERG to Mr. CANNING, dated Jan. 1, 1808.

London, Jan. 1, 1808.

The Undersigned, obeying the orders of his Court, in conforming to the desire of that of the Thuilleries, has the honour to inform his Excellency the Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, that, in consequence of the pacific dispositions of his Britannic Majesty, announced in the answer returned on the 25th of November last, to his official Note of the 20th of the same month, he is charged to propose to the English Ministry to send immediately Plenipotentiaries to Paris for the purpose of treating for the establishment of Peace between all the Powers at present at war with England. This explicit and frank invitation must furnish a proof of the good faith and of the sincere intention of France to put an end to the calamities of war; and his Imperial Majesty consents with eagerness to be the intermediary of a result so desirable. It is hoped, that the Court of London will not hesitate to recognise on this occasion the importance of the proposal which is made to it, and that it will be disposed to give a fresh proof of that desire which it has so often expressed, to restore repose to the rest of Europe, by naming negociators to be entrusted with the important interests to be discussed. To avoid every species of delay, the undersigned is authorized by France to give passports to the Ministers whom the Cabinet of St. James may appoint for that purpose. The mode in which these overtures are submitted to the Court of London, and the measures which are taken towards realizing the execution of them with the least possible delay, will effectually demonstrate the spirit of conciliation by which they are dictated. The Undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to his Excellency the Secretary of State the expressions of his high consideration.

(Signed) LOUIS PRINCE DE STARHEMBERG.

No. VI.—Note from Mr. Secretary CANNING to the Prince DE STARHEMBERG, dated Jan. 8, 1808.

The Undersigned, His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has laid before the King his Master, the Note delivered to him on the 2d of this month by the Prince de Starhemberg, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Majesty the Emperor of Austria. In stating himself to be charged to propose to the British Government the immediate sending of Plenipotentiaries to Paris, the Prince de Starhemberg has omitted to explain from whom he has received that Commission, whether from his Imperial Master or from the Government of France.

If the Prince de Starhemberg has, in this instance, acted under the specific and immediate orders of his Court, and if the proposal to His Majesty to send Plenipotentiaries to Paris is to be considered as originating at Vienna, the Undersigned is commanded to express His Majesty's concern that so little reference should appear to have been had, in framing the proposal now offered for His Majesty's consideration, to the correspondence which has already taken place between the Courts of London and Vienna, upon the subject of a negociation for Peace.

After so long an interval has been suffered to elapse since the acceptance by his Majesty, in April last, of the offer of his Imperial Majesty's mediation, his Majesty could hardly have expected that the same offer should now be repeated (if indeed the Prince de Starhemberg's Note is to be construed as a repetition of it) without any notification of the acceptance of those conditions which were at that time stated by his Majesty, to be indispensable preliminaries to the opening of a negociation. And while the Note of the Undersigned of the 23d of November last is cited by the Prince de Starhemberg as the foundation of the present proposal, his Majesty observes with surprise, that this proposal nevertheless extends only to the Powers combined with France in the war against Great Britain, and not to the Allies of Great Britain in the war with France.

If, on the other hand, the Court of Vienna is no otherwise concerned in the step which the Prince de Starhemberg has taken, than as having generally authorised that Minister to receive and to convey to the British Government whatever communications the Government of France might think fit to intrust to him, the Undersigned is commanded, in that case, to remark to the Prince de Starhemberg, that although the character which the Prince de Starhemberg holds from the Court of Vienna, and the formalities by which he is accredited to his Majesty, entitle him to immediate and implicit confidence in every exercise of his diplomatic functions, in the name and on the behalf of his Imperial Master; yet that when he professes to speak in the name of another Power, the statement of some precise authority, and the production of some specific and authenticated document, could alone justify the Court to which he addresses himself, in founding a public and important measure upon such a communication.

From the tenour of the Prince de Starhemberg's Note it appears, that the Note of the Undersigned of the 23d of November, has been communicated to the government of France. The government of France is therefore in possession of a solemn and authentic pledge of the pacific dispositions of his Majesty. It follows that a pledge equally solemn and authentic of the reciprocal disposition of France is reasonably to be expected by his Majesty, before his Majesty can be called upon to make any further advance.

The proposal to his Majesty to send Negociators to Paris, unaccompanied as it is with any ostensible and unequivocal return on the part of France for the Declarations already made in his Majesty's name, is so far from being a proof of any such reciprocal disposition, that it can be construed no otherwise by his Majesty than as implying an unjustifiable doubt of the sincerity of his Majesty's professions. Nor is the want of such formal authority and of such reciprocal assurance, the only, or the most material defect in the Prince de Starhemberg's communication.

His Majesty is called upon to send Plenipotentiaries to Paris to negociate for peace, without the slightest intimation being given to his Majesty on the basis on which it is proposed that such negociation should be founded. If it could ever have been matter of doubt whether the previous settlement of a basis of negociation were necessary to the hope of its successful termination, the experience of the last negociation with France would have placed that Question beyond controversy. The experience of the last negociation has further demonstrated the disadvantage and inconveniency of a negociation conducted at Paris.

His Majesty is willing to treat with France; but he will treat only on a footing of perfect equality. He is ready to treat with the allies of France; but the negociation must equally embrace the interests of the allies of Great Britain. As soon as the basis of negociation shall have been satisfactorily ascertained, and an unexceptionable place of negociation agreed upon, his Majesty will be prepared to name Plenipotentiaries to meet those of the other powers engaged in the war; but his Majesty will not again consent to send his Plenipotentiaries to a hostile capital.

But while his Majesty has permitted the Undersigned to address this frank and unequivocal exposition of his Majesty's sentiments to the Minister of the Emperor of Austria, the Undersigned is at the same time charged to state distinctly to the Prince de Starhemberg, that, not having received any authentic proof of the Prince de Starhemberg's commission to enter into any explanations in the name of the French Government, or to afford any assurances by which that Government could be bound, his Majesty has not directed the Undersigned to give any authority to the Prince de Starhemberg to speak in the name of his Majesty to the Government of France.

The Undersigned had the honour to request the Prince de Starhemberg to accept the assurances of his high consideration.

London, Jan 12, 1808.

The Undersigned has the honour to inform his Excellency the Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, that in consequence of orders from his Court, the present circumstances oblige him to demand passports for himself and all the individuals of the Austrian Mission at London. The Undersigned purposes to make use of them as soon as he shall have received from the French Government the passports which he demanded by the Messenger whom he dispatched yesterday. The Undersigned requests his Excellency to accept the assurances of his high consideration. (Signed)

In answer to the Note which the Undersigned has just received from his Excellency the Secretary of State, he has the honour to inform his Excellency, that the last Dispatches which he has received from his Court, were of the 29th of October, and that no mention was made in them of the departure of Mr. Adair. Foreign Office, Jan. 13, 1808.

The Undersigned, His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has the honour to inclose to the Prince de Starhemberg, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary from his Majesty the Emperor of Austria, the passports which he has demanded for himself and for the Austrian Mission at this Court; having it at the same time in command from the King his Master, to express his Majesty's deep regret, that the circumstances of the time, and the Orders of his Court, should have imposed on the Prince de Starhemberg the necessity of demanding them. The Undersigned requests the Prince de Starhemberg to accept the assurances of his highest consideration.

PAPERS RELATIVE TO RUSSIA,

PRESENTED BY HIS MAJESTY'S COMMAND TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT.

No. I.—Note from General BUDBERG, to his Excellency Lord GRANVILLE LEVESON GOWER, dated June , 1807.

My Lord,—Accept my best thanks for the promptitude with which you had the goodness to transmit to me the dispatches which I have received, together with your Excellency's letter of the 11th and 23d instant. The reports which your Lordship mentions are well founded. On the 9th and 21st instant an armistice was concluded, which was yesterday ratified by both parties. The two armies remain nearly in the same positions, and hostilities will not recommence until a month after the denunciation of the armistice. Sensible that it is of the utmost importance to you to transmit this intelligence as speedily as possible to your Court, I lose not an instant in redispatching the Messenger whom your Excellency has sent to me.

In respect, my Lord, to the interview which you request of me, it would give me great pleasure to comply with your wishes, if it were possible for me to foresee at what place the Emperor will stay even for a few days; but as we are still upon our journey, I must wait for the first opportunity of taking his Imperial Majesty's commands, in order to invite you to rejoin me, where I may then be.—I have the honour to be, &c.

A. DE BUDBERG.

No. II.—Note from his Excellency Lord GRANVILLE LEVESON GOWER, to General BUDBERG, dated Memel, 10-22 June, 1807.

General,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of the intelligence of the armistice which was signed on the 21st of this month, and although I implicitly confide in your Excellency's assurances, I cannot pass over in silence the prospect of a solid and permanent peace, which, from the tenor of your public letter to the Governor of Riga, your Excellency appears to believe will be the result of that measure.

The reciprocal engagements between the Courts of London and St. Petersburgh, the known principles and firmness of his Imperial Majesty, the verbal assurances of the Emperor which I have just transmitted to the King my Master, were so many pledges, that it is not now a question (according to public rumour) to negociate for a separate peace, but for a general one; and whatever doubts I may have entertained on this subject, your Excellency's letter to General Buxhowden has completely done away. The just and enlightened manner in which your Excellency views the situation of Europe, convinces me that you could not expect a peace would be either firm or lasting, which did not include every Power at war, and which was not founded upon an equitable basis. My Court will be ready to concur in negociations so formed, since it made war for the sole purpose of obtaining a secure and permanent peace. But your Excellency will, nevertheless, permit me to express all that regret I feel, at being unable to make known to my Government the basis, upon which it is proposed to ground negociations. At the moment when negociation is carrying on with the enemy, it is most essential that unlimited confidence should subsist between the Allied Powers. Upon this principle it is that the Court of London has ever acted, and it would be superfluous to recall to your Excellency the eagerness testified by the British Ministry last year to communicate to the Russian Ambassador the whole of the correspondence with the French Government. I wait with impatience your Excellency's summons to repair to his Majesty. Nothing can afford me greater pleasure than to repeat in person the assurances of the esteem, and high consideration with which I have the honour to be; Your Excellency's, &c.

G. L. GOWER.

No. III.—Note from General BUDBERG, to his Excellency Lord GRANVILLE LEVESON GOWER, dated Tilsit, 18-30 June, 1807.

Sir, and Ambassador,—I have received the letter which your Excellency did me the honour of addressing to me yesterday; and, having laid it before the Emperor, my august Master, I hasten to transmit you the answer which his Imperial Majesty has commanded me to return to it.

The firmness and perseverance with which his Majesty during eight months maintained and defended a cause which he had reason to suppose common to all Sovereigns, are the most certain pledges of the intentions which animated him, as well as of the loyalty and purity of his principles. Never would his Imperial Majesty have thought of deviating from that system, which he has hitherto pursued, if he had been supported by a real assistance on the part of his allies.

But having, from the separation of Austria and of England, found himself reduced to his own forces, having to combat with the forces of France united to the immense means of which she has the disposal, and in the critical position at which affairs had arrived, his Majesty was authorised in believing, that by continuing to sacrifice himself for others, he would ultimately incur a risk of comprising the safety of his own empire, without being enabled to hope that he might ever fulfil the original object of this war.

The conduct which your Government has held during these latter times, is moreover of a nature completely to justify the determination which the Emperor has now taken. The diversion on the Continent, which England has so long since promised, has not to this day taken place: and, if even, according to the latest advices from London, it would appear that the British Ministry has at length decided on ordering the departure of 10,000 men to Pomerania, that succour is in no wise proportioned, either to the hopes which we were authorised in entertaining, or to the importance of the object to which these troops were intended to be destined.

The pecuniary succours which England constantly afforded to the Powers of the Continent at war with France, might in some degree have supplied the want of English troops. Not only did the British Government decline facilitating the loan which the Imperial Court had intended to negociate at London; but when it at length decided on offering some subsidy to the Continental Powers, it appeared that the sum destined for this purpose, so far from meeting the exigencies of the Allies, would not even have covered the indispensable expences of Prussia.

In fine, the use which has been made of the British forces in the Mediterranean has not been more conformable than the rest to the unity and the connection with which it was indispensable to act in the operations of Russia and England. In lieu of attempting an expedition on the Continent of Italy, with a view of reconquering the kingdom of Naples, or else in lieu of uniting these forces to those of Russia which were designed to compel the Porte to a reasonable peace, one part of the English troops stationed in Sicily directed their course towards an entirely different destination, which the British Government had not even judged proper to communicate to the Court of Russia. It is a point not to be contested, that, by following one or the other of the courses which I have just cited, the English troops in the Mediterranean would have been of an infinitely greater utility to the common cause, by compelling the enemy to divide his forces; which would have enabled Russia to have sent her main army those reinforcements, which she was under the necessity of employing on the Danube, to support her army destined to make head against the Turkish forces which might be collected in that quarter.

From this statement, I am willing to believe that your Excellency will be persuaded, that in such a conjuncture, it only remained for the Emperor my Master to look to the glory and to the security of his empire, and that if the present crisis does not produce every result which might be expected, if the Powers equally interested had displayed vigour in the same proportion as they have exhibited tardiness and irresolution in all their operations, no blame can on this account be attached to Russia. But, at the same time, the Emperor my Master offers his Mediation to his Britannic Majesty to make peace with France, having the certainty that it will be accepted by the latter Power. I have the honour to be with high consideration,

Sir, Your Excellency's most obedient humble Servant,

(Signed) A. DE BUDBERG.

Tilsit, June 18-30, 1807.

No. IV.—Note from M. ALOPEUS to Mr. Secretary CANNING; dated London, 20th July, 1st August, 1807.

The Undersigned, Minister Plenipotentiary from his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias to his Britannic Majesty, has received the orders of his Court to notify to the British Ministry, that a Treaty of Peace was concluded at Tilsit on the 25th June—7th July, between Russia and France.

His Imperial Majesty of all the Russias, having, on this occasion, proposed his mediation, for the purpose of negociating and concluding likewise a treaty of peace between England and France, and the Emperor Napoleon having, by the 18th Article of the afore-mentioned treaty of peace, accepted that mediation, the object of the present note is to offer it in like manner to his Majesty the King of Great Britain.

Long since acquainted with the pacific sentiments of his Britannic Majesty, the Emperor of all the Russias flatters himself the more, that he will embrace this opportunity of restoring peace to all nations, and of insuring repose to the present generation; since that, in many conversations which his Imperial Majesty has held with the Emperor of the French, he has had reason to be convinced, that he is sincerely desirous of the re-establishment of a maritime peace, upon equitable and honourable principles.

The Emperor of all the Russias not only offers his interposition for the attachment of so desirable a result; but he would even be ready to promise the support of all the forces of his empire, for insuring the performance of all the stipulations of peace, when once it shall have taken place between England and France. By this guarantee, his Britannic Majesty will obtain that which he has ever appeared to desire, and may without distrust follow the bent of his humane and pacific sentiments.

The Undersigned, in requesting Mr. Canning, Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to apprize him as soon as possible of the determination which the Cabinet of St. James's may judge expedient to take in consequence of this offer of mediation on the part of his august master, avails himself of the opportunity of renewing to his Excellency the assurances of his highest consideration. (Signed) M. ALOPEUS.

London, 20th July,-1st Aug. 1807.

No. V.—NOTE from Mr. Secretary CANNING to M. ALOPEUS, dated 5th August, 1807.

The Undersigned, His Britannic Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, has lost no time in laying before the King his Master, the official Note presented to him by M. Alopeus, Minister Plenipotentiary to his Majesty the Emperor of all the Russias; in which M. Alopeus, by order of his Court, notifies to the British Government the conclusion at Tilsit, on the 25th June-7th July, of a Treaty of Peace between Russia and France, and announces at the same time, the offer of the mediation of his Imperial Majesty, for the conclusion of a treaty of peace between Great Britain and France, and the acceptance of that offer by the French Government.

The Undersigned has it in command from the King his Master to declare, that the Emperor of Russia does justice to the sentiments of the King, when his Imperial Majesty expresses his reliance on the King's disposition to contribute to the restoration of a general peace, such as may ensure the repose of Europe. Ample proofs of that disposition have recently been afforded by his Majesty, as well in the answer returned, in his Majesty's name, to the offer of the mediation of the Emperor of Austria, as in the willingness expressed by his Majesty to accede to the convention concluded at Bartenstein, on the 23d of April, between the Emperor of Russia and the King of Prussia, and in the instructions, which the Undersigned transmitted by his Majesty's command, upon the first intelligence of the late disastrous events in Poland, to his Majesty's Ambassador at the Court of St. Petersburgh, by which instructions that Ambassador was directed to signify to the Ministers of the Emperor of Russia, his Majesty's perfect readiness to enter, in concert with his august Ally, into any negociation which the Emperor of Russia might think it expedient to open for the restoration of a general peace. These sentiments and this disposition his Majesty continues invariably to maintain.

The Undersigned is, therefore, commanded by his Majesty, to assure M. Alopeus, that his Majesty waits with the utmost solicitude for the communication of the Articles of the Treaty concluded at Tilsit, and for the statement of those equitable and honourable principles, upon which his Imperial Majesty expresses his belief that France is desirous of concluding a Peace with Great Britain.

His Majesty trusts that the character of the stipulations of the Treaty of Tilsit, and of the principles upon which France is represented as being ready to negociate, may be found to be such as to afford to his Majesty a just hope of the attainment of a secure and honourable Peace. In that case his Majesty will readily avail himself of the offer of the Emperor of Russia's mediation. But until his Majesty shall have received these important and necessary communications, it is obviously impossible that the Undersigned should be authorised to return a more specific Answer to the Note presented by M. Alopeus. The Undersigned requests M. Alopeus to accept the assurances of his high consideration. (Signed) GEORGE CANNING.

[The Declaration of his Britannic Majesty relative to the Danish Expedition, and the Russian Declaration against this Country, were also presented to Parliament.]

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The articles of intelligence received this week are not of peculiar importance, at least when compared with the great events to which we have lately been accustomed. BONAPARTE seems to have some schemes in agitation for still further altering the distribution of Italy. The QUEEN of ETRURIA has been made to bid adieu to her dominions; and, after taking an affectionate farewell of her people, and telling them the ease of mind she felt at leaving them in the hands of so excellent a Sovereign as the Emperor NAPOLEON, has formally evacuated the country, carrying along with her a train of fifty waggons loaded with her baggage. She has the promise of being indemnified in some other quarter for the loss of her territories; but whether in Turkey or not, the accounts do not state.

The result of our present discussions with America is not as yet ascertained. The Americans seem equally alarmed at the proceedings of the French and the British; and dreading that the vessels will be captured and confiscated wherever they steer, they have laid an embargo on all their own ships at present in port. It must be allowed that it is a cruel necessity for a neutral nation to be obliged to put an end to their own commerce, in order to prevent it from falling into the hands of Allies with whom they are at peace: but it does not seem probable that they can remain any longer neutral, if the report be true that BONAPARTE has finally demanded of them to join either France or Britain.

The same orders issued by BONAPARTE against all neutrals who have any intercourse whatever with us, have been enforced in Holland by King LOUIS. He has also issued similar orders against the vessels of Sweden, as have formerly been issued against those of Britain, declaring that he is equally at war with both countries.

Our readers will peruse with interest the correspondence between Mr. CANNING and the Austrian Ambassador at our Court, which has been laid before Parliament, and which we have inserted at length in our Paper of this day. It proves that Austria has the inclination, but not the influence, to mediate a Peace between Britain and France. The notes of Prince STAHREMBERG shew a consciousness of this circumstance. The Russian correspondence discloses little that was not previously known.

We insert a curious article, containing the regulations adopted in the Rio de la Plata, with respect to neutral trade. All neutrals are excluded for two years, even if permitted with the royal licence; while an armistice is concluded with the British squadron cruizing in that river. These regulations may seem to portend the renewal of those efforts to attain independence, which once occasioned such commotion in the Vice-royalty of Buenos Ayres: and in this case, the true policy of Britain is very obvious.

"By the Franklin, Captain Ehrenton, which arrived at Charleston on the 24th of December, from Buenos Ayres, which place she left on the 14th of October, it appears that, about a week prior to her sailing, an order had been issued by the Government there for all neutral vessels to leave the River Plate within forty days from the date of the Order, loaded or unloaded, and that no neutral whatever would be allowed to enter any ports in the River Plate for two years, even if they should have a Royal licence. The Portuguese and Americans were generally considered as spies of the English. General Linier had entered into a new Treaty with the Commander of the British squadron, cruizing in the River, which consisted of a frigate, a sloop, and a cutter. The British were not to molest the River trade between Buenos Ayres to any parts above Monte Video. The Spanish Government are to supply the British squadron, or any ships of their nation which may put in there, with whatsupplies they may want. Maldonado was appointed the place of rendezvous, and this was to continue in force for six months."

Intelligence has been received by the Admiralty, that a squadron, consisting of six sail of the line, and some smaller vessels, have escaped from Rochefort. The squadrons of Sir THOMAS DUCKWORTH and Sir RICHARD STRACHAN are said to be in pursuit of them; but no further authentic accounts have been received.

A squadron, it is reported, appeared off Cork, a few days ago, corresponding in number to the French squadron, and also to the squadrons we have mentioned to be in pursuit. There is every reason to suppose it was one of the latter, if indeed the rumour be not wholly unfounded.

A rumour has reached us, of a mutiny having broken out in one of our line-of-battle ships on a foreign station, that the Captain and First Lieutenant fell victims to the fury of the crew; and that the mutiny was not reduced until after a severe engagement with the flag-ship. To mention the name or station of the ship, till the report is better authenticated, would be highly improper.

The unfortunate town of Flushing, which last year sustained so much damage by the blowing up of a vessel laden with gunpowder in the canal, has lately been overwhelmed by a terrible inundation. The damage occasioned by it could not be ascertained when the accounts came away.

THE THEATRE.

OPERA.

On Tuesday evening was performed a serious Opera called Didone. This piece was altered from the Opera of Metastasio and acted for the purpose of affording to Madame Catalani an opportunity for the display of her talents.

It has not been usual for the periodical critics to speak of the performers at the Opera, in the same serious style which they pursue in their animadversions on the English Theatres: for it seems to have been conceived, though for what reason we cannot discover, that where the music is excellent, the acting is of little importance.—Still less does any body think of regularly criticising the Operas themselves; because the words of the songs are generally hidden by the flourishes of the music, and the story of the recitative is generally slurred by the carelessness of the actors. But as the establishment of the King's Theatre is most splendidly patronized, as every possible encouragement is given there to merit of all descriptions, by an audience certainly the most elegant in London, and as the price of admission at the Opera-house is higher than at any other theatre, it could not be unreasonable to expect that the entertainment should go a little further than the ears. We have admirable singing, it must be confessed; but we want a little tolerable acting. We must not hope ever to behold very fine singers acting very finely, because the perfection either of acting or of singing must alone be almost the employment of a life: but we ought not to see such miserable performers as those who now strut upon the stage of the King's Theatre, and who not only do not feel what they are saying, but really seem not even to understand it. The pieces that are represented are often, it is true, of such a nature, that no powers of acting could make them effective: but if they were decently performed, they would not always be absolutely contemptible: and, besides, we do not know why pieces that no acting can render agreeable, should ever be acted at all.

Perhaps it will be said, that the English do not care about good singing or good acting at the Opera; but this it is impossible to prove: for their acceptance of that which is indifferent is no more an argument of their insensibility to that which is excellent, than the bread-and-cheese appetite of a hungry man is an argument of coarseness in his palate. Let us see good pieces tolerably acted, and we think it quite as possible to create an interest in an Opera, of which the language is not generally understood, as it is to create an interest in a Ballet, where there is no language at all. And the best indication of the public eagerness for dramatic excellence of every kind, at the King's Theatre, is the popularity which has been acquired by an Operatic Actress, not in herself admirable, but eminent by a comparison with the people about her. We mean Madame Catalani. This Lady, if she could be divested of her foreign accent, and introduced into any principal character of English Tragedy, would probably be regarded by the few persons who really understand the science of the Stage, as a very indifferent Actress: and when connoisseurs are heard to express an admiration of her talents, as an Actress, they mean to be understood as speaking of her performances, compared with those of the Ladies and Gentlemen who occupy the inferior situations. She certainly is a good Actress, for the Opera: and so Master Betty was a good Actor, for a boy; but we wish to see the Opera always provided with performers who may be at least too decent to be used merely for foils. Didone is a very tolerable piece, for the Opera; but no one who sees how much situation it possesses, can help regretting that it is not positively good.

Madame Catalani herself acted Didone; and all that voice and person could convey, was effected by her for the interesting heroine of Virgil. But if she aspires to the just reputation of a fine Actress, she should recollect that a perpetual smile, even with her beautiful mouth, will never depict the various passions of love, grief, anger, and disdain, as they occur throughout the interviews of Dido with Æneas and Narbas. Let us say no more of her acting, to which we can give only the praise of "the wicked compared with the more wicked;" but conclude our observations on her Dido, by recording our enthusiastic admiration of her singing; where she stands unrivalled, except by Mrs. Billington alone. Madame Catalani has the peculiar faculty of imparting interest to the Bravura: and those critics who have decided that her powers are generally rather astonishing than fascinating, will probably confess an exception to their judgment, when at the beginning of the second act of Didone, they hear her sing, "Perderò la dolce Speranza."

Madame Dussek made her first appearance on this stage, as Ænea. Her fame in the musical world has been long established; and on this evening, although much alarmed, she was by no means deficient in taste or execution. But her acting was so much worse than that of any singing Miss whose first appearance we ever saw on an English Stage, that even apprehension, for which we always feel a great indulgence, will not be a sufficient excuse for her very slovenly manner of delivering her recitative. Her dress was as ungrateful as it was inappropriate. Æneas in spangled muslin trowsers!

"Heu, quantum mutatus ab illo!"

GENERAL WHITELOCKE'S TRIAL.

Our Readers may depend on the accuracy of the following statements:

Thursday, 28th January, 1808.

Manifest Proof, the Public anxious to witness a Trial of such importance, began to assemble in numbers at the entrance of the Hall, in Chelsea Hospital, where a guard was placed at nine o'clock. At ten, the Members being all in Court, Sir William Meadows, the President, signified his intention of proceeding to the business of the day, when the Hon. Mr. Ryder, the acting Judge Advocate, called over the names of the Officers summoned; being all present; they were again called over to assume their places at the table according to their rank, and seniority, and consisted of the following General Officers; all Senior to the Prisoner:—

Sir William Meadows, K. B. President.

General Garth	Lieut.-Gen. Ld. Vist. Cathcart
.....Norton	.....Farrington
.....Lord Lake	.....Nugent
.....Hulse	.....Manners
.....Earl of Clanricarde	.....Loftus
.....Ogilvie	.....Wilford
.....Cuyler	.....Garth
Lt. Gen. Fox	.....Stavely
.....Sir James Duff	.....Sir J. Moore
.....Harris	.....Sir C. Ross.

The Doors were now thrown open for the public; and shortly after the Prisoner entered, in uniform, but without sash or sword, conducted by Colonel ——; and accompanied by his Counsel Mr. Harrison.

The Lieut.-General bowed to the Court, and was then asked by the Advocate-General "if he had any objections to make;" but all objections being waved, the Court was sworn in.

The King's Warrant for holding the Court was then read: In this were contained the Charges (four in number) with some observations and directions for general guidance.

The usual question of—Guilty, or Not Guilty; was now put, and answered by the Prisoner in an audible voice—"Not Guilty."

A request being now made to the Court, by General Whitelocke, for the assistance of an Officer high in rank in the expedition, but who was stated to be a material witness, if was judged proper to clear the Court, and in half an hour we were again admitted. We do not feel ourselves authorized to enter further into the details of this request, but which we understand was not complied with, as being unprecedented.

Mr. Ryder now addressed the Court in an appropriate speech; and the several papers necessary to open the case were then read; these consisted of Lieutenant-General Whitelocke's Instructions and Appointment to the command—of Details of his Military Force—and of his subsequent Dispatches.

The Judge Advocate having proposed the different modes in which it might be expedient for the Court to proceed, viz. either to consider each charge separately; or to examine witnesses in a regular detail on the general facts. Strangers were again ordered out, and shortly after their re-admission, it was understood the latter mode was adopted. General Gower was then called in about half-past two for examination, and at three the Court adjourned.

Friday, Jan. 29.

A little after ten, the Court opened with the usual ceremonies, and a much larger audience attended than yesterday. General Gower being again called in, his evidence of the day before was read over, and his examination proceeded.

In the course of the evidence, a question was put; to which the prisoner objected, as referring to some points in his conduct, unconnected with the present charges. This question had a reference to the propriety in time of making the attack; but the Judge Advocate, stating to the Court, that the first charge of Improper Conduct must generally embrace such questions, it was judged necessary to clear the Court.

On re-admission it appeared, from the Proceedings, that the objection was over-ruled.

General Gower's examination took up the remainder of the day, and the Court adjourned till Monday next, as Saturday was the Martyrdom of King Charles.

It is supposed that General Gower's evidence is far from being finished. It appears that the trial must necessarily occupy some weeks, as the Court has not proceeded in his examination farther than the 5th of July.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER SIX.

BONAPARTE'S CONDITIONS OF PEACE.

In our last Number we endeavoured to turn the attention of our countrymen towards the restoration of the blessings of Peace, by showing them that it might be attained with safety and advantage. Still, however, some further explanation may be required of us: men may be convinced, from our arguments, that Peace is actually attainable; yet still some hesitation may remain in their minds with regard to the Conditions; and calculating upon some extravagant concessions by which the restoration of tranquillity must be purchased from Bonaparte, they may be brought to look upon War as the only refuge from danger and dishonour.

To satisfy those who may be agitated by such apprehensions, and to bring more directly in view the stipulations by which the contest in which we are at present engaged may be brought to a termination, we shall endeavour to present the public with a view of what our foe would probably concede or demand, and what it would be our interest to assert or forego. We have considered both the letter and the spirit of the Treaty of Amiens; we have observed the actions and pretensions of Bonaparte since that period; we have minutely examined the nature and tendency of all those communications which took place between the British and French Governments in 1806; we have investigated the probable future operations of Bonaparte, relative to the extension and consolidation of his new Empire; and we have carefully examined those manifestations of his present temper which so frequently appear in the political strictures of The Moniteur. It is from these that we have deduced our view of the conditions on which Bonaparte might be willing to conclude Peace with this country; nor are we without positive information on the subject, if positive information, even from the best-informed circles, were equal in authority with conclusions drawn from circumstances which must so necessarily affect the main and success of the negociation. It is well known that at Paris, when any negociation of importance is in view, projets of the probable conditions are circulated among those parties to which the most distinguished political characters resort. These sketches are discussed with freedom, and much information both with regard to the subject and the state of public opinion, is gleaned by those at the head of political affairs. Much advantage is often taken by government of these political coteries, to diffuse those sentiments which it wishes to impress upon the people, who readily take their tone from these superior circles. Various projets relative to the Conditions of Peace with Great Britain, have lately been circulated among the political parties at Paris; and if they are not actually distributed by order of the higher powers, to try the feelings of the people, they are at least discussed by its connivance. By a channel on which we confidently rely, the contents of several of these projets have come to our knowledge; and though most of them differ considerably in their terms, yet the most intelligent bear a strong resemblance to what will be found in the present disquisition.

Article I.—Bonaparte will require the acknowledgment of all those titles he has assumed in his own person, of the form of government and laws which he has established, and in short of the validity of all his internal regulations. No hesitation will be made on the part of our government to accede to this demand; for it is long since we have disavowed every intention of interfering with the internal policy of France.

Article II.—Bonaparte will require the acknowledgment of those subordinate Sovereigns whom he has either created, or advanced to higher titles, or aggrandized by territorial accessions, or enrolled among those dependent Allies which form so important a part in his new plan of empire. This will probably be a topic of much discussion; since, by acceding to it, we should at once formally renounce every hope of seeing Holland, and the other subjected countries of Europe, restored to freedom. The idea of leaving France in the unmolested possession of such vast acquisitions, is, indeed, extremely mortifying; but before we think of waging perpetual War on this account, we must consider whether there is any chance of our hostilities producing a remedy. No one will aver that there is; and, if this be the case, no wiser policy can be devised on our part than to sell to Bonaparte, at as high a price as possible, our acquiescence in his plan of empire.

Article III.—Bonaparte will demand from us to recognise his right to interfere in the maritime affairs of Europe; and, in return, he will recognise our right to interfere in continental affairs. This, the French Government acknowledged, was their view during the negociations in 1806; and thus we should ever be entitled, by the express letter of a treaty, to interfere for preventing those incroachments on other continental powers which Bonaparte may hereafter meditate.

Article IV.—All former treaties, if not passed over in complete silence, to be declared null and void. Such a stipulation is now absolutely required by the new state of things in Europe; nor could we have any reason in remonstrating against it. The omission of such a renewal of treaties was, indeed, brought as an accusation against the framers of the Treaty of Amiens; but the charge was entirely without any just foundation; and since that time, the state of things has undergone a still more extraordinary and complete revolution.

Article V.—Some demands will be made by Bonaparte for confirming to neutrals those rights which were demanded by the Northern Confederacy; but he will soon discover a pretext for abandoning this proposition, as the rights required are merely nugatory in the time of Peace. Nor is it probable that our Government would demand from him an explicit disavowal of his pretensions; for they can never be made valid, until we have lost the command of the seas, and then no letter of a Treaty could secure them to us for a moment.

Article VI.—Great Britain will demand a Commercial Treaty as a pledge of the renewed good-will of France; but Bonaparte, though far more interested in it than we are, will probably not accede to this demand. He has, indeed, on most occasions shown a very complete ignorance of the most essential interests of commerce, nor can he discern the vast advantages which a poor nation must derive from its intercourse with a rich, though the rich nation should appear at first, from the greater display of its means, to be entirely the gainer.

Article VII.—In consideration of those continental possessions which Bonaparte will be allowed to retain, he will not hesitate to give us up, or leave in our hands whatever may be accounted necessary to Great Britain herself. He will guarantee to us Hanover, the Cape, Malta, and very probably the Dutch Colonies in South America, and the French in the East Indies. In 1806, Talleyrand expressly mentioned these terms; and also voluntarily added to the list of our acquisitions, the Island of Tobago, on the ground of its being an English Colony.

Article VIII.—Bonaparte will demand the cession of Sicily, to complete the kingdom of his brother the King of Naples. It would indeed be an uneasy circumstance for King Joseph to have so large and populous an island in his neighbourhood, still acknowledging the sway of that monarch whom he had driven from his other possessions. Great Britain, however, will not consent to see her ally despoiled of territories which she can defend, unless a very large compensation, such as she would be willing to accept, should be provided for him. The Balearic Islands, which France proposed as an equivalent, are by no means a sufficient compensation for Sicily, whether we regard their magnitude, their fertility, their population, or their strength. It does not appear, however, that the French were likely, in 1806, to make this an article sine qua non; nor is it to be supposed that they would have broke off a negociation merely on this account.

Article IX.—France would refuse to negociate unless in concert with Russia, and would therefore demand that the claims of this ally should be satisfied. To this we could not well refuse our assent, as we broke off the last negociation with France, merely because she would not listen to such a proposal on our part. We could not reject, as unreasonable, a proposal on the reasonableness of which we had ourselves so loudly insisted.

Article X.—Reparation will be demanded for the damage which Denmark sustained from our forces, previous to the declaration of War. That power is now the Ally of Russia and France, and both these powers have pledged themselves to procure for her this reparation. We must acknowledge that the difficulty attending a compromise of this circumstance, is the only obstacle which seems likely to perplex the negociation in a very serious manner; yet we cannot conceive that our notions of national pride, either on the one side or the other, should allow the consequences of this transaction to deprive the universe of the blessings of Peace.

Article XI.—Great Britain will demand of France the restitution of those territories of which she has lately robbed Portugal. To this demand, it is not more likely that the French will accede, than that we should pay a compensation to Denmark. It is probable that, in the event of negociation, the two transactions with respect to Portugal and Denmark, will be set off against each other; and that some Spanish islands will be alloted as a further compensation to the Prince of the Brazils.

Article XII.—Great Britain will demand for her faithful ally the King of Sweden, the restoration of those possessions in Pomerania which have been wrested from him by the arms of France. It is not, however, to be expected, that Bonaparte will readily retract those threats, which he has so often uttered against that restless and spirited monarch, to deprive him entirely of every possession which might give him any title to interfere in the affairs of Germany. Great Britain, on the other hand, could never consent to see the King of Sweden left without any indemnification; and it is probable that the fertile genius of Bonaparte, aided by his complete command of continental territory, would soon devise an expedient to reconcile these difficulties. By an accession of the populous and commercial territory, to the South and East of Holstein, Denmark might be raised to the rank of a considerable continental power; and Bonaparte would trust to the animosity excited in this power against Britain for a long continuance of her friendship with France. In lieu of this accession of territory, Denmark might not be unwilling to renounce her claim to the inhospitable regions of Norway; and these, in turn, might afford to Sweden such a compensation as might sooth her feelings for the loss of Pomerania.

Such are the stipulations which would, at present, probably form the basis of a negociation between France and England. If these could be adjusted to the satisfaction of both parties, it is not probable that considerable difficulties would occur with regard to less important points. The result would certainly be highly advantageous to both parties; since, in the Conditions which we have specified, Bonaparte makes no demand which could diminish either the power or the prosperity of Britain; nor are the demands of Britain anywise repugnant to the interests of France.

There are men, both in Britain and in France, who might quarrel with the moderation of these conditions, and think that neither of their governments were justified in conceding so much to the enemy. The sanguine French politician might exclaim, that the modern Carthage ought to be humbled, that she ought to be compelled to renounce her assumed tyranny over the seas, and be brought to acknowledge herself exactly on a level with all other maritime nations. Our English politicians of the same stamp will, no doubt, find that such conditions are tame, spiritless, and insecure; that Bonaparte ought to be made to stipulate exactly the number of ships which he shall be entitled to build or maintain in the harbours both of France and of her dependent allies; and that he ought not to be left in possession of the numerous important naval stations which he has occupied. But it is evident, that neither the one nor the other can respectively force its antagonist to submit to such Conditions: and between independent nations, every man of real discernment will allow, that a Peace of moderation is alone likely to be permanent.

We cannot close this article without remarking that the light in which Bonaparte views this country, at present, is very different from that in which she appeared to him at the period of the Peace of Amiens. At that time France had not fairly tried her uttermost efforts against Britain; and Bonaparte, on surveying his own vast resources, and observing that Britain had always so anxiously courted and bought the assistance of foreign Allies, while France had so completely overturned these combinations, conceived that Britain was actually unable to contend single-handed with France, and had even the temerity to make a public boast of this opinion. But experience has since proved to him the utter futility of such notions; and at present, though France is assisted by the united power of the Continent, she has been able to shew her animosity against Britain, only by vexatious decrees which have annihilated her own commerce and injured that of neutral nations; while Britain, altogether beyond the reach of her enmity, continues to insult her coasts, and to navigate the seas in perfect security. It is not likely, therefore, that Bonaparte will suffer some sudden gust of passion to precipitate him again into hostilities with a nation, which, he knows from experience, is capable of inflicting on his subjects such serious injuries, while retaliation is beyond his power.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. VI.

THE INDEPENDENT WHIG.

The Liberty of the Press may be considered as the palladium of our free Constitution: while the former is carefully preserved, we cannot be deprived of the latter. Of this Constitution, which we are naturally so anxious to guard, there is no part which in a greater degree promotes the happiness of the subject, or more effectually wards off every species of oppression, than Trial by Jury. Much, indeed, then, it is to be deprecated that the Freedom of the Press, and Trial by Jury, should ever be found, by any chance, foes to each other. The guardian of the Constitution is thus found attempting to destroy what it can alone preserve; that form of trial without which the accusations against every trivial abuse of the press, would soon lead to the total destruction of its freedom. The one cannot stand without the other, nor our liberties without either.

We have been led into these reflections by a late very violent attack which has appeared in several Numbers of The Independent Whig, against the verdict of a Jury in a case of murder. We do not pretend to judge in any degree of the justice or injustice of the decision past, nor shall we at all give our private sentiments upon the subject. We only deprecate the manner in which the strictures of The Independent Whig have been conducted; and the bad consequences which must ensue should the Jurors, as is apprehended, commence a prosecution against the Editor of that Paper.

In every case, both civil and criminal, there must be some tribunal from which there is no appeal: and the wisdom of our forefathers has in our country committed the final decision of all causes, in which the lives and liberties of the people are concerned, to twelve impartial men, of the rank of the accused. These men are to decide the cause entirely by the evidence before them; and that every thing may be made plain to their understandings, and that no dubiety whatever may be left with regard to any essential point, the law does not permit them to deliver a verdict until they have all become unanimous in their opinion of the guilt or innocence of the accused. No nation has ever devised any expedient by which personal liberty could be more completely secured to the subject; and the instances are innumerable in which English Juries have asserted the innocence of their Peers in defiance of all the arts and threats of the Executive power.

But such has been found to be the superior benefits of a Jury, as a final tribunal in criminal causes, it must be altogether unwise to rail against this institution, for such defects as cannot be separated from any human establishment. So much is the impartiality of Juries guarded by the manner in which they are selected, that bribery or private influence is altogether out of the question; and if, therefore, on any occasion, a Jury decides in opposition to what the spectator thinks just, it is certainly by no means fair, that this opinion should entitle the spectator to brand the Jury with the odious crime of deliberate perjury. Twelve men, though applying all their penetration to discover the truth of the evidence brought before them, may possibly be led into mistakes, may condemn the innocent and acquit the guilty; but this is much less likely than that a clamour should be excited either for or against the accused among the public at large, who have neither heard nor weighed the evidence, nor, under the solemn obligation of an oath, have deliberately made up their decision.

We would neither gag the mouths of men, nor bind up their pens, to prevent them from delivering their opinions, either with regard to the verdict of a jury or any other question. They may expatiate on the evidence; they may point out the circumstances on which, in their opinion, a verdict ought to have turned; they may declare, that their decision would have been different, had they sat on the trial. So far, certainly, the press may go, otherwise its freedom is a mere dead letter. But the Independent Whig is far from being contented with this degree of liberty; it directly asserts, that the man who was found innocent is guilty, that the evidence clearly demonstrated him to be so, and that the jury, with open eyes, committed a direct and deliberate act of perjury. This is a serious, and, indeed, a flagrant charge; it is such as cannot be passed over by the jury, either in their capacity of a public tribunal, or as private men. The Whig has threatened to publish the names and residence of all the jurymen, as it has already done that of their foreman; and thus, as it were, to set a mark upon them as perjured men, who ought to be hooted and expelled from society. In this situation of things, the jury have no other resource but a legal prosecution to rescue them from a load of perpetual infamy.

If a prosecution should be commenced against The Independent Whig, there is little doubt of its being successful. Even if the jurymen should prefer the civil form of prosecution and sue for damages, it is impossible that the Whig should make good its charges; for that would be to make one jury judge the verdict of another. But if the criminal form of prosecution should be preferred, as most probably it will, even the truth of its allegations could not be urged in its defence. By this means the freedom of the press, and the inviolability of the decisions delivered by juries, will come to an issue, and the former will suffer as usual by the criminal folly of men who abuse it for improper purposes. Well may it be alleged, that the Independent Whig is in our days, one of the greatest enemies of the press.

If the jury seemed, indeed, to decide directly against evidence, it was the province of the Judge to have sent them back to re-consider their verdict; a power which has frequently been employed in cases of very little importance. But the Judge himself has not, on the present occasion, escaped his share of censure; and it has been alleged, that in summing up the evidence, it was not necessary to have been so particular in pointing out the grounds on which the prisoner might be acquitted. This objection is still more unreasonable than what has been urged against the verdict of the jury. It is the proper business of the Judge to sum up the evidence with perfect impartiality, and to omit no circumstance which can weigh either for or against the prisoner. But the English common law goes still farther: it requires that the judge should consider himself as counsel for the prisoner, and consequently bound to be most particular in recounting every circumstance that may weigh on the side of mercy. This singular trait of humanity has arisen from a very cruel practice in our criminal procedure, one of the barbarous remains of the feudal system. According to that system, both the lands and the people were considered as the property of the King; and hence the fiction arose, that all offences done against the subjects were against the King. But it was thought unpardonable in those days, that a subject should be allowed to plead against the King in his own courts; and therefore the prisoner was denied every aid on his trial. In cases of high treason, where the King was personally interested, not only was the prisoner refused the assistance of counsel, but it was even accounted a special favour if he were allowed to summon witnesses in his favour, to cross-question those of the King, or to make any concluding comments in his own behalf. Such was the state of things when Sir Walter Raleigh prayed for deliverance from the bloody laws of England. An alteration, which does honour to the humanity of modern times, has taken place in these affairs; and State Trials are now conducted, as they so much require to be, with every indulgence to the prisoner. In the ordinary criminal prosecutions at common law, however, the accused is still left at a cruel disadvantage: he is allowed the assistance of Counsel merely in suggesting questions to be put to the witnesses, and in giving him hints for his own procedure. He is allowed no assistance in summing up the evidence, or in stating his case in the most forcible manner to the Jury. From his ignorance and want of ability, he is usually obliged to consign himself silently into the hands of his Judges.

The humanity of the English character, revolting at the cruelty of these institutions, and yet unwilling to depart from ancient forms, has endeavoured to make up the defect by the singular fiction, that the judge is to be considered as counsel for the prisoner, and as bound to sum up the evidence in his behalf. It is certain that the consciousness of this circumstance, operating upon the mind of the judge, has frequently influenced the nature of the charge, and it is not possible that frequent complaints should not be raised both against judges and juries, until this very unjustifiable defect in our forms of criminal procedure be remedied.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH PAPERS.

PARIS, JAN. 23.—The Moniteur of the 21th contains a Decree of the Conversative Senate for calling out the conscription of the year 1809. It is to consist of 80,000 to be drawn from the youths of eighteen and nineteen years of age.

By another Decree of the Conservatory Senate in the same paper, the towns of Kehl, Cassel, Weser, and Flushing, are united to the French Empire:—Kehl, to the department of the Lower Rhine; Cassel, to the department of Mount Tonnere; Wesel, to the department of the Roer; and Flushing, to the department of the Scheldt.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, JAN. 9.—The following Correspondence is of the greatest importance; it commences after the taking of Copenhagen, and shews to what means the English Goverment has recourse to obtain their ends.

No. I.—Extract of a Report from M. RIST, Charge d'Affaires from Denmark to the English Court, to the Minister of State, Count BERNSTORFF, dated London, Sept. 27, 1807.

It was probably to give more weight to these considerations, which Mr. Canning proposed to me, by reading to me yesterday his first minute of the propositions of the Court of London, that he thought it right to add to it a brief exposition of the consequence which the refusal on our part to treat would be attended with. He then read to me the following five menaces which it contained.—1. The confiscation of all the vessels already detained, and yet to be detained. 2. The capture of our colonies. 3. The destruction of our trade. 4. The possibility of being obliged to introduce Swedish troops into Copenhagen. 5. The necessity which might arise, of rewarding and indemnifying his Swedish Majesty with the possession of Norway.—Mr. Canning judged it fit to leave out these menaces in the copy of the verbal Note which he sent me.

No. II.—Extract of a Report from the Same to the Same, dated London, 2d October, 1807.

I thought Mr. Merry had taken his departure when he called on me yesterday, and told me that intelligence received by Government had retarded his departure, and made Mr. Canning wish to see me once more before he dispatched him. I waited accordingly on the Minister, accompanied by Mr. Merry. The object of the interview was to acquaint me, that a messenger arrived this morning, who had brought the confirmation of the disposition of his Swedish Majesty to co-operate with his Britannic Majesty for the common interest, in case that his assistance should be wanted; in other words, that Swedish troops were ready to replace those of the English Government in Zealand, if the latter were obliged, on account of the capitulation, or another destination, to evacuate that island.

Mr. Canning concluded by proposing to me to avail myself of the departure of Mr. Merry to press my Court to accede to an arrangement, the refusal of which would unavoidably be followed by the Swedish co-operation, and to represent to my Court the urgent necessity of coming speedily to some preliminary accommodation.

No. III.—Letter from Count BERNSTOFF, Danish Minister for Foreign Affairs, to Baron WETTERSEDT, First Secretary of the Cabinet of his Swedish Majesty, dated Kiel, Oct. 17, 1807.

Permit me, Sir, to apply direct to you, to require of you officially an explanation, which it is important for my Court to obtain in an authentic manner. The English Government had thought proper to make a proposition to my Court, in part, on the threat of a co-operation of Sweden in the hostile measures of Great Britain against Denmark. The Cabinet of London dares to assert, that his Swedish Majesty has offered to cause the English troops in Zealand to be replaced by part of his own troops, in case that the former should be obliged to evacuate that island. The loyalty of the Sovereign, whose intentions it is thus attempted to calumniate, and the nature of the relations which subsist between Denmark and Sweden, sufficiently prove the falsity of that insidious assertion. But we shall feel great satisfaction to be authorized by his Swedish Majesty himself, to answer by a formal and flat denial, an insinuation more injurious to him than it is to us. This, Sir, is the only motive which induces me to demand of you a frank and positive explanation on this subject. I take leave to request you will send it me by the bearer of this letter, Mr. Holster, Lieutenant of the Royal Navy.

No. IV.—Answer from Baron WETTERSEDT, Minister of State, dated Helsinburgh, Oct. 27, 1807.

This note contains a refusal to correspond in any other than the official mode.

No. V.—Note addressed by the Minister of State Count BERNSTORFF to Baron TAUBE, Charge d'Affaires of his Swedish Majesty, dated Kiel, Nov. 5, 1807.

This note is the same in substance exactly as note 3d.

[Four other notes were interchanged on this subject, without any explicit answer being given, and the correspondence was closed with the following:]

No. IX.—Note addressed by Baron TAUBE, to Count BERNSTORFF, dated Kiel, Dec. 21, 1807.

The Undersigned has brought the note to the knowledge of the King, his master, which Count Bernstorff had the goodness to address to him the 4th of Dec. touching the explanation required by the Court of Copenhagen, with regard to a pretended denunciation of intentions entertained by Sweden, to occupy the Island of Zealand with Swedish troops. The King avoided to explain himself on this subject; but as the Danish Government desires an answer, that had his Majesty judged it necessary to occupy Zealand with his troops jointly with those of his Ally, he should have done it: and the King wishes that he may never find himself in the case to regret that he did not act otherwise.—The Undersigned has the honour to renew to Count Bernstorff the assurance of his high consideration.—(Moniteur, Jan. 23.)

JAN. 5.—The 10th ult. the battery of the Three Crowns stopped a vessel under Russian colours, and which had been furnished with false papers, attesting that she came from a neutral port; the real papers being hid in a false ham, made of tin, and placed in a locker in the Captain's cabin; a Danish sailor, who was on board against his will, discovered the deception to the Officer sent on board, and told him that the ship came from London. Her cargo, consisting of kerseymeres, pieces of handkerchiefs, &c. is valued at 1,000,000 rix dollars.

There are again near Gottenburgh four English ships, which design to interrupt the navigation between Denmark and Norway. The Asiatic Company expect the return of five ships richly laden, estimated at the value of 2,155,600 rix dollars, Danish currency.

WEST INDIES.

JAMAICA.—KINGSTON, DEC. 12.—The Kingston regiment and three troops of horse, were mustered on the parade early on Wednesday morning, when they immediately received orders to proceed in divisions through the city, to search the Negro houses, &c. for fire arms, which might have improperly come into the possession of the Negroes; but few, however, were found. The different avenues to the city were guarded by the regulars, and the troops of horse visited the pens in the vicinity. A few foreigners were taken up, but afterwards, on examination, liberated. In the month of September, a dreadful gale of wind was felt in the Bay of Mexico. At Campeachey 50 houses were destroyed, and about 50 vessels lost. The tide rose to such height, as to drive vessels three miles inland the interior. About twelve vessels were lost at Vera Cruz, and most of the crews perished.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, FEB. 1, 1808.

LORD CATHCART was introduced as a British Peer, and took the oaths and his seat. As soon as he and Lord Gambier had taken their places,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR addressed himself to Lord Cathcart, and communicated to him, from a paper in his hand, the thanks of the House for his services in the late expedition. He assured his Lordship that the House attached that value to a Resolution of this nature, that it never was conferred but where the magnitude of the service performed was proportionately distinguished. The forbearance and humanity which his Lordship had shewn in the execution of his military duty, were equally grateful to that House as they were congenial to the feelings and character of the country.

LORD CATHCART, after expressing his emotions at the honour conferred on him, said, he could not omit the opportunity of expressing his gratitude to the gallant troops by whose exertions he had been placed in a situation to receive so distinguished a mark of their Lordship's approbation. He concluded with begging the Lord Chancellor to accept his sincerest thanks for the kind terms in which he had communicated to him the Resolution of the House.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR then addressed Lord Gambier in a similar manner.

LORD GAMBIER expressed his gratitude in strong terms. He said, he could truly assure their Lordships, that it was with extreme pain they had recourse to force in the execution of their orders: and that they had not done so until every means of peaceful negociation had been tried in vain. The blood, therefore, which had been shed must lie solely on the heads of those who had thought proper to exert a hopeless and unavailing resistance.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK postponed to Monday next the motion, to which he had given notice for Thursday, on the subject of the Expedition to Zealand.

Lord Grey's motion for Papers relative to the Negociation for Russia; and Lords Auckland and Holland's, for Papers relative to the American Treaty, and Bonaparte's Decree of the 21st of Nov. 1806, all of which stood for this evening, were also postponed for the purpose of further consideration.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEB. 2.

The Reversionary Grant Prohibition Bill was brought up from the Commons, read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

The Commissioners of the Customs presented the usual annual accounts respecting East India prohibited goods.

LORD MOIRA brought in a Bill for amending the Law of Debtor and Creditor, and for punishing fraudulent Debtors. It was not his intention, he said, to urge the Bill further than the stage of printing it, until an opportunity occurred for certain Lords to attend, whom he should wish to see in their places on the second reading. The Bill was then read a first time, and ordered to be printed.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 3.

Lord Auckland presented a Petition from Sir J. Innes, the respondent in the appeal respecting the Roxborough estates, praying that the cause should be heard out of the regular course on the 8th of May next. His Lordship, in support of the Petition, principally relied on the advanced age of the Petitioner, which left him little hopes of seeing the termination of the cause, if it were not to be heard until those which preceded it in the list, amounting to more than 160, were disposed of; and on the ground that the succession to the estates involved the right to several titles and dignities.

After some observations from the Lord Chancellor, Lords Lauderdale and Spencer, Lord Auckland intimated that he should delay any further proceeding in the Petition until Friday.

THURSDAY, FEB. 4.

Lord Auckland said, he thought it right to submit to the House for its information, the view which he meant to take of the Orders in Council, conformably to his notice for taking that subject into consideration on Friday se'nnight. His Lordship accordingly stated, that it was his intention to consider every thing which that question involved, namely, the law of nations: the exceptions in the orders to that law; and, next, the effect of the measure, in all its bearings, both as it affected this and every other country with which we had relations of any kind.

Lord Grenville observed, that he had read and heard with regret, that the President of the United States of America had refused to ratify the Treaty concluded between the Commissioners appointed by both countries, for the purpose of carrying that beneficial object into execution. Though he thus expressed his sorrow and disappointment under existing circumstances, he was wholly unacquainted in any official manner whether the fact was so; yet, if it proved true, and that it arose from a refusal on our part not to abandon those principles of maritime law and right which established our recognised supremacy, he should feel the utmost satisfaction. Leaving all other point for the discussion which was to take place on this subject, he should move at present, that there be laid before the House a Copy of any Message received from the President of the United States of America, respecting his non-ratification of the Treaty entered into between the Commissioners for the United States of America, and the Commissioners appointed by this country, if any such had been received.

The motion however was over-ruled, on the ground that it would be irregular to produce such information before the Treaty itself.

Lord Erskine wished to know whether the United States were made acquainted with our Orders in Council at the time they had ordered their embargo.

Lord Mulgrave replied, that they were not.

Lord Grey gave notice, that he should move, on some future day, for all such documents as related to the attack on Constantinople, in order to exhibit to this country, and to the world, the gross misrepresentation which had gone abroad respecting that subject.

Lord Holland's motion was ordered to stand for Monday; and Lord Auckland's motion for Monday se'nnight.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 5.

Lords Hutchinson and Glastonbury took the oaths and their seats.

On the motion of Lord Auckland, so much of Sir James Innes's Petition as related to the Roxborough titles, was referred to the Committee of Privileges.

Mr. Hayes, from the Bank of England, presented an account of the disposal of the produce of the Sinking Fund last year.

The Bill for repealing Queen Anne's Bounty Act Suspension Act, went through a Committee.

In the case of Francis Gould, v. Langley, the decree of the Irish Chancery was affirmed, with 200l. costs, no appearance having been made on the part of the appellant.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE ARMY AND NAVY.

The Speaker also communicated the Thanks of the House (which he pronounced by way of an eulogium) to Generals Sir A. Wellesley, Finch, and Grosvenor, and Sir H. Popham, who were present, the two former and the latter returned their grateful thanks to the House for the high and distinguished honour done to them.

The Papers moved for on Friday by Mr. G. Ponsonby, relative to the affairs of Copenhagen, were laid on the table by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The American Intercourse Bill was read a first time.

The Bill to prevent granting Offices in Reversion, after a few words from Sir S. Romilly and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was read a third time and passed.

Mr. Canning laid on the table the Papers moved for on Friday by Mr. Whitbread, relative to the Russian Mediation.

Mr. Whitbread, agreeable to notice, moved that there be laid before the House a correct List of all the Transports, their tonnage, and the number of men employed in the Expedition to Copenhagen; and Copies of the Instructions to Admiral Gambier, and from him to the different Officers under his command, in the Expedition to Copenhagen.

Mr. Windham moved, that a Copy of Admiral Gambier's letter to Peyman, and the answer thereto, be laid before the House.

Mr. Windham moved, that there be laid before the House a Return of the Regular Forces, both at home and abroad, the different means of recruiting them, and the number of deserters from the 1st of July, 1807, till the latest time such Return could be made up. Also a Return of the number for which Bounty has been drawn, as well as the number of Soldiers who volunteered from the Militia into the Regulars, together with the effective force of the Militia. These motions were agreed to.

Lord Folkstone put off his motion relative to the Oude Papers till to-morrow se'nnight.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEB. 2.

Mr. Speaker read to the House a letter from Lord Cathcart, in an answer to the Vote of Thanks to his Lordship, &c. of Thursday last.

General Stuart presented an account of the number of transports employed against Copenhagen.—Ordered to be printed.

The House went into a Committee on so much of the Navigation Act, as related to the Brazils; when the Chairman was instructed to move the House for leave to bring in a Bill permitting the Importation of Goods, in Portuguese ships, from the Portuguese territory in South America, in vessels belonging to Portugal.

Mr. G. Ponsonby inquired if there were not some dispatches omitted from among those produced to the House.

Mr. Canning replied, that every one in the possession of Ministers, of any importance, had been produced.

Mr. Perceval intimated, that on Monday next he should state to the House what had passed between him and the Governor of the Bank of England relative to the Reports from the Committee of Finance.

Mr. Eden moved for a copy of the Message from the President of the United States to both Houses of Congress, dated the 27th of October, 1807.—Ordered.

Mr. Tierney moved for copies of such correspondence as had passed between the First Lord of the Treasury, or the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Governor, or Deputy Governor of the Bank, respecting the management of the national debt, the application of the unclaimed dividends, and a loan of money for the public service.

After a few words from Mr. Perceval and Mr. S. Thornton, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. Huskisson moved for an account of the unclaimed dividends remaining at the Bank, for the last three quarters, as they then stood in the Bank-books, distinguishing the amount in each quarter, up to the day of the respective issues from the Bank to the Exchequer. Ordered.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 3.

Mr. Huskisson presented to the House Copies of the Correspondence, moved for last night by Mr. Tierney, between the First Lord of the Treasury and the Governor of the Bank of England, respecting the management of the National Debt and Unclaimed Dividends.

The Bill for Permitting the Importation of Good in Portuguese ships, from South America, was read a first time.

On the motion of Mr. Huskisson, the amount of Exchequer Bills outstanding and unfunded, for the year 1807, was ordered to be laid before the House.

NAVAL ASYLUM.

Sir Charles Pole, agreeable to the notice he had given on a former night, stated the object of his motion was with a view to correct abuses which had already crept into this Institution. The Officers who had been appointed to its management were men who had not the most distant connection with the Navy. The gallant Admiral pointed out several who had meritoriously served their King, and bled in defence of their country, who had been rejected, for what cause it was his object to find out. Among others Mr. Keene, Admiral Cornwallis's surgeon, had been rejected for another person who never had been in the navy; even the place of Matron was disposed of to a stranger in preference to an officer's widow.

Mr. Rose, Mr. Thornton, and Lord Newark, on the other hand, contended that no undue preference had been given, and for the Surgeoncy they did not know, nor ever heard (though the former and the latter are Commissioners) that Mr. Keene had applied; and according to the infant state of the Institution the Commissioners could not act otherwise with regard to the appointment of Surgeon and Matron, as no other candidates appeared at the time the election was made.

The question was then put, that Copies of Warrants granted by his Majesty to the Officers appointed to the management of the Naval Asylum, with a correct list of their salaries, and other emoluments, be laid before the House. The gallery was ordered to be cleared, and on our return, we understood that a division had taken place—For the motion 75—Against it 190.

AFFAIRS OF COPENHAGEN.

Mr. G. Ponsonby, agreeable to a previous notice, rose and said he had an important and anxious duty to perform, a duty which he hoped would lead to disclose the circumstances which induced his Majesty to direct his naval and military force against the capital of an unoffending neutral State. His Majesty owed it to himself and all Europe, to give a frank exposition of the motives which led him to violate the laws of neutrality. It was well understood that the disgraceful expedition was not undertaken by the advice of his Majesty, but with other views, and perhaps interested motives, which Ministers only could explain. It was not the conduct of Denmark which led to it, but an anticipation that France would, at some time or other, compel that State to join in the common cause against this country. At the time Admiral Gambier entered the Sound, Denmark dreaded no harm from this country, conscious of not having entered into any engagement wth the French Emperor. Three hundred and fifty of her ships were in different British ports, with cargoes amounting to two millions of rix dollars; and when the Danish subjects got alarmed by the rumours spread, respecting the destination of the armament, they applied to the Danish Court, and received a reply, which at once allayed their fears, namely, that Great Britain had no such intention, as both Courts were then on the best possible understanding. Was it to be supposed that Denmark would risk her most valuable colonies, her commerce, and ships, and every thing else dear to her existence, merely to gratify the wish of the French Ruler. But at the time the negociation between the Court of Demark and the Emperor of France was supposed to be going forward, the former had, according to the calculation of the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite to him, (Mr. Perceval) sixty-five thousand men in Zealand and Holstein, to oppose all the force France could bring against her, therefore it was morally impossible she could be compelled to enter into the views of France against this country; on the other hand, as a proof that Denmark did not intend to join in the common cause, her sailors were at the time all abroad, consequently her navy could not be manned without them. He would spare them the trouble of replying, and boldly affirm that they had not the slightest ground for impeaching the good faith of Denmark? He defied Ministers to produce any paper which would convince the House of the intention of Russia to influence Denmark to declare against this country. The Hon Member then moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to give directions that the substance and dates of all information, sent by our Officers or Agents from the coast of Copenhagen, last year, respecting the Danish fleet, the repairing, improving, and manning of the same, together with all accounts that were transmitted relative to the improvement thereof, and received by his Majesty's Ministers, should be laid before the House."

Mr. Secretary Canning was well convinced that Ministers had obtained what they deserved, the thanks of their country, for the success of the expedition against Copenhagen, as that enterprise had been in a great degree the salvation of the country. He was as anxious as the Right Hon. Gentleman himself not to act upon the new morality attempted to be laid down, and were there any Gentlemen who seemed inclined to that system of morality, it was the Right Hon. Gentleman himself, who, upon the present occasion had given a splendid example of his attachment to it. It was, he doubted not, a sincere morality, nay, even a Roman morality. The House had been called on to discuss a matter, involving, as it was said, the disgrace of Ministers, but they by an eminent and strong sense of the necessity which impelled the enterprise, had the satisfaction of knowing that it had been ably and successfully performed. (Hear? hear? from the Ministerial side.) He was fully answered that Ministers had received no board of glory from their predecessors, and there could be no comparison between the success which crowned the Copenhagen enterprise, when contrasted with what had been done by the late Administration. The fleet of Denmark had fallen into our hands, we could not return that spoil, and it was now attempted to condemn the spoilers, and insisted upon, that the spoil out to be returned. He agreed with the Right Hon. Gentleman that if there was any injustice in the seizure of the Danish fleet, that injustice ought not only to be marked but repaired. It never was, or had been, imputed to Denmark, that she had to chuse whether she would go to war with us. Such a principle had never been maintained; neither would it have been at all necessary. It had been said, that the weakness of Denmark was a sufficient justification of the measure, but that was not the case; neither was it true that we had the hearts of the Danes with us. It was impossible to conceive for one moment, after the defeat of the Northern Confederacy, that Denmark could ever have been with us. On the contrary, from that period the feelings of Denmark had been hostile to a degree against this country. Here the Right Hon. Gentleman stated the circumstances attending the Northern Confederacy in 1780, and in 1802. Since the latter, the league was to the same effect, only more firmly knitted, and more vigorous, by the strong compulsion of France. The Danish forces were, in 1808, compelled to retreat from the frontiers of Holstein, which had given rise to a calumny against this country, that they had so retreated at our express solicitation. For that, however, there was not the most distant foundation. After that Prince Murat was sent by Bonaparte to the King of Sweden, entreating that Monarch to make common cause with France, and promising him, in that event, Norway, which belonged to Denmark. The King of Sweden instantly communicated this offer to the Prince Royal of Denmark, and offered him 20,000 troops for the defence of Holstein. This generous offer the Prince Royal refused, believing he could rely on the assurances of France; and he did more; he concealed from England the fact of the French offer to him of Norway. Having stated these and other points, the Right Hon. Gentleman appealed to the House whether or not it would have been wise or prudent in Ministers to have relied on the fidelity and independence of Denmark, especially after the warnings she had received. Mr. Canning went at great length into the general policy of the attack at Copenhagen, which he justified on all its grounds. After some further remarks, he concluded by giving the Resolution his most decided and hearty negative.

Mr. Windham replied in a strong vein of irony, in which he ridiculed the recrimination of Mr. Canning, and threw out strong sarcasms on stage effect, grand steps, gestures, and tricks of voice. His arguments against Ministers turned chiefly on the violation of the law of nations.

The debate was afterwards protracted to a very great length. On the part of Ministers the chief Speakers were Mr. Miles, Mr. Foster, Lord Palmerston, Mr. Morris, Mr. Lyttleton, Lord G. L. Gower, Lord Castlereagh, Sir Charles Price, and Mr. Davies Geddy. They were answered principally by Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Bathurst, and Mr. T. Grenville.

The House divided on Mr. Ponsonby's motion,

Ayes 108—Noes 253—Majority for Ministers 145.

Adjourned at half-past six o'clock.

THURSDAY, JAN. 4.

Mr. Wharton brought up the Report of the Committee of Ways and Means. The several Resolutions were agreed to, and Bills ordered to be brought in pursuant to the same.

OFFICE OF TREASURER OF THE NAVY.

Mr. Ross moved for leave to bring in a Bill for amending the Act for regulating the Office of Treasurer of the Navy, with the view of more effectually preventing the undue application of the balances in his hands. Leave granted.

Mr. Huskisson brought up accounts, shewing the amount of Exchequer Bills for the last year, outstanding, and unprovided for, which were laid on the table.

On the motion of Mr. Huskisson, leave was granted to bring in a Bill for regulating the Payment of Exchequer Bills.

STATE OF IRELAND.

Mr. Sheridan rose for the purpose of postponing his motion on this subject, which at present stood for Monday next. His reasons were, that a number of Gentlemen materially interested in the question could not then attend, and because a number of Petitions from Ireland, on the subject of tythes, were likely soon to be presented to the House. On Monday next he hoped to be able to name a day for his intended motion.

FRIDAY, FEB. 5.

The Marquis of Titchfield, from the Committee to determine the merits of the Election for the Borough of Chippenham, presented its report to the House, when James Hawkins, Esq. was declared duly elected.

Mr. Hase, from the Bank of England, presented at the Bar of the House, the Papers moved for by Mr. Huskisson, respecting the National Debt, Sinking Fund, Unclaimed Dividends, and Lottery Prizes, which were ordered to be printed.

Mr. Rose brought in a Bill to amend a Bill for Regulating the Office of Treasurer of his Majesty's Navy, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

The American Intercourse Bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

The time for taking the Pearhyn Election Petition into consideration was postponed till the 24th of March.

Mr. Huskisson brought in a Bill, continuing to his Majesty the Malt, Sugar, and other Duties for the service of the current year. It was read a first time, and ordered to be read again on Monday. The Hon. Member also brought in another Bill to enable his Majesty to pay off the Exchequer Bills outstanding for the last year, which was read a first time, and ordered to be read again on Monday.

On the motion of Mr. Huskisson, it was ordered that there be laid before the House an account of the Three per Cent. Annuities, appointed for paying off the Interest of the Eighteen Millions Loyalty Loan; also an account of the Interest paid on Exchequer Bills for the last three years.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole to consider of the Supplies for the current year. The Report was ordered for Monday.

Mr. Tierney moved, That there be laid before the House, an Account of the Naval and Military Stores taken at Copenhagen, specifying the quality, quantity, and value.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer moved, That the House do resolve itself into a Committee of Ways and Means, to which these Orders were referred.

On the question being put, that the Speaker do now leave the Chair—

Lord H. Petty said, he was not so fully qualified to form a legal opinion upon the propriety of these Orders as the Learned Gentleman over the way; but the House was competent to decide how far the Privy Council was justified in advising his Majesty to issue Orders contrary to the law of nations, and the municipal law of England. As these Orders emanated from his Majesty, the House had a right to examine how far the prerogative of the Crown ought to be carried before the necessity of a Parliament was entirely superseded. The Noble Lord would take it upon himself to convince the House, from the first legal Authorities, that these Orders were illegal; and quoted the Duke of Newcastle's Letter respecting the seizure of the Prussian ships contrary to the opinion of several celebrated Civilians; and the then Attorney, and Solicitor Generals, and Lord Eldon's opinion, in an appeal case last war, when his Lordship did not by any means consider Orders in Council legal; as they formed no part of the law of the land, therefore no necessity whatever could be pleaded in assuming what was absolutely the privilege of Parliament. Under all these circumstances, he thought a Bill of Indemnity advisable, to exonerate Ministers from the consequence of having unduly advised his Majesty to issue Orders repugnant to the laws of England.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer denied the arguments and assertions of the Noble Lord, that there was any thing illegal in the Orders of Council issued by Ministers. The jurisdiction of the Privy Council was adapted to the prerogative of the Crown, and the effect depended entirely on the war prerogative of the Sovereign. It had no concern with the peace prerogative, which was a matter essentially different, as it went to warding off dangers, such as famine, or any other domestic calamity. The only and sole justification, therefore, of his Majesty in issuing these Orders of Council was his war prerogative, and that only. If that was so, then he would assert, that Parliament had no more authority to alter the Law of Nations, than the Noble Lord had, which was a thing he could not do. He contended, that Ministers were justified in issuing those Orders in Council, and in retorting the blockade on France and her dependencies, and all neutrals. The Noble Lord could not controvert a position so clear. The French, say you (England) shall have no trade. We reply that we will, in defiance of them, and we adopt measures of direct retaliation, which from their nature must ensure such an effect.

Dr. Lawrence contended, that the Orders in Council were known to be illegal at the time his Majesty's Ministers advised them, well aware that Bonaparte never intended to carry his Decree to extremity towards neutrals.

Sir W. Grant, Master of the Rolls, contended, that his Majesty had a right to make a declaration with respect to the law of nations, but had no right whatever imposed on him to consult Parliament, any more than he had in declaring war or making peace; and said, it was absurd in Parliament to interfere in a case of absolute necessity, for the greatest benefit had already resulted from it.

Sir A. Piggott defended the arguments of Lord Petty, and contended, that the Ministers had acted in very hasty and most precipitate ways in issuing the Orders in Council. He concluded by opposing the motion.

The question was carried without a division, and the House went into the Committee.

In the Committee, Mr. Perceval submitted a string of Resolutions, imposing various duties on articles, the produce of British Colonies, or their exportation from Great Britain. The Reports were ordered to be received on Monday, to which day the House adjourned.

STATE PAPERS
RELATIVE TO RUSSIA,
PRESENTED TO BOTH HOUSES OF PARLIAMENT ON TUESDAY NIGHT.

No. I.—Dispatch from the Right Honourable Lord Granville Leveson Gowma, to Mr. Secretary Canning, dated Saint Petersburgh, September 2d, 1807.—Received Sept. 19th.

St. Petersburgh, Sept. 2d, 1807.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you, that on Saturday evening 29th August, I received by Sir Stephen Sharp, who left the fleet off Copenhagen upon the 24th August, your dispatches Nos. 32 and 33, and on Sunday the Messenger Ruff delivered to me those from No. 26 to 31 inclusive.

Being thus completely put in possession of the sentiments of His Majesty's Government, upon all the points which could come into discussion between this country and Great Britain, I lost no time in requesting a conference with General Budberg, who, though extremely unwell, invited me to call upon him last night.

I began the conference by observing, that his Excellency being already apprised by the Answer given to His Majesty's Secretary of State, to M. Alopeus, of the conditional acceptance by the Court of London, of the proffered mediation of Russia, I had to state to him, that I was instructed in the first instance to request the communication of the secret Articles of the Treaty of Tilsit, and a frank disclosure of the general views and intentions of the Court of Saint Petersburgh. That impartiality was the first requisite in the character of a mediator, and that before the British Government agreed to avail itself of the mediation of this Court, it was essentially necessary that England should be placed, with regard to the meditating Power, on an equal footing with France; that the confidential intercourse which had taken place between the Emperor and Bonaparte at Tilsit, and by which his Imperial Majesty became acquainted with the principles upon which the French Government proposed negociating with the Court of London, had naturally excited an uneasiness in England, which could only be removed by an unreserved communication; that I could not conceal from him, that the period remptorily prescribed to His Majesty, for the acceptance of Russian mediation, had created in London a very unfavou a impression against the intervention of his Imperial Majesty; that however, notwithstanding His Majesty had just reason to be offended with the terms of the 13th article, such was his desire to embrace any opening which afforded the prospect of the conclusion of an honourable peace, that he would not retract the conditional acceptance of the mediation, which had already been conveyed to the Russian Government, in the note addressed by you to M. Alopeus; that His Majesty, at the same time, looked for some mark of the good-will of the Emperor of Russia towards Great Britain; that M. Alopeus had before the late unfortunate events of Friedland and Tilsit, requested of you a projet of a new treaty of commerce, and had given the assurance of the disposition of his Court to proceed to the definite conclusion of a commercial arrangement between two Countries; that a projet had in compliance with his wish been communicated and transmitted to St. Petersburgh; and that if the good-will of his Imperial Majesty towards England continued unaltered, I trusted no delay would take place in proceeding to the Negociation of this Treaty; that the existence of any stipulation in this projet, which was not approved of by this Government, was no obstacle to our entering into negociation upon it; because I should take upon myself to agree to any modifications which did not appear to change the basis and principles upon which it had been framed; that as France had by the 27th article of the Tilsit Treaty secured the re-establishment of her former commercial relations with Russia, a natural and obvious mode of proving the impartiality of the Emperor would be the renewal of the commercial treaty with Great Britain.

General Budberg began his reply by acknowledging the existence of secret articles belonging to the Treaty of Tilsit. There were some, he said, which in no way concerned the interests of England; that he could assure me, and as an honest man he would not say it if were not truth, there existed no secret article whatever, which stipulated the shutting the Russian ports against the British commerce; that with respect to the projet of the treaty of commerce, he had to confess, that, from the press of other business, and the bad state of his health, he had not had time to lay it before the Emperor; that it must necessarily be considered by the Minister of Commerce, before he could confer with me upon it; and that as to the 27th article of the Tilsit Treaty, it only placed the commercial relations of the two countries upon the same footing that they had been before the commencement of hostilities; that the commercial treaty with France was not renewed, and would expire in two years; and that it by no means followed because Bonaparte had communicated to the Emperor of Russia, the basis upon which he was ready to conclude peace with England, that his Imperial Majesty had made any communications at Tilsit of the future views and system of the Court of Petersburg.

The General appeared to wish that I should consider this answer as sufficiently satisfactory to authorize me to accept the mediation of his Court. I observed in reply, that it was difficult to conceive any articles of a peace between Russia and France which did not directly or indirectly concern Great Britain; but that I asked the communication of the secret articles, not only as an object which might affect the interests of England, but as a mark of the continuance of that friendship and confidence on the part of this Court, which could alone afford any prospect of good, from the acceptance of the mediation of the Emperor of Russia; that with the same view, I had proposed continuing the negociations begun by M. Alopeus, and that if his Excellency had no authority at present to say any thing more satisfactory than what I had as yet heard from him, I must request him to ask the permission of the Emperor to communicate to me without reserve the secret articles of the Treaty between Russia and France, and to empower him to continue the negociations, and conclude a treaty of commerce with Great Britain.

General Budberg promised me, that he would lose no time in bringing these two requests under the consideration of his Imperial Majesty.—I have the honour to be with the greatest respect, Sir, your most obedient humble servant,

GRANVILLE LEVESON GOWER.

No. II.—An Extract of a Dispatch from the Same to the Same.

In which Lord G. L. Gower states that General Budberg had received him in a far more warm and conciliating manner than formerly, and seemed anxious to remove every difficulty in the way of a good understanding between the two countries.

No. III.—An Extract of a Dispatch from the Same to the Same.

Stating his Lordship's surprise on receiving the next morning, after this friendly conversation, the following Note from General Budberg:

NOTE.

His Majesty the Emperor has just learned, with the utmost surprise, by accounts from his Minister at Copenhagen, as well as by a dispatch from his Danish Majesty's Minister at this Court, that Mr. Jackson, his Britannic Majesty's Plenipotentiary, has made propositions as derogatory to, as incompatible with, the dignity of every independent Power, and that, upon the refusal of the Prince Royal of Denmark to accede to a pretension so extraordinary, the English fleet has taken a position, which evidently announces intentions hostile towards Denmark. The ties of consanguinity and friendship which unite his Imperial Majesty with the King of Denmark, not suffering him to view with indifference any danger which might menace the dominions or the independence of that Sovereign, the Undersigned has received commands to invite his Excellency Lord Granville Leveson Gower, to acquaint him with the motives which have induced the Cabinet of St. James's to adopt proceedings so extraordinary against Denmark. The Undersigned, &c.

A. DE BUDBERG.

St. Petersburgh, 20th Aug.—1st Sept. 1807.

ANSWER.

St. Petersburgh, Aug. 21—Sept. 2, 1807.

Agreeably to the desire of his Excellency General Budberg, the Undersigned, Ambassador of his Britannic Majesty, loses no time in communicating to the Russian Government the motives which led to the steps taken by the King's Minister at the Court of Denmark, and to the subsequent operations of the British forces against the Island of Zealand. The British Ministry had been a long time in possession of positive data, which left no doubt as to the intentions of the French Government respecting the maritime means of Denmark; and the projects against England from that quarter, which were matured by the continental peace, certainly cannot have escaped the penetration of his Majesty the Emperor of Russia. The Danish fleet, destined to cover a descent on the British coasts, being therefore an object essential for the accomplishment of the views of France, the King found himself under the necessity of securing himself from so imminent a danger, by those precautions which were adopted with regret, however indispensable for the security of his Empire. The ties of relationship which unite the two Courts of London and of Copenhagen, would have inspired the King with the desire of avoiding such a painful extremity, and of respecting, as far as depended upon himself, the interests of Denmark; but his duty called equally for measures adopted to ward off a danger which threatened not only the welfare of his people, but the existence of his Crown.

The Undersigned, having thus frankly replied to General Budberg's Note, will with pleasure furnish a more detailed verbal explanation, should his Excellency desire it; and he avails himself of the opportunity to repeat the assurances of his high consideration, (Signed) G. L. GOWER.

His Excellency General de Budberg, &c. &c.

No. IV.—Extract of a Dispatch from Mr. Secretary CANNING to the Right Hon. Lord G. L. GOWER, dated Sept. 27*th*, 1807.

Mr. Canning expresses his satisfaction at the new amicable appearances of the Russian Councils, and commends the moderation of Lord G. L. Gower's language. He then proceeds to give the following directions for his future conduct:

Your Excellency did perfectly right in declining to consider the communication of General Budberg as sufficiently satisfactory to authorize your acceptance, on the part of his Majesty, of the mediation of the Emperor of Russia. The points upon which the questions of this acceptance turns, are—1st, The frank communication of the Articles of the Treaty of Tilsit, secret as well as avowed.—2dly, A distinct explanation of the basis upon which France proposes to treat, and which appeared to his Imperial Majesty at Tilsit to be just and honourable. These are the conditions directly stipulated in my Note to M. Alopeus, and without which an acceptance of any mediation by his Majesty could be nothing else than a complete surrender of his honour and his interest into the hands of the mediator, if not of the enemy. But to these are reasonably to be added, if not as conditions without which it would be impossible to consent to treat under the auspices of Russia, at least as those which his Majesty has a right to require from a friendly Power, before he commits himself to its guidance in a question affecting the immediate safety and the future welfare of his dominions;—1st. A disclosure of the general views of the policy of the Emperor of Russia; and of any engagements into which he may have entered with respect to the different Powers in whose fortunes his Majesty takes an interest;—and 2dly, Some plain, and decisive proof of the good understanding subsisting between his Majesty and his august Ally; such as shall satisfy, not his Majesty only, but Europe and the world, of the impartiality with which his Imperial Majesty has undertaken, and proposes to administer, the duties of his office as Mediator.

With respect to the first of the two points which I have stated as absolutely indispensable, General Budberg appears as yet to have gone no farther than to give a verbal assurance that there is not any article, among the secret articles of the Treaty of Tilsit, stipulating for the shutting of the Russian ports against Great Britain.

But it will immediately have occurred to your Excellency that a distinction might probably be taken in M. De Budberg's mind, between a stipulation for the immediate and unconditional execution of a purpose, and the agreement to resort to it eventually, under circumstances which may not yet have occurred: and that, supposing the former only to be the sense of M. de Budberg's assurance, that assurance might be literally true, without in fact conveying any thing essentially satisfactory.

The inference to be drawn from this circumstance is, that the Russian Minister should be called upon by your Excellency in a official note, not for a simple disavowal only of any single article, but for the communication of the secret articles themselves, or at least of any agreement actual or eventual, in which the interest of this country or its allies are in any degree concerned.

In the same formal manner a communication should be required of the basis of the peace proposed by France; upon which the Russian Minister does not appear to have offered any explanation.

The other two points are not so strictly connected with the question of Mediation. But it is nevertheless perfectly reasonable that His Majesty should require some ostensible proof of the good-will of his august Ally, to counteract the general impression which must have been created by late events, of a difference and disunion between them; before his Majesty can with a good grace accept those offices at the Emperor of Russia's hands, of which impartiality should be the essential character. No proof could be selected, at once so easy for his Imperial Majesty to give, so grateful to his Majesty to receive, so natural in the eyes of the world, and so little liable to exception on the part of France, as the renewal of the Treaty of Commerce.

With respect to the remaining point, which your Excellency is instructed to urge,—a communication on the part of the Russian Government of its general views and policy for the future,—you will observe, that his Imperial Majesty himself annexed to his conditional acceptance of the mediation of the Emperor of Austria a similar demand of the communication of the general views of the Court of Vienna respecting the future state of Europe.

In the Treaty of Bartenstein, concluded between his Imperial Majesty and the King of Prussia, and offered by them to the acceptance of other Powers as the basis of a co-operation for the purpose of producing a general pacific arrangement, a distinct and detailed exposition was entered into with respect not only to the Powers intended to be comprehended as parties to the Treaty, but to all the Powers of Europe in whose fate any one of the principal Powers could be supposed to be interested. These examples of what his Imperial Majesty has done, and what he has required, would sufficiently authorize His Majesty's solicitude to obtain a similar explanation on the present occasion.

But there are other grounds for it in the very state and circumstances of Europe, as arising out of the Treaty of Tilsit, and the stipulations annexed to it; some of which stipulations are already carrying into execution in a way to excite his Majesty's apprehensions, if not for his own interests, for those of his allies. Is it possible that his Majesty should not think it essential to be informed whether the public article of the Treaty of Tilsit, which recognizes the French King of Naples only as King of Naples, is, in effect, contradicted by a secret article, which adds to this title that of the Two Sicilies? The movements in the Mediterranean, and the surrender of Corfu, naturally give rise to a variety of apprehensions, which it would be for the interest of both countries to quiet, or at least to reduce within the bounds of truth. Has not his Majesty the right to require some explanation of the intentions of Russia with respect to Turkey; a power with whom his Majesty finds himself at war, and left alone in the war, for no other than Russian interests, and from a quarrel espoused by his Majesty for the sake of his ally?

These topics your Excellency will urge in your conferences with M. D. Budberg with all the earnestness which their importance requires, but at the same time carefully avoiding a stain of reproach; and even when you are obliged to confess the suspicion of engagements having been entered into such as his Majesty cannot but disapprove, conducting your enquiry in such a manner as shall lead M. De Budberg to believe, that his Majesty is anxious rather to find the means of preventing or remedying the evil, than to discover the grounds of complaint against Russia.

Upon the whole, your Excellency will collect from these instructions, that his Majesty is as much desirous, as ever, to cultivate the friendship and alliance of the Emperor of Russia; that he conceives the only chance of safety for what remains of Europe to depend upon the renewal of a good understanding between them; that his Majesty has never, even under appearance the most unfavourable, altogether despaired of such recurrence, on the part of the Emperor, to the counsels which are best calculated for his own glory, and for the security of his own dominions, as it is now hoped has taken place: and that his Majesty, upon such a change, is eager to forget all that has passed of a nature contradictory to those counsels, or inconsistent with them.

No. V.—Extract of a Dispatch from the Same to the Same, dated Sept. 21, 1807.

Mr. Canning expresses an entire approbation of the answer returned by Lord G. L. Gower to General Budberg's note. He dwells upon the suspicious circumstances which justified the refusal of the mediation of Russia, and on the accumulative information received of the plans formed by France to employ the Danish navy against this country. He expresses an earnest wish that Russia should become the mediator and guarantee of a pacification between the British and Danish Courts.

No. VI.—Extract of a Dispatch from the Right Hon. Lord G. L. Gower, to Mr. Secretary Canning, dated September 9th, 1807.

His Lordship informs Mr. Canning that the Ministry for Foreign Affairs had been transferred from General Budberg to Count Soltykoff; that the latter had at length informed him that his Imperial Majesty did not think proper to communicate the secret articles of the treaty of Tilsit. "It is not," he said, on account of their containing any stipulations prejudicial to England, but having once determined that those articles should not be made public, the Emperor sees no reason for receding from his determination."

No. VII.—Extract of a Dispatch from the Same to the Same.

Lord G. L. Gower informs Mr. Canning, that Count Romanzow had finally been appointed for Foreign Affairs; and that he had already taken an opportunity to press upon him the subjects in agitation.

No. VIII.—Dispatch from the Same to the Same, dated September 19th, 1807.

Lord G. L. Gower incloses a note from the Russian Minister, with his own reply. It appears that the Court of Russia, by delays and unsatisfactory communications, had now began to show a want of confidence in the British Government. The inclosures are as follows.

NOTE.

The Undersigned has had the honour to lay before the Emperor, the Note and the Copy of the Capitulation of Copenhagen, transmitted to him by his Excellency Lord G. L. Gower. His Imperial Majesty has viewed with infinite concern, all the misfortunes which have overwhelmed a Monarch, to whom he is attached by the ties of blood, and of those of a long friendship. When the British Ministry conceived the design of despoiling Denmark of her fleet; when they dispatched for that purpose to the Baltic, a numerous land force and a considerable fleet, they gave no intimation of it to his Imperial Majesty. This silence, this extreme reserve, may serve as a proof, that the Cabinet of St. James's were themselves persuaded, that what they were undertaking was directly contrary to the interests of Russia. So in fact it is, and the Emperor owes it to himself, and to the interests of his empire, not to shew himself insensible to it.

His Majesty considers himself as Guarantee of the security, and of the tranquillity of the Baltic Sea: at what period have the tranquillity and the security of that Sea been so molested as in this instance? The Undersigned, having apprised his Britan-sie Majesty's Ambassador of the sentiments of the Emperor his Master, avails himself of this opportunity, &c.

(Signed) COUNT NICHOLAS DE ROMANZOFF.

St. Petersburgh, Sept. 1-23, 1807.

REPLY.

The Undersigned, his Britannic Majesty's Ambassador, has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the Note of yesterday's date, which the Count de Romanzoff addressed to him. He will lose no time in transmitting it to his Court, but the charges which it contains against the British Government, impose on the Undersigned the duty of requesting his Excellency to submit, without delay, to his Imperial Majesty, some observations which may place in their true light, the reciprocal proceedings of both Powers.

Although the celerity indispensable to the execution of the measures of precaution adopted with regard to Denmark, did not allow of any anterior communications, the Note of the Undersigned, dated the 2d of September, so far from concealing the reasons which produced that Expedition, declared them with frankness, and the explanation of them was repeated and accompanied with details in the highest degree satisfactory, at the first conference of the Undersigned with the Ministry of that day.

The Secret Articles of the Treaty of Tilsit are moreover still unknown to the Court of London; and the Undersigned has vainly required a communication of those arrangements, the execution of which daily developes objects in no way conformable to the spirit of the ancient alliances, and absolutely prejudicial to those interests, the maintenance of which formerly constituted an essential part of the Russian system. Is it then for Russia to complain of secrecy, whilst that Court absolutely refuses the only explanation which could have been satisfactory to the Court of London, as to the intentions and the projects meditated with regard to her? This silence, this extreme reserve, may serve as proof, that the Cabinet of St. Petersburgh were themselves persuaded that their secret arrangements were directly contrary to the interests of Great Britain. As to the tranquillity of the Baltic, England has never recognised any exclusive rights; and whatever may have been the pretensions of Russia to the title of guarantee of the security of that sea, her silence, at the period when every port from Lubeck to Memel was shut against the British flag, appears an open abandonment of those pretensions.

12-24 Sept. 1807. GRANVILLE LEVESON GOWER.

No. IX.—EXTRACT of a Dispatch from the Same to the Same, dated Oct. 29*th.*

Lord G. L. GOWER here states the application he had made to the Russian Court to restore the neutrality of Denmark. The reply of the Russian Minister will be seen in the following conclusion of the Dispatch.

Count Romanzow answered, "How can Russia recommend to Denmark to submit to the affront she had received, and to endure with patience all her losses?" I replied, "If by the continuance of the war, Denmark could hope to recover her fleet, she might with reason be indisposed to listen to such advice; but when it was evident to every person who reflected for a moment on the actual state of things, that the Court of Copenhagen, by the continuance of the war, could gain nothing but the entrance of a French army into the body of its territory, I could not but think that a friendly representation from a Neutral power, of a danger which threatened the very existence of Denmark, might recall the Prince Royal to a more dispassionate consideration of the real interests of his country."

Count Romanzow repeated to me, that he did not see how the Court of Petersburgh could interfere; but added, that he could give me no positive answer to what I had represented to him, till he had made his report of my communication to his Imperial Majesty.

No. X.—Extract of a Dispatch from the Same to the Same, same date

L. G. GOWER incloses a note in which he had formally demanded from the Russian Court a communication of the reasons for withholding the Secret Articles of the Treaty of Tilsit.

No. XI.—Extract of a Dispatch from the Same to the Same, dated Nov. 4.

Lord G. L. Gower states the difficulties he had experienced in procuring either a written answer from the Russian Minister, or a personal interview. He mentions some private information that the Russian Cabinet had agreed to the proposition of mediating a peace between us and Denmark; but had afterwards been deterred by the violent threats of the French Ambassador.

No. XII.—Extract of a Dispatch from the Same to the Same, dated Nov. 8.

Lord G. L. GOWER informs Mr. CANNING, that wearied out with the difficulty of obtaining an answer, he had addressed a Note to Count Romanzow, desiring to know whether this was to be construed into a determination to avoid the customary communications. To this note he received an answer containing, almost in the same words, the very same topics stated in the Russian Declaration. Of this Declaration, which was by that time also printed, and circulated among the foreign Ministers at Petersburgh, his Lordship incloses a copy.

PROVINCIALS.

In the garden of Mr. Jeffery's, attorney, at Chatham, there are at this time hanging on an Espalier tree several very fine apples of the last year's growth; they are firmly attached to the branches, and have all the appearance and colour of the healthiest and freshest fruit.

Notwithstanding the severity of the weather, Mr. Stainbank, of Scale-hall, near Lancaster, has two ewes, each of which, on the 26th ult. produced a fine ewe lamb, which are likely to do well, though they remained some hours upon the snow.

There have been a greater number of partridges this season than usual; and as the shooting of them ceased on Monday last, it is probable the ensuing season will prove fully as abundant.

The marriage of a respectable tradesman of Beverley, with a lady of that place, was fixed, we understand, for one day last week; the ring was bought and every necessary preparation made; but on his going in the morning to call upon the intended bride, he found to his great surprize, that she had set off that morning on a matrimonial jaunt to Sculscoats church, with a Serjeant in, we believe, the East York militia.

A few days since a melancholy accident happened to John Marston, at Acton-upon-Tuffnell, near Stafford, who being at work in a mill by himself, the machinery caught hold of his clothes, which wedged him in between the horizontal and perpendicular wheels, by which he was crushed to atoms.

A letter from Newton Stewart mentions a tremendous thunderstorm that happened about six o'clock in the morning of the 29th ult. Between hearing the thunder and seeing the lightning, only four seconds elapsed. At Carsleigth, the horses in the mail took fright, by which means the coach was overturned. The poor animals were so stunned that they turned round, the wheels of the coach describing a circle of ten feet diameter. The guard is much bruised; but the driver, and a woman and child who were passengers, providentially escaped unhurt.

A young woman in Cumberland, of a supposed plethoric habit, went to bed in perfect health at night, but arose totally blind, and remained for a week in that situation. A surgeon, conceiving it to proceed from a fulness of blood, opened an artery, and her sight was restored.

Wednesday evening last, a short time before the prisoners in the city gaol, of Oxford, were locked up, John Grover, lately committed upon a charge of burglary in the dwelling-house of Mr. Alderman Parsons, contrived to escape from the part of the prison in which he was confined into the yard, and having placed some planks against the boundary wall to induce a belief that he had succeeded in getting over, afterwards concealed himself in a stack of wood. In consequence of this, and under a persuasion that he had passed the wall, a reward of 70 guineas was offered, and the most active measures were taken for his apprehension. The prisoner, however, was retaken in the gaol yard, at an early hour on Friday morning, after having failed in a desperate attempt to scale the wall, the top of which he had nearly reached, but fell backwards upon the pavement, and was discovered by his cries. It seems he lay concealed in the wood-stack during the whole of the preceding night and day, and by means of a file, procured from an apartment in the gaol, where one of the prisoners was permitted to work, had contrived to disengage himself from his fetters.

On Monday night a poor woman, named Devine, who sells toys on Summer-hill, Dublin, was robbed by three ruffians with their faces blackened. They entered the poor creature's shop, where she was sitting, and bound a cord round her neck, connecting it with her hands, which they placed under her legs, and thus deprived her of communicating her distress, when, after giving her several violent blows, and nearly suffocating her, they carried away her clothes, and 5l. in money.

Being the NINETEENTH NUMBER, splendidly Embellished with the only correct Portrait ever presented to the World of his Grace the DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: Fashionable Costumes of the Month, Architecture, Original Music, &c.

The Proprietors can with confidence offer the Publication of this Month to the Public, as surpassing any of their former ones; and they still hope to shew themselves in each succeeding Volume, as approaching to the fulfilment of their promise to form a Work which shall be to posterity not only a correct Register of the Manners and Events of the present Day, but also a proof of the acme to which the Arts have arrived in the Nineteen Century. They presume to call the Public attention to the following prominent features of the Magazine:—In Biography—the generous domestic character, and public spirited conduct of a Devonshire. In History—the passing Events of the Day naturally call our attention to the Brazils. In the realms of taste—their Essay on Epic Poetry must be acceptable, whilst a moderate and impartial investigation of the subject of Duelling, will be not undeserving the notice of the social Moralist. In their Arbitrator—though they would not willingly break a butterfly on a wheel, yet they have thought it beneficial to anatomise a would-be popular Lecturer, Mr. Thelwall! Whilst in the impartiality of their Reviews, and the general variety of their lighter articles, they hope there will be something pleasing to every palate. Their animadversions on some of the passing Fashions, under their more immediate Beau Monde article, and their Sporting Biography will, they hope, have a like claim to public favour.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

After having overrun the Continent of Europe, and tried in vain to ruin this country, by shutting the continental ports against our commerce, BONAPARTE has again begun to renew loudly his threats of carrying war into the heart of these islands. Instead of diminishing his forces after his conquests have been completed, he still goes on augmenting his vast armies, by the forced means of anticipating the annual Conscriptions. By a late Decree of his Senate, the Conscription of 1809 is already called out; and the reason given for this measure is to carry war into the heart of Great Britain. The following short extract will make our readers acquainted with the style and spirit in which this bombastic Decree is written:

"From the Baltic to the Mediterranean, from the Nile to the Narva, but few points remain to the English ships where they can land, or where they are not forbidden to touch. But it is not sufficient to have, by a just reciprocity, pronounced against England that dreadful sentence of outlawry; she must not be permitted to be at rest in the seat of her iniquitous domination, upon any of her coasts, in any of her colonies, under any points of the globe, which are not yet interdicted to her. It is necessary that, repelled from one part of the world, menaced in all others, England should know not where to direct the little military force of which she has the disposal; and that our armies, more formidable than ever, should be ready to carry into her possessions our victorious and avenging Eagles. Such, Gentlemen, are the motives which have determined his Majesty to demand a new Conscription."

The Decree then proceeds to declare, that there are still ships belonging to the Continent, that the French legions may still reach the English militia, that Ireland may yet hope for succour, and India expect deliverers! Even in the wildest times of the French Revolution, we have not read a more extravagant piece of declamation.

The Moniteur also contains two reports from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, relative to the invasion of Portugal.

Digitized by Google

No crime whatever is alleged against the Portuguese government, except their firm determination not to seize the persons and ships, and confiscate the property of the British subjects, who had trusted themselves to the good faith of that government, and who were united to the Portuguese by an ancient and solemn alliance. Much is said of the daring perfidy of the Portuguese towards the magnanimous EMPEROR of the FRENCH; and the temporizing of that people, while attempting to avoid the storm, is branded as a most infamous piece of imposture. Never was there a more unblushing manifesto circulated; never were there more futile reasons urged for driving a government into exile. But the Minister, at the conclusion of the report, tells his Sovereign that the British still meditate attempts against Portugal and the western coast of Spain, against Cadiz and Ceuta; and that it would be necessary to have a large force stationed in that quarter.

Another report from the Minister at War states the preparation making for the augmentation of the force, and entreats his MAJESTY to listen to the voice of all France, which, he says, demands that there shall be no Peace till the liberties of the seas are conquered. These braggart declamations, like many others which we have received from the same channel, mean little, and indeed are in a great measure intended to conceal the truth. That the people of France are long since tired of conscriptions, and would without any hesitation give up the question of the dominion of the seas, provided they could procure the restoration of peace and commerce, is what no man can doubt: now is it less certain that the present disjointed and extended state of the French dominions, will furnish ample employment for the conscription of 1809, without one of them ever entering a British island.

Two very protracted debates have this week taken place in the House of Commons; the one respecting the business of Copenhagen, and the latter relative to the Orders in Council. Nothing very remarkable occurred in these Debates, as the arguments on both sides have already been agitated and exhausted. The two parties, however, tried their strength in a division, on the question of Copenhagen; and the majority of Ministers was found to exceed the calculations even of their most sanguine friends. Mr. PONSONBY, brother-in-law to Lord GREY, has stood forward as the leader of the opposition, while Mr. Canning is placed at the head of the Ministerial orators in the House of Commons. It is but a few years, since we saw these stations occupied by PITT and FOX! To what revolutions are the talents of parties as well as the prosperity of Empires subject.

Several reports have been circulated in the course of the week that Sir Richard Strachan had returned to his station off Brest: but it is now ascertained that he is still in pursuit of the French; and it is supposed that their destination is the West Indies.

By the mails which arrived on Thursday from Malta and Gibraltar, we are informed that a great change is about to be operated in Spain, under the influence of Bonaparte. It is said, that the Prince of Asturias is to be declared Sovereign both of Portugal and Spain, and that his father is to abdicate the throne of the latter kingdom. In return for the acquisition of Portugal, Spain is to cede Porto Rico and Cuba to Bonaparte, and to grant to France a free trade with her South American possessions.

A letter dated Villa Real, 10th December, extracted from the Gibraltar Chronicle, gives a deplorable account of the state of Portugal since the entrance of the French, who, it says, came as lambs, but have shewn themselves ravenous and bloody as wolves. Though Junot has a large army of French and Spaniards there, he has required more troops to complete the subjugation of the country.—In addition to this statement, it appears from private letters that Portugal, and a great part of Spain, are suffering the greatest distress from famine. On the 18th ult. it was understood at Lisbon that there were provisions for only six weeks in the city; and the small loaf, which was formerly sold at the rate of 2½d English money, had risen to 13d. It is said there are 36,000 French troops in Portugal.

Official details of the actions at Buenos Ayres have been published in the Madrid Court Gazette. They are of great length. Liniers asserts, that the English army lost 4000 men in the first attack. It is also stated that General Whitelocke made him a present of a sword, as an acknowledgment for the humanity shewn by the Spanish Commander to the English prisoners, and the wounded. In return General Liniers presented some valuable minerals, and other curiosities to General Whitelocke.

TRIAL OF GENERAL WHITELOCKE.—After completing the examination of Lieutenant-General Gower, up to the night preceding the attack on Buenos Ayres, Lieutenant-Colonel Burke, the Quarter-Master-General to the troops at Buenos Ayres, was called in as the second witness. His examination occupied the Court till yesterday, when the examination of Brigadier-General Craufurd commenced.

The Lord Chancellor has rejected the application of Bullock the Bankrupt, now under sentence of death in Newgate, to set aside the Commission of Bankruptcy issued against him. He will therefore suffer, unless his Majesty in his Royal clemency should think proper to pardon the unfortunate culprit.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, his MAJESTY came to town from Windsor, to the Queen's Palace, where the Dukes of YORK, KENT, CUMBERLAND, and SUSSEX, were in readiness to receive him.

Soon after two o'clock his MAJESTY held a private Levee.

The following had the honour of being presented to his MAJESTY:

Lord William Bentinck, upon his return from India.—The Earl of Londonderry, by Viscount Castlereagh.—The Rev. Dr. Dodswell, upon his being appointed a Canon of Christchurch, Oxford.—The Rev. Dr. Bushy, upon his being appointed to the Deanery of Rochester.—Lord Proby, Deputy Adjutant-General of the forces in the Mediterranean, upon his return from Sicily.—Brigadier-General Ackland, upon his return from South America.—The Rev. Mr. Ryder, upon his being appointed to the Canonry of Windsor.

His MAJESTY gave audience to the Cabinet Ministers, and Lord Heathfield: also held a Privy Council, at which his MAJESTY performed the customary form of pricking for the Sheriffs of England and Wales, for the year ensuing.

About five o'clock, his MAJESTY set off on his return for Windsor.

THE THEATRE.

DRURY LANE.

On the 1st of February, a lady made her first appearance as Rivira. The words "first appearance on the stage," which were as usual employed in the bills of the day, seem to imply, not that the gentleman or lady whom they regard has never acted, but that he or she has never acted in London. In the latter sense we are, on this occasion, particularly inclined to take them; for the lady, of whom we are to speak, acted so much better than ever did Miss from a drawing-room, that it is impossible for us to believe her a total novice, or even the mere nursling of a private theatre. We understand that she wished to play Cora; but that the Managers, possessing Mrs. H. Siddons, and wishing to supply the place of Mrs. Powell, who continues unwell, insisted that Elvira should be "the appearing "part." We have before had occasion to lament that Managers will permit a performer to play once any character which they know he never will be suffered to play again; but how greatly to be blamed are those directors, who bring a lady, against her will, to act a part, which she conceives above her power! The fact is, that though the fair candidate of Monday night has a complete possession of the stage business, and appeared to have conceived a most just idea of the character allotted to her, yet she has not sufficient majesty of person, nor sufficient power of voice to satisfy either the eye, or the ear, in Elvira—at least not on the stage of so vast a theatre as Drury-lane. Her action, her carriage, and her tones, would have been exceedingly appropriate, if she had possessed greater height of figure, and strength of delivery; but that manner which excites admiration in a woman "qua incidet Regina," is not effective from a diminutive figure and slender voice.—The sublime is incapable of miniature.

However, we should be very sorry to discourage this young lady. We will not flatter her, by saying, that we think she can be very successful in a London play-house, because she has not the physical requisites; but if she can resolve to perform only in country theatres, where she will be generally heard, we have no doubt that she will be generally admired. We have seen most of the principal performers out of the Metropolis, and we have never found one that we can compare to the actress who performed Elvira.

THE DRAMATIC DETECTOR.

No. I.

Quid novi?—What of THE NEWS?

There was a custom in some cities of Holland, that a respectable householder should every evening take a round of each district, to see that the guardians of the night performed their duty. It is absolutely necessary that some person should, in like manner, take a survey of those critics who pretend to be the watchmen of the public taste. Feeling this necessity, we come before our readers to expose the folly and ignorance of the periodical scribblers, and scour a little of that filth which is thrown up to blind the eyes of impartial people. We have not quite so much vanity as the persons whom we wish to lay open, and therefore we do not, like them, set out by professing an unqualified satisfaction in our own abilities; but the consciousness of experience, perhaps, authorizes us to promise something, and if we have not always wit, we hope never to abandon decency. If leading the way, we can induce others, better qualified than ourselves, to undertake the office of undeceiving the public, we shall think our labours amply rewarded: to have opened the first drain will be some sort of credit—He who cleanses the whole repository, will be a Hercules indeed!

Among those Papers which have struggled for pre-eminence, in coarseness of abuse, The News has long stood conspicuous. The theatrical department of that publication was formerly occupied by a gentleman, who, while the ardour of youthful zeal perpetually hurried him into gross error, seldom failed to display talents which, in many opinions, redeemed his faults. He held no certain course, for he wandered through an expanse with which he was totally unacquainted: but if, like a meteor, he travelled irregularly, like a meteor he blazed as he flew. Now we are told, in the Paper itself, that he no longer directs its columns: and if we had not been told so, we should probably have discovered it, without taking much trouble in hunting for a clue. The internal evidence is sufficient. The new Critic imitates the faults of his predecessor, though he cannot catch his beauties: and having dressed himself in the plumage of the peacock, he does not expect to be recognized as a daw. But literary men will see the difference between him and his predecessor—and Peter Pindar will, perhaps, apply his old line, Fleas are not lobsters, d—n their souls!

The News of last Sunday contains remarks on the Comedy of Something to Do, of which we gave an account in The National Register of last Sunday se'nnight. This Comedy, as our readers will recollect, was never acted but once; and any body would think that it must have been very unnecessary for The News to disturb the dead. But in comes their critical Resurrection-man, and lays out the poor corpse, in order to shew that it would have been a good figure, if it had not been bruised to a premature death. We are really concerned not to take any notice of this wretched piece, but we really feel the town insulted when a play devoid of incident, and stuffed with flat caricature instead of character, is flung once more in the face of the world, and set afloat in all the buoyancy of putrefaction.—We were unwilling, in our own account of this piece, to say any thing about the manner in which it was acted, because the play was condemned, and, as the object of criticism is reform, it seems in general a needless cruelty to attack an actor for faults which he can never have an opportunity of repeating. But when we find this critic coming forward to lavish encomium on the acting of Mr. Elliston, in the character of Janus Mem, the only comic part we ever saw him act in which it was impossible to praise any thing, we feel ourselves a little irritated at the outrage which is committed on every principle of true taste, and cannot forbear from entering our protest against the misrepresentations of The News. The character, though intolerably flat, is gross enough for the lowest farce, and Mr. Elliston was not satisfied with playing it as farce, but he must needs play it as broad pantomime. The eternal bustle of his hands and feet, the perpetual salutation of his neighbours by running against them, and the interrupted delivery of passages which ought to be connected, would perhaps be very fit for Mr. Grimaldi in a melo drama, but are faults to be avoided by Mr. Elliston in comedy. Mr. Elliston is an excellent comedian when he chuses: and as it very seldom happens that he does not chuse it, nothing should have tempted us to record an exception to our general admiration of his talents, but the absurd zeal with which his defects have been construed into beauties. We can never connive at a system of criticism which is intended to make black look like white, and we have received too much pleasure from Mr. Elliston's merits, to encourage him in a repetition of his errors.

So much for the matter of The News, and the manner is about as good: for we find several such elegant felicities of expression as the following: "The most of it was," &c.—"Every body was in the nicest tune to relish a bustling comedy," &c.—"In the former incident is a greater reciprocity of guller and gullee," &c.—The last two acts actually seemed," &c.

There are several more such phrases, but we are sure our readers will spare us the tedium of extracting them. The critic mistakes pertness for wit, and vulgarity for ease: but the dapper smartness of literature is at least as tiresome as this familiar impertinence that apes good manners: and The News is as remote from elegance of criticism, as Southwark from St. James's.

PORT NEWS.

MILFORD, FEB. 1.—The Leda frigate, Captain Honyman, in coming into this harbour last night about one o'clock, in thick weather, got on shore in West Nangle Bay, nearly opposite the Light-house. Her guns being heard, several boats went off to her, and the Captains of the Cockatrice and Peacock, the officers of the Impress, the commanders of the Revenue vessels, with the officers of the Dock-yard, are now on board, with craft and boats, rendering their assistance, in lightening the ship, and conveying the men on board the Quarantine Hulk, &c. Some hopes are entertained that she may be got off, provided the weather continues moderate. Her masts are cut away, she is bilged, and the principal rock on which she rests, has not more than three or four feet water round it at low water.

DOVER, FEB. 3.—Passed by this morning a convoy from Plymouth, consisting principally of Danish prize vessels, one of which, a ketch, being astern of the convoy, and about eight miles off from Hayclifle, was captured about ten o'clock this morning by a French lugger privateer, and carried away for Calais, in sight of numerous spectators from our Pier Heads. No cruizers are about here to protect our trade, and annoy the enemy's privateers.

PLYMOUTH, FEB. 4.—Private letters received here to-day, state that the Rochefort Squadron sailed thence on the 16th January, and that Admiral Sir R. Strachan, who had been blown off his station in a gale of wind, did not receive intelligence of their escape until the 24th, on which he immediately made sail in pursuit of them, and it was the general opinion on board the squadron, that the enemy were gone for the West Indies. The Caesar lost her main-yard in the gale, which was supplied her from the Donegal.

PEDESTRIANISM.

Mr. Downe, the Pedestrian, finished his Herculean labours yesterday, within two miles of Beaconsfield, but under such circumstances, as probably will not induce him again to attempt a similar performance. He had ten days to perform 400 miles, a task unprecedented, and the weather was unfavourable. Mr. Downe was so much fatigued on Wednesday night, that it was feared he would not be able to proceed on his journey the other two days. He went, however, to Farnborough, Oxon, on Thursday evening, and retired to rest in a feverish state. Friday, the last day, was a trial of strength: He started at four o'clock in the morning, and his friends had but faint hopes of his success. After 17 hours labour, having stopped about every three miles, Mr. Downe completed his task, which was for 100 guineas!

LAW REPORT.

CONSISTORY COURT, DOCTORS COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 3.

HUSBAND v. HUSBAND.

This was a cause of nullity of marriage, brought by one Matthew Husband, against Susannah Husband, his wife, by reason of minority. It appeared from the libel, and the exhibits produced and read before the Court, that the parties were married on the 23d of April, 1792, under a licence obtained by the husband, who also, in order to found his suit, produced the register of baptism of his wife, and stated that Susannah, the daughter of Thomas and Jane Truman, was born the 1st of July, 1771, and baptised the 18th of the same month. It also appeared there was no consent of parents (the father of the party having died before the marriage took place, and by the mother marrying a second husband, which rendered her incompetent to give consent), and likewise that no guardians were appointed. These facts being fully supported by the evidence, the Learned Judge (Sir William Scott), was clearly of opinion, under the Act of Parliament commonly called the Marriage Act, he was bound to pronounce the marriage to be null and void, even if the party wanted but one day of being of age; and accordingly so pronounced it to be.

ACCIDENTS, &c.

SHOCKING FIRE.—Wednesday morning, at half after six, a fire was discovered in the house of Miss Pickman, who kept a lace-shop in Castle-street, Leicester-fields. The inhabitants being fast asleep, of course, did not hear the knocking, which was repeated for some time at the door. At length a pannel was burst in, and it was seen that the counter and shelves behind it were all in a blaze. The admission of air fanned the flame, and every part of the house was quickly on fire. There was but a lath and plaster wall between that and the house of Mr. Blewitt, who kept a cook-shop next door, and the two houses in a short time exhibited but one body of fire in the lower part of both. Miss Pickman, her servant, a gentleman who lodged in the house, and the niece of Miss Pickman, a fine young girl, who acted as shopwoman to the aunt, were wakened, but had no time either to save any of the property or to dress themselves. The lady of the house went out of the one pair of stairs front window on the leads over the shop. By her hesitation as to which way she should turn, the gentleman who followed had time to recollect, that he had forgot a little box, which contained something valuable, he returned to his apartment and brought it out. The servant-maid followed: she lowered herself down by a lamp-iron into the street unhurt, whilst Miss Pickman and her lodger got into the window of Mr. Ball, the music-seller. The shopwoman ran, in a bewildered state, up to the three-pair of stairs floor. The neighbours on the opposite side called to her to go down to the first floor and get out on the leads; she appeared to have been momentarily deprived of her reason, and, when some stupid people in the street, without taking the precaution of holding a blanket or any thing to receive her, told her to leap out, or she would be burned, she did so, and was literally dashed to pieces. Mrs. Blewitt with her infant were for some time missing, but it was afterwards found that they escaped safely, through a dormant window, over the top of the house, into another that was not on fire. At a quarter after seven, the walls of the two houses already mentioned, fell to the ground, which materially tended to subdue the flames; and by one o'clock the fire was almost extinguished. But by that time the house of Mr. Ball, music-seller, in Castle-street, together with that of Mr. Kernot, chemist and druggist, in Bear-street, were entirely consumed, together with all their stock in trade and furniture.—The new insurance company, the Hope, is stated to have lost upwards of 5000*l.* by the insurance of Mr. Kernot's stock, and some of the other houses. Some small houses in Cranbourne-alley were partially injured; and the firemen found it necessary to continue playing until a late hour last night, to prevent the embers kindling up afresh.

A young lady, bound for Gretna-green, in a flying leap from a back parlour window into the garden, on Wednesday night, at the west end of the town, unfortunately fell, and broke her leg.

A soap-boiler, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh, was last week scalded to death, by falling into a cauldron of boiling soap.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER SEVEN.

LORD HUTCHINSON'S CONFERENCES WITH THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.

So much of the public attention has been attracted to the important statements made by Lord Hutchinson in the House of Lords on Monday last, respecting certain conferences which he had the advantage personally to hold with the Emperor of Russia, shortly after the Treaty of Tilsit, that they are rendered an object of paramount interest among the topics which press upon us for discussion.

The circumstances in which these conferences were held were singular, momentous, and pregnant with consequences. An era in the history of Europe had just then been fixed. The struggle against the French Revolution, the most remarkable since the downfal of the Roman empire, had just been terminated on the Continent. The great Continental Monarch, who had been the last to resign the contest, and the delegated organ of that only other Government who remained associated in the conflict, met to explain their mutual sentiments on the momentous occasion. Hardly can the imagination picture a situation more remarkable. The mission itself of Lord Hutchinson, was one of the most extraordinary on record. He was sent, if not to superintend, at least to witness the final act of the great drama which had been acting on the stage of Europe for nearly twenty years. He was sent to aid with his counsels; to be the organ of communication between the two performing Governments, and to give to his own Government the advice of an eye-witness upon the inconceivably important transactions in which he was sent to bear so unusual a part. No document with which we are acquainted, in all the voluminous records of diplomacy, can, in point of importance, bear to be compared in all its circumstances with the narrative of the conferences which Lord Hutchinson delivered in his place as a Peer of the realm on last Monday night. As it is our object, in the present disquisition, to point out carefully the bearings of these memorable conferences, upon the great political questions which at present agitate the British public, it is absolutely necessary that we should have the narrative before us; but, independent of this imperious cause, we should deem it injustice to our readers not to place a subject of such high importance, as far as to us belonged, in record before them. We copy the report from the Morning Chronicle; we have every reason to believe it to be the exact statement of the Noble Lord himself. When his Lordship came to that part of his speech in which his narrative of the conferences was introduced, he thus expressed himself:

"On the 23d of August, my Lords, I had a conversation with the Emperor of Russia at Kamincostroff. His Imperial Majesty asked me whether I had not admitted to Count Romanzoff, three days after the battle of Friedland, that it was necessary for him to make Peace? I told him that I had done so, that I was of that opinion then, which subsequent events had confirmed; that I thought myself bound in justice to him, and to myself, publicly to avow it, which I should continue to do as long as I lived. His Imperial Majesty said, we are then both agreed on the necessity there is to make Peace. I answered in the affirmative.

"His Imperial Majesty proceeded to state, that he had offered his mediation to England; that he attached no false vanity (gloriole was the French word) to the acceptance or rejection of his mediation; but that it was his most sincere and anxious wish that England should make Peace, as he was sure that it was his interest, and also that of Europe, and ours, that we should restore tranquillity to the world.

"I said to his Imperial Majesty, that he had not given sufficient time for England to accept or reject his mediation, because a much longer period than a month must elapse before any answer could be received; and although the disposition of my mind inclined towards Peace, I, nor no other man in England would accept it, but on conditions the most reasonable and honourable; that as far as we were concerned, the events of the War had been highly favourable.

"To which his Imperial Majesty replied, that the time allowed was of no importance, because we might take three or four months, if we pleased, to accept or reject his mediation; but his anxious wish and desire was, that we should make Peace. That he had a perfect knowledge of the feelings and character of the people of England; that he had been made acquainted by Bonaparte with the conditions of Peace proposed to be offered, and that he had no doubt that even I myself would consider them to be highly reasonable and honourable.

"Some confidential conversation followed, which I do not think myself at liberty to disclose."

Such is the account which Lord Hutchinson rendered of the first conference held between the Emperor of Russia and himself, after the Treaty of Tilsit, and before the intelligence of the attack on Copenhagen had yet reached them. Let us endeavour, with as much precision as possible, to ascertain its circumstances. It is a point to be received as demonstratively certain, that in this conference there was no artifice on the part of the young Emperor. It bears the most striking internal evidence of profound sincerity. The external proofs too of this sincerity are irresistible. No conceivable object was to be gained by deceit. But above all, never would a young and inexperienced Monarch, have been selected as the instrument of a train of deceit. Had Bonaparte been the instigator, he would never have trusted the direct, and impetuous passions of a youthful Emperor in so delicate a business; and Alexander himself would surely have had some servants faithful enough to have prevented this direct prostitution of the royal dignity. Had a scene of artifice been planned, some hackneyed courtier would have sustained the ignominious task; his Imperial Majesty would have been withdrawn from the disgrace, and from the difficulty.

Depravity, not only the most deep, but the most experienced would be implied in every imputation of insincerity on the part of the young Monarch. It is, therefore, to be rejected with confidence and certainty. To have accepted, and to have perpetrated the office of deception on this occasion would prove him not only a villain, but a practiced villain. But we know that the character of Alexander is directly the reverse of all this. He is simple and artless to a fault. This is well known to be one of the defects of his character. Though he is far from weak in understanding, from the privacy of his education, he is little acquainted with the artifices of other men, and not always sufficiently master even of disguise.

Such being the irresistible proofs of the sincerity of the Emperor of Russia in this conference, it is completely decisive of the question, whether any secret articles in the Treaty of Tilsit were pointed against this country. We may confidently pronounce that in the opinion of the Emperor of Russia no tittle of that Treaty was injurious to us. If an article respecting Corfu was admitted, surely it will not be contended that his opinion was far wrong; surely it will not be contended that our interests were deeply affected by the disposal of Corfu either in one way or in another. If a secret article was admitted for regulating the suspension of the conflicting designs of Russia and France upon the Turkish Empire, it can never be contended that our interests were mortally wounded by such a convention. That, if any article in the Treaty of Tilsit related to the Turkish Empire, it was an article regulating the suspension of the designs of the contracting parties upon that Empire, is absolutely certain. On no other terms could Peace between them have been contracted. The designs of Russia upon the Turkish Empire, and the designs of France, are opposed to one another. About the partition of those spoils they never will agree. In that question too, Austria is more deeply interested than any other Power, and will, whenever it comes to be decided, risk even her existence, to turn the decision in her own favour. To have agitated the question of the partition of the Turkish Empire, was to kindle anew, instead of extinguishing, the flames of war; and it was only by agreeing to lay aside these designs for a season that Russia and France could have concluded a Peace. Nor is this the only convincing proof afforded us of this important point. What rational motive could the Emperor Alexander have for urging Peace between this country and France, had he known that, in conjunction with France, he was about to make an attack upon the Turkish Empire? Was he not absolutely certain that we should take arms on such an occasion, if not to preserve the Turkish Empire, at least to secure to Austria as large a share of that Empire as possible? He could have no motive, therefore, in urging, with so much earnestness, a Peace which must immediately be broken; and from this circumstance it is abundantly evident that no secret article for the partition of the Turkish Empire existed. If it be said that he and Napoleon intended to deceive us into Peace, the more easily to accomplish their designs upon Turkey, this is absurd. The fact is, that a state of War affords many occasions for surprising a neighbouring state, but a condition of Peace is entirely adverse to it. When a large force is already on foot it is easy, by pretending one destination, to accomplish another. But, if in a season of Peace, Europe beheld Russia and France conjointly arming, and drawing forces towards Turkey, there would be only one conclusion. It is a very extraordinary truth, that at the moment of the Treaty of Tilsit, the Emperors Alexander and Napoleon, could they have agreed about the partition of Turkey, possessed advantages for the accomplishment of their object, which there was no probability they would ever again obtain. How easy for them would it have been to have imposed absolute silence upon Austria, which had no force that could once have faced them, and have been in possession of Constantinople before a British army could have approached the scene of action! That they did not act in this manner, at the moment of unequalled advantage, is demonstrative proof, that the design was laid aside, because the two Monarchs were sure they could not amicably settle their pretensions.

In regard to a Northern Confederacy against our maritime claims, and a secret article to this effect in the Treaty of Tilsit, credulity and prejudice themselves will not believe this after the intelligence which we have now received. What is it that his Imperial Majesty so earnestly urges in the conference, we have previously inserted, with Lord Hutchinson? It is Peace. But a Northern Confederacy required War. With what absurd allegations have we been perplexed. Could a Northern Confederacy have accomplished any object which they had at heart, their business was to prosecute the War; they would never have spoken of Peace. It is said, however, that the Northern Confederacy was planned, in case we should refuse to make Peace. This is truly amusing. What indication of this do we find in the tone or proposals of the Emperor? What was he to gain by it? What possible consequence could a Northern Confederacy have produced, but, at the worst, to render the War a little more expensive on our part? That it could have had any such effect as to force us to renounce our claims, is absurd. In the mean time Russia must have sustained the expence of a Maritime War, and the entire loss of her commerce. We regard it, therefore, as a point ascertained to certainty, that no confederacy, on the part of Russia, was meditated against us at the conclusion of the Treaty of Tilsit; we regard it too as a point equally certain, that she would have opposed herself, if not with arms, at least with remonstrances, to any attempt of Bonaparte to violate the neutrality of Denmark; and we regard it as a point highly probable, that Bonaparte would not have violated it in the face of these remonstrances.

In this first conversation, every thing on the part of the Emperor breathes a spirit of friendship towards this country. He is first anxious to justify to us the Peace which he had made. He appeals to our Minister, whether even he did not account the Peace, which had been concluded, necessary to Russia. In the most emphatical manner did that Minister pronounce his opinion in unison with that of the Emperor. Compelled, by imperious necessity, to make a Peace for himself, his good offices were interposed immediately to accomplish Peace between us and our enemy; not (according to the just distinction which he made himself) in the spirit of vanity, but in that of friendship, since he regarded Peace as equally conducive to our interests, and to those of the other nations of Europe; and since he knew that terms, which he considered both reasonable and honourable, nay, which, he could appeal to our Minister himself, were reasonable and honourable, would be offered by our enemy. Nothing, too, can afford a greater indication of simplicity and sincerity, than the manner in which the Emperor answers the objection of Lord Hutchinson respecting the shortness of the time offered for our acceptance of the mediation. It appears, clearly, that the limitation of the period, on which so much stress was laid in this country, had been regarded by the Emperor, as a mere formality, and of no importance whatsoever. At the moment of this conference, it appears a certainty almost as strong as a case of such a nature admits, that Russia was entirely the friend of this country: and the probability was great that she would much sooner again be the enemy of France, than the enemy of England. Her friendship with France was compelled; of course ungrateful, and likely to last no longer than the necessity was urgent. All that fear and jealousy of France, which had precipitated her into the contest, not only remained, but was more reasonable than ever. With England she had no quarrel, but that of too feeble a co-operation; the tie of ancient connection remained unbroken; and England was still the grand resource against the terror of her great continental antagonist. She might still, in a very important sense, have been regarded as the Ally of England. Such, it appears with the strongest evidence, were the relations between Russia and England, which remained after the Treaty of Tilsit. How deplorable and mighty was the change affected by the attack on Copenhagen, the second conference with the Emperor, of which Lord Hutchinson stated the details, is a memorable and striking proof:—

"Intelligence, said his Lordship, of the result of the attack on Copenhagen arrived at St. Petersburgh on the 27th or 28th of August. On the 4th of September I saw the Emperor a second time at Kamenoostroff.

"His Imperial Majesty began the conversation by asking me, what I thought of our attack upon Copenhagen?

"I replied, that I was entirely ignorant of the circumstances which had occasioned that attack, but that I hoped the Administration in England could justify themselves, and prove to the world that the Danes were on the eve of joining all their forces to the French, to make common cause against England.

"His Imperial Majesty told me in reply, that it was impossible for me to be of that opinion, if I would recollect the repeated conversations which had taken place between us, on the subject of Denmark, at Bartenstein, in which he told me that he had used every effort in his power to bring forward the Crown Prince of Denmark, and to induce him to join the coalition against France: the answers of the Prince had always been explicit and uniform, that he had maintained for many years a system of neutrality, in which he was determined to persevere, as the people whom he governed had flourished and prospered under it; and that no consideration should ever induce him to depart from it.—His Imperial Majesty added, that I must be acquainted with the decision of character which belonged to the Crown Prince, that nothing was so difficult as to shake his determination, or to induce him to change any line of conduct which he had once adopted; and that he was sure no connection existed between the French and Danish Governments previous to our attack on Copenhagen.

"I then said, that I believed Lord G. L. Gower had delivered to his Imperial Majesty's Minister a note on the subject; to which his Imperial Majesty answered that he had, but that the contents of it were negatory, as it contained no sufficient explanation or offer of satisfaction. His Imperial Majesty then proceeded to state the great concern which our unjustifiable aggression had given him; that the French Government never had done any thing so strong—that it justified every thing they had done or might do hereafter. If such proceedings were admissible, there was an end of all those relations which had usually influenced the conduct of nations towards each other; that every body was at liberty to do just what they pleased, and that he might attack Sweden to-morrow. His Imperial Majesty then told me in the most peremptory language, tone, and manner, that he would have satisfaction, complete satisfaction, for this unprovoked aggression. That it was his duty as Emperor of Russia to demand it, and that he would have it; and he asked me, whether even I myself could venture to differ with him on that subject? He then said that he was bound to Denmark by the most solemn treaties and engagements, which treaties and engagements he was determined to adhere to and fulfil. His Imperial Majesty then added, that he supposed we meant to make an attack on Cronstadt; he did not know what the event of that attack might be, but this he knew, that he was determined to resist to the last man, and to prove himself not entirely unworthy of filling that high station to which it had pleased Providence to call him.

"I told his Imperial Majesty that I had strong reason to hope and believe, that no attack would be made on Cronstadt. His Imperial Majesty said he was prepared for such an event, and had taken his determination upon it, which was that which he had before stated to me. He then closed the conversation, by repeating with much emphasis, that "he would have satisfaction for Denmark."

The estranged and hostile tone which now appeared is not a subject of wonder. There was not a thinking man in England by whom it was not anticipated as a natural consequence of the expedition to Copenhagen. This, it was said, must of necessity procure us the enmity of Russia, who regards herself as the arbiter of the Baltic, and will not, without extreme jealousy and indignation, behold so violent an inroad upon her pretensions. The evidence of the case seems to be altogether uncommon. It is maintained that the Treaty of Tilsit did not annihilate the friendly sentiments of Russia towards England; they were annihilated at the moment of the attack on Copenhagen; this cause is sufficient to account for the effect, and no other cause can be shewn to exist.

Full of the idea of the unjustifiable nature of the measure, the Emperor asked Lord Hutchinson what he thought of it, whether he, even he, had any thing to say in behalf of his countrymen? Difficult was the situation in which his Lordship was here placed! It appears that his heart recoiled from the transaction as it presented itself in its outward features; and he was obliged to assume that the hostile designs of the Danish Government had been so matured, and so manifest, as to justify it. This the Emperor immediately and confidently denied from his general knowledge of the circumstances; he appealed to Lord Hutchinson's own knowledge of these circumstances, if his assumption was not unreasonable, and his Lordship was obliged by his silence to acknowledge the force of the appeal. It now appears, after the defence of our Ministers is before Europe, that the Emperor was right; that no evidence existed of any hostile designs on the part of the Danes; and that the attack was made on the sole apprehension of hostile designs on the part of Bonaparte, which Denmark, it was concluded, was unable to resist.

There is something, even in the complaints of the Emperor, which prove how well founded, and strong were his prejudices against the French, and how far he was, previous to this unfortunate transaction, from any leaning of affection to the cause of Napoleon. "Our foul aggression," he said, "justified every thing the French Government has done;" a clear expression of his opinion how lawless and abominable the conduct of the French towards other countries had been. The expression which follows, too, is still more remarkable, "This aggression of ours," he said, "justified every thing which the French might hereafter do;" a decisive proof of his fears, that the French would not yet cease in their lawless and aggressive career, and were still dangerous neighbours. Are such opinions as these compatible with the idea of a voluntary association, antecedent to all provocation, for the aggrandisement of Bonaparte, and the subjugation of Britain? Certainly not; nor can a doubt remain that to the attack on Denmark, and to that attack alone, we owe the great and important change from friendly to hostile in the Councils of Russia. This fact, which was highly probable, from general evidence before, is, by the conferences which Lord Hutchinson has related, placed beyond a doubt. Whether we have by that attack averted any other evil equally great with the enmity of Russia; whether we have attained any advantage of sufficient magnitude to compensate it; whether any evil which it could avert, or any advantage it could procure, could, in the eye of reason and justice vindicate it, are questions of a different sort, the discussion of which we must reserve till another opportunity.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. VII.

MR. COBBETT'S SPITEFUL ATTACKS UPON THE AMERICANS.

If it has been violently objected to Mr. Cobbett, that his opinions are mutable, and short-lived, he may defy his bitterest enemy to bring this accusation against his resentments. These would appear to be as deep and durable, as the others are hasty and transient. Whether this peculiarity of character is a proof of great wisdom, and great virtue, or the contrary, is not the present question. The fact is undeniable, and is of no little consequence toward enabling us to form a judgment of the worth of his sentiments relating to the momentous questions on the subject of our relations with America. Almost all the opinions which Mr. Cobbett held on the other side of the Atlantic are now changed. Mr. Pitt he then regarded as an angel for talents, and a saint for purity; he now designates him as the shallow-hearted Pitt, and describes him as having been a corrupting, jobbing, squandering oppressor. Sir Francis Burdett was then a fiend let loose from the sulphurous pit; he is now the only man who has a chance to be the saviour of his country. At that time he described the British Constitution as equally perfect in practice and in theory; he now represents it as practically teeming with abuses and corruption. Such is a short specimen of the changes in Mr. Cobbett's opinions; but his resentments against the Americans appear to be as keen as ever. He seems incapable of forgetting the violent quarrel he had with them, and the losses and hardships which it cost him. There is something in this, however, extremely unreasonable.

It was in preaching with violence and fury those very opinions which Mr. Cobbett has now renovated that he created those enemies whose ill offices have made so deep an impression on his mind. Is it not extraordinary therefore that Mr. Cobbett does not reflect that as his violence and fury in favour of opinions which he now condemns, was highly unreasonable, he may have given considerable cause for that enmity which he excited, and against which is resentment is yet so intense? If so many of his opinions were entirely wrong when he was in America, why may it not happen that the very bad opinion which he formed of the Americans themselves was wrong likewise? Without adverting to any other evidence of this allegation, may we not wonder why Mr. Cobbett does not reflect that this opinion which he formed of the Americans, was little better than a corollary from the erroneous notions under which he then laboured. If Mr. Cobbett, when in America considered all Kings, with their sons, nobles, and clergy as demi-gods, heroes and angels; and by consequence hated a people who had violent prejudices against them all; and if Mr. Cobbett now has greatly altered his opinion respecting Kings, and their sons, nobles and clergy, is it not possible that were he now to go to America, he would greatly alter his opinion of the Americans?

He has laboured with great assiduity during the considerable period in which our relations with the United States have been matter of public attention and anxiety to render the Americans at once contemptible and odious to the people of this country. He has ascribed to them every vice and every meanness; while he has studied to persuade us that they hated this country, and what was still a greater crime, that they loved France. About proof Mr. Cobbett seldom troubles himself. We had all this in good round assertion. And unfortunately assertions with a great portion of mankind are fully as cogent as proofs.

After abundant endeavours to make us believe that the Americans are a most odious race, and that they hunger and thirst for mischief to this country, his next object is to persuade us, that they are very defenceless, and may be easily trodden down in the dirt, in short, that we may insult and abuse them, as we please, for they cannot injure us in return. There is something uncommonly illiberal in the strain of Mr. Cobbett's attacks upon the Americans; and there is scarcely one of his assertions that is not unfounded.

In the first place, the Americans have virtues and vices very much like ourselves. They are a shoot from our own stock, and they exhibit very distinct marks of their affinity with the parent tree. They are a people of strong and manly passions, as we ourselves are; and we are very apt to blame in them what we applaud in ourselves. They are a most industrious and enterprising people; and the peculiar aspect which their virtues and vices assume, is the effect entirely of the peculiarity of their situation. We are apt to designate them as a rapacious people; but in every country, where industry is in its infancy, where capital is extremely scarce and extremely valuable, this appearance will invariably be exhibited. As the scope for capital is more unbounded in America than any where else; this cause operates there with a force peculiarly great. But effects, exactly similar, are experienced even in our West India Islands, though these are both of limited extent, and are fed with all the opulent capitals of our West India merchants. As they are a people too, mostly agricultural, and thinly spread over this immense surface, with few occasions of social intercourse, they exhibit but little of the polished manners of European cities; and a republican familiarity is frequently affected, which is found highly offensive to such Europeans as are enamoured with aristocratical distinctions and ceremonies.

In the next place it is perfectly untrue that the Americans are distinguished by an aversion to this country. The contrary is incontrovertibly the fact. One of the chief sources of their pride is their descent from this country. It is commonly spoken of among them by the name of The Old Country, a term, expressing at once the memory of their connexion, and their veneration for the country of their fathers. Their laws, and even their forms of legislation, as well as their fashions, customs, and manners, are all borrowed from us. It is undoubtedly true, that the regulations which we have imposed upon neutral trade during our present contest with France, have inflicted upon them the greatest hardships; and it was not unnatural for them to complain. They are, like ourselves, a thinking people; and when they have to complain of another nation, they do it in a pretty noisy stile. They are at present, no doubt, very much provoked against this country; but even at present there is among them a large fund of esteem and good will toward this country, which only wants a favourable season to produce the happiest effects. There is among them, as there is among us, two parties, one of which is more republican than the other; and these two parties brand one another; the one with the epithet of the French party, and the other with that of the British. But the epithet of French is just as improperly applied among them, as it was some years ago among us, to Mr. Fox and his party.

In the last place, the Americans are, by no means, as Mr. Cobbett would have us believe, enemies entirely to be despised. They cannot conquer our fleets, or invade Ireland: but, as we do not agree with Mr. Cobbett, that our commerce is our curse, we cannot, in the present situation of the world contemplate, without lively emotion, the loss of our intercourse with a nation, that has for a number of years taken off more goods of British produce and manufacture, than the whole continent of Europe. As this, however, is a subject of vast importance, we will not trespass any further beyond our limits. We have, at present, merely entered upon the subject. It will again come under our attentive consideration.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

PARIS, JAN. 16.—The Patriote, of 74 guns, which left the Chesapeake on the 16th of December, arrived at the Isle of Aix on the 4th inst.—By it we learn that Mr. Monroe, the Ambassador from England, had returned on the 14th of December. The public papers announced that the Senate and House of Representatives had assembled without any exterior communication. It was said that the proposals made by England to redress the grievances of the United States, were of a nature to be ill received, and that every thing was for war with that country.

PORTUGAL.

DECREE FOR CONFISCATING ALL BRITISH PROPERTY IN PORTUGAL.

All goods, jewels, and silver, as well as moveable and landed property of any nature whatsoever, belonging to any individual subject of Great Britain, found in any territory of the Portuguese dominions, shall be confiscated.

All goods of British manufacture, of any kind whatsoever, shall be also confiscated.

It is expressly ordained, that any person, of whatever class, who shall have in his possession any sum or goods belonging to subjects of Great Britain, shall appear and declare the same, in the course of three days, at the Secretary's Office, M. Legoy, appointed Commissary ad interim, whose residence is at No. 10, opposite the Fountain of the Loretto; and in the interior parts of Portugal these declarations are to be made before the Magistrate of the place.

Any person who shall not make a true and exact declaration, shall forfeit ten times the sum of the object so declared, and shall receive besides corporal punishment, if the object should deserve such.

Any goods or property which may have been any way concealed by either Portuguese or French merchants, or those of any other Nation, shall be declared in the same manner under the like penalties.

The Administrator-General of the Finances, and the Regency Council, are charged with the execution of this Decree.

Dated in the Palace of the General Quarters, Lisbon, the 1st of December. (Signed) JUNOT.

LISBON, JAN. 17.—The new Decrees and Orders of the French General Junot, have been regularly communicated to the Regency, and by them put into execution. The furniture of the British Assembly Room has been sold by Junot for 600*l.* sterling; the lower apartments were immediately afterwards directed to be converted into stables; and the upper rooms, which are very elegantly constructed and furnished, were presented to Beauharnois, who has taken up his residence there.

The sum of British property, which, by virtue of the Decree of the 5th of December, had been entered with Mons. Legoy, did not amount to 140,000*l.* sterling, and no efforts on the part of the people were attempted to be made to increase the amount. The seals had not been raised from the doors of the Offices of Customs; but this is daily expected, under the superintendance of officers, who had been charged to inquire into the nature and value of the property. Such as should be found to be in any manner connected with British subjects is to be confiscated as British property, and such as shall clearly appear to belong to the subjects of Portugal, is to be restored, and allowed to be sold for their benefit."

AMERICA.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WASHINGTON, DEC. 22.—Mr. Newton (Va.) from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a Bill Supplementary to the Act laying an Embargo, which was twice read.—The following is the Bill:

A BILL,

Supplementary to the Act, entitled "an Act laying an Embargo on all Ships and Vessels in the ports and harbours of the United States."

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, that during the continuance of the act to which this act is supplementary, no vessel licensed for the coasting trade and fisheries, (ships engaged in the whale or other fisheries were excepted in the Committee on the Bill), having on board goods wares, and merchandize, either of foreign or domestic growth or manufacture, fishing vessels with salt for their fishing fares excepted, shall be allowed to depart from any port of the United States, or shall receive a clearance until the owner, consignee, agent or factor, shall, with the master, give bond with one or more sureties to the United States, in a sum double the value of the vessel and cargo, that the vessel is not destined for any foreign port or place, and that the said goods, wares, and merchandize shall be re-landed in some port of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any ship or vessel shall, during the continuance of the act to which this act is a supplement, depart from any port of the United States without a clearance, or if any ship or vessel shall, contrary to the provisions of this act, or the act to which this is a supplement, proceed to a foreign port or place, such ship or vessel and cargo shall be wholly forfeited; and if the same shall not be seized, the owner of such ship or vessel shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay a sum equal to double the value of the ship or vessel and cargo, and the master or commander of such ship or vessel, as well as all other persons concerned in such prohibited foreign voyage, shall each respectively forfeit and pay the sum of not more than 20,000 dollars, nor less than 1000 dollars for every such offence, whether the vessel be seized and condemned or not.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the exception made by the act, to which this act is a supplement, in favour of armed vessels, possessing public commissions from foreign powers, shall apply only to public armed vessels, and shall not be construed to embrace either privateers, vessels having letters of marque, or any other private armed vessels; but such private armed vessels shall be permitted to depart in the same manner, and on the same conditions, as is provided for other private foreign ships or vessels.

Dec. 31.—This day Mr. Randolph, made a motion in the House of Representatives against General Wilkinson. He said, he should first state certain facts, and those facts would be the ground of his motion, on which he should offer no argument.—Mr. R. then read the following documents:—

TRANSLATION.

In the galley the Victoria, Bernardo Molina, Patron, there have been sent to Don Vincent Folch nine thousand six hundred and forty dollars, which sum, without making the least use of it, you will hold at my disposal, to deliver it at the moment an order may be presented to you by the American General Don James Wilkinson God preserve you many years.

New Orleans, 29th Jan. 1796.

The BARON DE CARONDELET.

To Senor Don Thomas Portell.

I certify that the foregoing is a copy of its original, to which I refer. (Signed) THOMAS PORTELL.

New Madrid, 27th June, 1796.

A debate ensued, which continued till past five o'clock, almost entirely on the mode proper to be pursued, whether to refer the Resolution to a Select Committee of the whole, or to pass it without reference.—No decision was however made. The further consideration of the subject was postponed, on motion of Mr. Smiley, till Monday, Jan. 4.

JANUARY 2.—The engrossed Bill, Supplementary to the Act laying an Embargo, has been read a third time; and on the question, shall the Bill pass, a division took place—Yays 82—Nays 22.

Extract of a Letter, dated Washington, Dec. 31, 1807:—"This morning an advertisement was found posted up in different parts of the city, proclaiming John Randolph a prevaricating poltroon; signed "James Wilkinson."—In the House, this day, Randolph impeached Wilkinson of being a Spanish pensioner, and said that he had documents and letters in his possession (which he has had but two or three days) which would fully prove the charge. A motion was made to request the President to institute an enquiry into Wilkinson's conduct.—Wilkinson challenged Randolph yesterday, and Randolph replied, that he would not fight him till he cleared up his character."

BOSTON, DEC. 22.—The merchants and dealers in flour and wheat at the Southward, are very severely feeling the first effects of the embargo; flour has fallen at New York, Alexandria, Baltimore, and other places, to four a four and a-fourth dollars, and several great failures have already occurred: one at New York, last week, for 80,000 dollars, it is said.

BOSTON, JAN. 7.—Already are the effects of the embargo sensibly felt by the labouring classes, that the Corporation of New York were proposing means of employing the cartmen, mechanics, and labourers of that city, so as to give bread to their distressed families, at this inclement season of the year.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, FEB. 8, 1808.

The Curates Suspension Bill was read a third time and passed.

LORD AUCKLAND observed, that previously to the motion which he intended to submit to their Lordships, it was necessary, in his opinion, that they should be in possession of certain documents and papers relating to the exports and imports of the country for a certain time, for it would appear from the perusal of those papers, when produced, that in spite of all the efforts of the enemy to depress and injure our trade, that during the year in which his Noble Friend near him (Lord Grenville) was at the head of the Administration, that our exports amounted to the enormous sum of 43 millions; but was sorry to say that they had fallen very considerably since the present Ministers came into office. The Noble Lord then moved, that there be laid before the House an account of the exports and imports into Great Britain during the last three years, distinguishing the amount and value in each year, ending the 5th of January 1808.

LORD GRENVILLE wished to know from the Noble Secretary of State, whether any Official Communication had been received respecting a Message from the President of the United States of America, as to the Ratification of the Treaty concluded by the Commissioners of both Countries.

LORD HAWKESBURY said, he expected to be able to satisfy the Noble Baron to-morrow, or on Wednesday next.

COPENHAGEN EXPEDITION.

THE DUKE OF NORFOLK read a variety of motions for copies of the Proclamations of Lord Catheart and Admiral Gambier; the representations of the latter respecting the state of the Danish fleet, &c. all of which were severally put and agreed to. His Grace then moved for copies of any representations made by the British Minister at Copenhagen, regarding the intentions of Denmark to surrender her fleet to France; and of any demands of explanation addressed to the Crown Prince, with regard to the secret articles of the Treaty of Tilsit.

THE MARQUIS OF WELLESLEY considered the question of the Copenhagen Expedition as already decided by the resolutions of Parliament, on the various points connected with that subject.

LORD HUTCHINSON stated his conviction, that the Crown Prince was determined to persevere in his neutrality. When the French, in Dec. 1805, violated his territory, it was known to every Foreign Minister at Copenhagen, that his resolution was, in case of necessity, to abandon Holstein and Jutland, and not a doubt existed of his ability to preserve Zealand with its Navy. He was convinced, that the attack on Copenhagen was the immediate cause of the war with Russia. That Power had done all that she could do against France. In the short campaign of 11 days, which terminated the war, she had out of an army of 70,000, lost 27 Generals, 1800 inferior officers, and 40,000 men. The enemy had taken the field with, at the lowest calculation, a force of 160,000 effective troops. He had opportunities of judging that peace was essentially necessary to the existence of Russia. Here his Lordship read a statement of two private conversations which he had with the Emperor. [Vide the ORIGINAL DISQUISITION on his Lordship's conference with the Emperor of Russia.] From the warmth with which the Emperor addressed him, he was convinced that nothing prevented an immediate declaration of hostilities, but that there were two Russian squadrons at sea. Yet what had been the conduct of Ministers? They asserted that Russia was a principal party to the Maritime Confederacy, they permitted one of her squadrons to enter the Tagus, and another to pass through their fleet in the Sound? They were weak and pusillanimous to the strong, firm and vigorous to the weak.

LORD HAWKESBURY justified the Expedition to Zealand upon three grounds, 1st, The avowed designs of France; 2d, The impracticability of effectual resistance on the part of Denmark; and 3dly, The magnitude of the danger to this country, should the Danish Navy fall into the hands of Bonaparte.

For the Motion, Contents 85—Proxies 18. Against it, Non-Contents 68—Proxies 37.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB. 11.

The Thirty-third Report of the Commissioners of Accounts for Ireland was presented and ordered to be printed.

Lord Sidmouth gave notice, that on Thursday next he should move for an Address to his Majesty, praying him to preserve the Danish navy in such a state, as should not preclude or put to hazard the possibility of its restitution on the conclusion of peace. The House was ordered to be summoned for the day above stated.

Lord Hawkesbury laid on the table, a copy of Mr. Jefferson's late Message to the American Congress; and also copies of certain communications from the British Minister in America. They were ordered to be printed.

AMERICAN TREATY.

Lord Grenville said, that next to the union of all classes of the King's subjects in the defence of the country, the most important interest he could figure to his own mind, was that of preserving a good understanding with the United States. He did not understand that it was intended by the American Government, to deny the validity of the right of searching merchant vessels for seamen, if it was, he would say it was better to perish in a contest for maintaining them; for otherwise we should not less certainly, but more ignominiously, accelerate the destruction of our maritime superiority, and with that our national independence. The Noble Lord concluded with moving for an Address to his Majesty, praying that he would be graciously pleased to give orders for laying before the House, a Copy of the late Treaty concluded with the American Plenipotentiaries.

Lord Hawkesbury stated his readiness to accede to the motion just made, on the chief grounds laid by the Noble Mover.

The arrangement suggested was not agreed to.

On the motion of Lord Hawkesbury, there was ordered to be laid before the House a Copy of certain Communications with Mr. Rist, the Danish Minister, regarding the Order in Council of the 7th of January, 1807.

Lord Moira gave notice, that on the 22d inst. he should move the second reading of the Debtor and Creditor Bill.

Earl Grey then rose to move, pursuant to notice, for a variety of papers. The first which he called for related to the Austrian and Russian offers of mediation. His Lordship contended that no engagement had been violated by them, and that they had never given other ground of hope than a general assurance of their readiness to co-operate in any practicable way which Russia could point out, on such a scale as was proportioned to the military means of the country, and the necessary drain upon those means for the colonial establishments. The Swedes had engaged to furnish a force of 25,000 men for an additional subsidy, but this stipulation had not been executed. The late Ministry had not thrown any obstacle in the way of the proposed loan to Russia; but when it was considered that the sum demanded was six millions, it would not seem surprising that with the experience of the Austrian loan before them, they had declined to guarantee the re-payment of such a sum; and without such guarantee the money could not be raised. His Lordship, not having yet an opportunity of consulting the papers in the Public Offices, would not, at present, enter into any discussion of the merits of the expedition to Constantinople. He concluded with moving for the production of the several documents.

Lord Hawkesbury vindicated the conduct of Ministers, in not entering, in their Declaration against Russia, into the details of the complaints which she brought forward in her Declaration, any further than to shew that they formed no valid justification for her conduct.

The question was put on the different motions, some of which were agreed to, and others negatived.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, FEB. 8.

A person from the Commissioners for investigating the Claims made on the late Nabob of Arcot, presented the Third Report from the Commissioners, which was ordered to be printed.

An Account was presented from the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, for one year, ending January 1, 1808.

New Writs were ordered for Ennis, in the room of J. Fitzgerald, Esq. now Escheator of Munster; and for Tralee, in the room of the Sitting Member, who has accepted the Stewardship of the Hundred of East Headred.

Mr. T. Grenville wished to say a few words on the subject of a Notice given by an Hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Taylor) respecting the Papers relative to the Expedition against Constantinople. He said, he wished to learn what Papers Ministers intended to produce, as the late Ministers were out of office before the Expedition to Constantinople was carried into effect. He alluded to Papers of some importance; these were Sir T. Louis's remarks, transmitted to Lord Collingwood, on the state of the Turkish batteries, dated the 5th of December, —There was another letter, respecting Alexandria and the Dardanelles, which he imagined Ministers had received from Lord Collingwood, and which, he supposed, they would readily produce.

Mr. Canning said a few words in reply, in which we understood him to refuse the Papers requested.

Mr. Whitbread said, he heard, with surprise, the Right Hon. Gentleman refuse the communication requested by his Right Hon. Friend. He had never known that such communications had been withheld, and he should therefore proceed to move for certain Papers, in obedience to his Notice. The Right Hon. Secretary (Canning) had on Wednesday disregarded all delicacy and reserve, and had read a garbled extract of a letter from Earl Grey, then Lord Howick, to Mr. Garlick, our Envoy at Copenhagen. He did not mean to charge the Secretary of State with having forged what he had read, but he charged him with having wilfully omitted whole sentences, highly material, giving, instead of facts and true statements, a loose disjointed chaos. He concluded by moving for a Copy of the Dispatch by Lord Howick to Mr. Garlick, dated the 3d of December, 1806, together with a Copy of the Note delivered by Mr. Rist to Lord Howick.

Mr. Canning stated, that he stood, like all men in office, he was unwilling to give information where it was not necessary, and he never yet refused it, where it was properly and regularly required, and where it consisted with his duty to accord it. After some further explanation of minor importance, Mr. Canning concluded by agreeing to the first part of the Hon. Gentleman's motion; but in expressing his dissent to Mr. Rist's Note, as there was no occasion for its production, and as no case had been made shewing why it ought to be laid before the House.

After several Members had spoken, the House became clamorous for the question, when a division took place—

For the Motion, 73—Against it, 157—Majority 84.

Mr. Sharp gave Notice, that on an early day he would name one, to move for certain Resolutions, expressive of the disapprobation of the House, on the conduct of His Majesty's Ministers, with respect to the Expedition to Copenhagen.

A message was brought from the Lords, stating that their Lordships had agreed to the Curates Suspension Bill.

The Reports of the Committees of Supply and Ways and Means were put and agreed to.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, to consider the Extraordinaries of the Navy.

Mr. Ward stated, that the Extraordinaries of this year amounted to considerably more than the last. 1,142,959*l.* 19*s.* 10*d.* would be wanted for the Extraordinaries of the Navy; 235,100*l.* for building and repairing; 175,100*l.* for wear and tear of transports; 281,100*l.* for sick and wounded; 55,500*l.* for prisoners of war; and 50,000*l.* for sick prisoners.

A new Writ was issued for the county of Westmeath, in the room of Richard Smyth, Esq. who has, since his election, accepted the office of Escheator of Munster.

The American Intercourse Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEB. 9.

Mr. Huskisson moved for copies of certain Letters, which passed between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Governor, &c. of the Bank, respecting the unclaimed Dividends.—Ordered.

Sir J. Newport moved, that a Copy of the Charter of the Bank of Ireland; also an Account of the Balances in that Bank, from the 5th December, 1807, to the 5th January, 1808, belonging to the different Public Offices, be laid before the House.

Sir F. Burdett said, he wished to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question, respecting the grant lately made by his Majesty to the Duke of York, of 20,000*l.* All he wanted to know was, by what authority his Majesty could dispose of so much property at pleasure?

The Chancellor of the Exchequer replied, that the property belonged to his Majesty, which accrued to him from Droits of the Admiralty, &c. Such grants were usual.

Sir F. Burdett signified his intention of bringing forward, on an early day, a motion respecting these Grants.

Mr. Huskisson presented the Correspondence between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Bank of England, respecting the Unclaimed Dividends.

Mr. Canning laid before the House a Paper, purporting to be the Speech of the President of the United States to both Houses of Congress; also a Copy of Mr. Rist's Note to Lord Howick, and his Lordship's Answer.

On the motion of Lord Temple, there were ordered to be laid before the House, an Account, shewing all Imports and Exports to and from Great Britain for the three last years, terminating on the 1st of January, 1808.

The Report of the Committee of Supply of last night, granting various sums as estimates for the Navy, &c. was brought up and agreed to.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 10.

Mr. Fawkener, the Clerk of the Privy Council, presented an Account of the Fees and Gratuities paid by persons for carrying on the Foreign Trade from May, 1803, to December last, shewing the apportionment of the same.—Ordered to be printed.

Lord Temple gave notice, that on Monday he should move for a Copy of a Note of Mr. Pinckney, the late American Ambassador, to Lords Holland and Auckland, dated the 31st of December, 1806, relative to the Treaty between Great Britain and America.

Mr. Sheridan intimated that on Monday he should move for Copies of all or any Correspondence that had passed between Ministers and the Prince of Denmark, upon the Surrender of Copenhagen, relative to our retaining possession of that fortress.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stated, that he felt great satisfaction at being able to state to the Committee the favourable arrangement he had made with the Bank. The arrangement to which he alluded had arisen from the suggestion of the Finance Committee of last Session, and it embraced three different subjects. The first was the management of the Public Debt; 2dly, The allowance to the Bank for that management; and lastly, The Unclaimed Dividends, and Unclaimed Lottery Prizes, remaining in the custody of the Bank. The Right Hon. Gentleman then went on to describe the sums to be allowed the Bank for the management of the Public Debt, at the rate of 963*l.* per million, as it at present stood. When the debt should be further reduced the allowance was then meant to be 400*l.* per million. This arrangement would eventually prove a saving of 62,000*l.* or 65,000*l.* a year. The next point was, the advance by the Bank of 3,000,000*l.* during the war. This came from the advantages the Bank enjoyed in possessing the balances of the Public money. It appeared from the most accurate calculation, that these balances amounted to something between eleven and twelve millions, from which, however, there fell to be deducted 600,000*l.* being a deposit on account of America. It amounted in the whole, he believed, to ten millions and a half, deducting the above sum. He then described the amount of the Unclaimed Dividends from 1791, as amounting to 500,000*l.*; and the three millions as the profit of the Bank on the deposits of Government in their hands. After some further observations, the Right Hon. Gentleman concluded by moving, "That towards the Supply granted to his Majesty, a sum of 500,000*l.* of Unclaimed Dividends, and Undemanded Lottery Prizes, be granted."—He stated he should move the other Resolution after this preliminary one should be agreed to.

On the question being put, Mr. Bankes, the Chairman of the Finance Committee, commended the object of the Right Hon. Gentleman had in view, on the principal that it was nothing but fair that the Public should have the use of its own money. A better bargain might have been made, and it would not have been detrimental or injurious to the Bank. He conceived, that a reduction ought to have taken place in the allowances proposed to the Bank on the management of the Public Debt, as the advance from the Bank of the three millions, without interest, might indure for a long time, at least until the end of the war.

Mr. Tierney did not approve of the Resolutions, and urged, that the Bank ought, from the public balances therein deposited, to take the management of the national debt without any charge.

Mr. Bankes and the Chancellor of the Exchequer explained, when the Resolutions were agreed to, and the Report ordered to be received to-morrow.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB. 11.

Mr. Huskisson moved for leave to bring in a Bill for abolishing the office of Surveyor of Subsidies and Petty Customs in the Port of London.—Leave given.

Sir F. Burdett then rose to submit the motion of which he had given notice. It was his intention to ground a Parliamentary proceeding on the Account for which he should now move, which was, for an account of all captures made at sea, by British vessels, which were claimed, or said to have remainder in the Crown, from 1792, to the present day.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that if such was the account wanted by the Hon. Baronet, it would be a difficult matter to make it out; but if he wanted only a statement of the Droits of the Admiralty during that period, he thought the account might be produced. The Droits of the Admiralty, however, he could tell the Hon. Baronet, were long since, by the authority of Parliament, made his Majesty's private property.

Sir F. Burdett had no possible objection to the line chalked out by the Right Hon. Gentleman.

Sir C. Pole supported the original motion.

The Advocate General vindicated the Droits pertaining to the Crown, as authorised by ancient practice. It had been the case in the war with Spain, where ships were taken before a declaration of war. These vessels were condemned to the Crown, the captors having no real interest in the condemnation. A moiety of two-thirds of the proceeds was, however, granted by the Crown as a reward for the capture.

Mr. Lushington said he was in possession of a fact which he felt compelled, by a sense of duty, to state to the House. It nearly concerned an Honourable Baronet, one of its Members, who quitted the service of the navy in 1787, and went to Ostend, where he got a vessel and proceeded to India. In that country he exchanged his ship for a vessel called the Etrusco, and returned with a cargo to Europe. He went to Ireland, and came to Dungeness, where he run a cargo on shore, or in other words smuggled (loud cries of hear from the Opposition). His ship was taken off Dungeness by the Brilliant frigate, and she was condemned in the Court of Admiralty. The Captain of the Brilliant received no reward for the capture: but in September 1806, 25,000*l.* was bestowed, not on the captors, but on an Officer of the Navy who had violated the laws of his country.

Sir H. Popham having been thus personally charged, vindicated his conduct, in having gone to India. It was a period of profound peace, and he would refer to the Journals for the sanction and applause his conduct received, when in India, from Lord Cornwallis and the Court of Directors. He was anxious at that time to acquire a knowledge of his profession, and his public services in India must have been of a very extraordinary kind indeed (a laugh), to excite this attack. He had never been a smuggler, or been at all concerned with smugglers.

Mr. Perceval moved his Amendment, which was for an Account of the Nett Proceeds paid into the Court of Admiralty, as Droits, since the 1st of January 1793; and of the balance still remaining.

Some conversation ensued, when the House divided—the Amendment was carried by 82 to 57.

On our re-admission Mr. Abercromby put off his motion, respecting the instructions given to Lord St. Vincent, relative to Portugal, till Monday.

The Report of the Committee of last night was brought up and agreed to. It respected the Bank Loan, and Bills were ordered.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 12,

On the motion of Mr. Calcraft, the day appointed for balloting for a Committee to try the Wexford Petition, was deferred from the 24th of March to the 7th of April.

Mr. H. Martin moved for an Account of all Sums issued by the Paymaster-General of the Forces to persons without account. The Hon. Gentlemen stated, that he last Session obtained a similar Account, and he now wanted another for a further period, viz. from 1805, to the 1st of January, 1807.

Mr. Chancellor Perceval had no objection to the motion, though he could not help expressing a strong wish, that the Hon. Gentleman would suggest the matter to the Finance Committee.

The Motion was agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. Eden there was ordered to be laid before the House an Account of all Neutral Ships that had entered or been brought into British Ports, under the Order of Council, of the 11th of November, describing the places to which they belong, and stating, when they obtained permission to proceed on their voyages.

Sir C. Pole moved for an Account of the Droits of the Admiralty, arising from vessels, prizes, cargoes, and part of cargoes; and secondly, for a similar account of such vessels, &c. condemned as prize in any of the Courts of Admiralty abroad, or by the High Court of Admiralty in England, since January, 1802. He also moved for an account of all ships and vessels, cargoes, or part of cargoes, presented in the name of his Majesty, showing the nett produce of such vessels, and the gross amount of their cargoes, captured previous to the declaration of war; according to the latest returns.—Ordered.

Lord Petty gave notice, that on Monday he should move an Address to his Majesty, for dispatches, or extract of dispatches, received by Ministers, relative to the ratification of the Treaty with the United States.

Sir A. Pigott gave a notice similar to that of Mr. Eden, for a list of all neutrals brought into this country, or who came into it, and allowed to depart, on giving bonds.

Mr. Huskisson brought up the Bill, carrying into effect the late Orders in Council, which was read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Tuesday.

Mr. Ponsonby intimated, that he should debate the principle of the Bill in that stage.

The Curate's Suspension Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Exchequer Bills Regulation Bill was read a third time and passed.

An Account was presented from the Exchequer of the interest paid on Exchequer Bills for the last three years.

Several Accounts of Rum imported from the West Indies, exported from Great Britain, and consumed at home, for the last three years, were ordered.—Adjourned till Monday.

PROVINCIALS.

CAMBRIDGE, FEB. 5.—The Rev. Edward Pearson, rector of Rempstone, Notts, and formerly Fellow and Tutor of Sydney College, was on Sunday unanimously elected Master of that society.—The late Dr. Smith's prizes of 25l. each, for two commencing Bachelors of Arts, proficients in mathematics and natural philosophy, are this year adjudged to Mr. Bickersteth, of Caius, and Mr. M. Bland, of St. John's, the first and second wranglers.—The subjects appointed by the Vice-Chancellor for Sir Wm. Browne's prize medals, for the present year, are for the epigrams, Beatus vulnere.—Alcaics, Finibus expulsum patriis, nova regna patentem.—Sapphics, Veris comites.

At the Annual Meeting of the Bath and West of England Agricultural Society in December last, Mr. Sitwell made the following communication:—"Mr. Sitwell has found, that a disease in calves, called the Navel Ill, or an inflammation of the navel string, that takes place between the first and ninth day after birth, is very prevalent in various districts, and in every instance fatal. He has been fortunate to find a cure, which is as follows:—Immediately on the calf being taken ill, he gives, in one table spoonful of bark, 150 drops of laudanum, and one wine-glass of port-wine. Every four hours he foments the inflamed part with marsh mallows, or camomile flowers. The following morning he gives, in new milk, two tea-spoonfuls of rhubarb. He repeats the bark, laudanum, and wine at night, and the rhubarb the following morning; which has hitherto effected a cure. Mr. Sitwell suggested, that tying a ligature round the navel string immediately after birth, and cutting off the remaining part, may be in some degree a means of prevention, but not to be depended on"

Fifteen thousand acres of land were inundated on the coast of Suffolk, by the high tide of the 14th ult. The damage done to the buildings and stock is incalculable.

Oil of any kind may be purified by mixing it with an equal quantity of water in which oak bark, or some other tanning, has been infused, agitating it violently, and applying to the liquid a boiling heat for about a quarter of an hour, when the oil is to be scummed off.—The refuse of fish-oil, from the above process, is used in making plaster or stucco, or in paints, putty, &c.; it is likewise an excellent ingredient for blacking for leather, such refuse being insoluble in water, and consequently resisting water.

Sarah Smith, the Sussex Sleeping Sylvana, otherwise called the Sleeping Beauty, has again fell under the influence of Morpheus, at a public house at Horsham, from whence she was removed to the poor house, where she yet remains in a dormant state. An operation has been suggested by eminent Gentlemen of the Faculty, but which the unfortunate young woman has hitherto positively refused to undergo.

A person named Robins, a considerable dairy-farmer at Brimeard's-hill, near Wootton-Basset, was in the daily practice of drinking to great excess, and in fits of inebriety, he would often beat his wife most cruelly, and threaten to kill her. On Sunday se'nnight the poor woman had expressed her fears that he would put his threats in execution, and had particularly requested one of the men-servants to sleep in the house; but this request, unfortunately, was not attended to, and no one was in the house that night but Robins and his wife. On Monday morning, at break of day, the first labourer that went to work discovered Robins sitting by the hearth-side, in the back kitchen, and near him his wife, lying on the embers, burnt in a dreadful manner, and quite dead. The murderer was apprehended, and lodged in Devizes prison.

Simmons, the wretch who murdered the two ladies, at Hoddesdon, a few months since, died, it is said, last week, in Hertford gaol, raving mad. He had, it seems, refused to take any food for several days before.

LONDON GAZETTE EXTRAORDINARY.

Downing-Street, Feb. 8.

Captain Berkeley, First Aid-de-Camp to General Bowyer, arrived yesterday morning at the office of Viscount Castlereagh, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, with a Dispatch from the General, of which the following is a copy:—

Santa Cruz, Dec. 27.

MY LORD—Being in a state of preparation and readiness to move a sufficient force against the Danish Islands in these seas, in consequence of your Lordship's dispatch of the 5th of Sept. no time was lost (after the arrival of his Majesty's final commands, signified to me by Lord Hawkesbury's letter of Nov. 8, in your Lordship's absence, by the Fawn sloop of war, which arrived early on Tuesday morning the 15th inst. at Barbadoes), in embarking the troops at Barbadoes on board the men of war appointed to receive them by Rear-Admiral Sir Alex. Cochrane, who immediately dispatched others to the Islands to leeward to take on board such as were under orders in each of them, with directions to proceed to the general rendezvous, the whole of which, except 100 rank and file of the 90th regiment from St. Vincent's, joined the Admiral before or soon after our arrival off the Island of St. Thomas on the 21st inst. It was then thought proper to send a summons to Governor Von Scholten, in charge of Brigadier-General Shipley and Capt. Fahie, commanding his Majesty's ship Ethalion, to surrender the Islands of St. Thomas, St. John, and their dependencies, to his Britannic Majesty, which he did the next day on terms agreed upon between him and Major-General Maitland and Capt. Pickmore, of his Majesty's ship Ramilies, which were afterwards approved of and ratified by Rear-Admiral the Hon. Sir Alex. Cochrane and myself, a copy of which I have the honour to inclose, and hope they will meet with his Majesty's approbation.

On the 23d, in the evening, after leaving a garrison of 300 men of the 70th regiment, with an Officer and detachment of the Royal Artillery, at St. Thomas's, under the command of Brigadier-General Maclean, whom I have also directed to assume the Civil Government of the same, until his Majesty's pleasure is signified thereon, we proceeded to Santa Cruz, the Admiral having previously sent his Majesty's ship Ethalion, with Brigadier-General Shipley and Captain Fahie, to summon that island; who returned the next morning, the 24th, with a letter from the Governor, offering to surrender it to his Majesty, provided we would allow three Danish Officers to view on board the ships the number of troops brought against it, which we permitted, that his Excellency's military honour might thereby not be reflected on. These Officers having made their report to their Governor, returned early the next morning, the 25th, to the flag ship with a message, that the Governor was willing to treat for the surrender of the island, when Major-General Maitland and Capt. Pickmore were again sent on shore to settle the terms of capitulation, a copy of which I also transmit; which being approved of by the Admiral and myself, troops were landed, and the forts and batteries taken possession of in the name of his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, a royal salute being fired on the British colours being hoisted.

I should be ungrateful in the extreme, did I not state to your Lordship the great and many obligations I conceive myself, the Officers, and soldiers to be under to Rear-Admiral the Hon. Sir Alex. Cochrane, the Captains and Officers of the Royal Navy, who have universally afforded us every comfortable accommodation in their power, and I am sure much to their own inconvenience.

I am convinced that had it been necessary to have called for the exertions of the sea and land forces employed upon this expedition, that they would have added another laurel to the many already acquired by British valour and discipline.

Copies of the two letters of summons, with the answers of the respective Governors, are hereby transmitted, together with a return of ordnance, and ordnance stores, taken possession of, both at St. Thomas's and Santa Cruz.

This dispatch will be presented to your Lordship by Captain Berkeley, of the 15th infantry, an intelligent Officer, who will Answer any questions you may be pleased to ask him; and I beg leave to recommend him to your Lordship's notice. Captain Berkeley is my first Aid-de-Camp.—I have the honour to be, &c.

HENRY BOWYER,
General and Commander of the Forces.

The Gazette then gives the Summons sent by General Bowyer and Admiral Cochrane, to the Commandant of St. Thomas, with the Commandant's reply.

The Summons to the Governor of Santa Cruz is next given, which is nearly in the same words as the Summons to the Commandant of St. Thomas.

The Articles of Capitulation are then given, by which it is stipulated, that these Colonies must trade under the same laws that govern the West India Islands. The Danish troops are to be considered prisoners of war, and conveyed to Europe as soon as possible.—From one of the articles it appears, that there was a conspiracy in Vera Cruz, to overturn the Government. There were 89 pieces of ordnance of different calibre at St. Thomas's, and about 134 at Santa Cruz, besides gun-powder, cartridges, shot, shells, muskets, &c.

Admiral Cochrane's account of the operations follows next. —It is in substance the same as the letter from General Bowyer. The ships found at St. Thomas's and Santa Cruz, amount to—

At St. Thomas's—Danes, 53; English 8; Americans 3; Hamburghers 3; Swedish 1.—At St. Croix, Danes 21.——Total 89.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

On Monday another interesting debate took place in the House of Lords, on the motion of the Duke of NORFOLK for certain papers illustrative of the expedition to Copenhagen. There were two novel features in the discussion of that night. Marquis WELLESLEY, for the first time since his return from India, took a share in the debate, and in an elaborate speech defended the conduct of Ministers on the attack on the Danish capital. As his arguments, however, presented merely the defence which has been so often repeated, it is unnecessary for us to load the subject with superfluous commentary. The other extraordinary circumstance in the debate, was one of much more importance; the statement of the sentiments of Lord HUTCHINSON, whose late situation rendered him master of knowledge so peculiarly interesting for the decision of this momentous question. As the narrative which he delivered of the instructive conferences which he held with the EMPEROR of RUSSIA, the one subsequent to the treaty of Tilsit, the other to the arrival of intelligence respecting the bombardment of Copenhagen, forms the subject of the political disquisition in the first columns of this Paper, we have no occasion here to extend our remarks.

The property which accrues to HIS MAJESTY from certain captures made at sea, has come under the discussion of Parliament, as this property has hitherto been exempt from the controul of Parliament; as it appears, that in a protracted and complicated war like that in which we have been so long involved, this property may rise to a very great amount; and as it is a vital principle of the Constitution, that no considerable sums should remain at the disposal of the Executive Power, exempt from the controul of Parliament, all parties seem to have joined in approving of the inquiry into the amount and application of this money, though some difference existed as to the mode in which it should take place.

Accounts have been received of the capture of the Danish West-India Islands. This, however, is not a subject of peculiar triumph. They offered no resistance; and though they may be of some weight in the scale of compensation in the event of a negotiation for peace; they are, in the mean time, of injury to us rather than advantage. The present disastrous circumstances in which our own West-India Islands are placed, arises from the great accessions to our West-India cultivation, which have, during late years, been made in consequence of the possession of the ceded Islands. More produce has by this means been raised than could well be disposed of; and the price, by consequence, has sunk so low, that the planter is not indemnified for his expence, and has suffered so deeply, that he already totters on the brink of ruin. From the Danish Islands an additional supply will be poured into the market, and will aggravate all the existing evils.

Ministers have settled a new plan for the issuing of Exchequer Bills, by which the commission will be saved, as well as an easy accommodation given to the public. They are to be issued at an office in the Bank, to bear 4 per cent. while out; but to be paid or exchanged at one day's notice at the office.

The Legislature of Jamaica have resolved, that the Commissioners of Correspondence be directed to instruct their Agent to apply to his Britannic Majesty's Ministers, in the event of a war between Great-Britain and the United States of America, that such measures may be taken as will enable the Governor and Lieutenant-Governor of that Island to grant licences to vessels of the United States, trading with the articles they are now permitted to bring to, and take from Jamaica, in a manner similar to the existing licensed trade between his Majesty's West India dominions and the enemies' colonies, under the provisions of the present Free Port Law.

By advices from Boston, dated the 18th ult. we cannot find that Mr. Rose had yet landed; but it states that "some blunders at Norfolk had prevented him landing, till he had assurances of being received with hospitality. These assurances have been sent from Washington, where Mr. Rose was expected about the 8th or 9th ult."—It should seem as if some difficulties had been purposely thrown in the way of his landing.—Mr. Randolph directed the attention of the House of Representatives, on the 4th ult. to his impeachment of General Wilkinson, which had been fixed for that day.—A debate of six hours ensued; various motions were made; one to reject the resolution. But a motion to adjourn was at length carried.

Disputes of a very violent nature have taken place in the American Congress. Mr. Randolph is said to have denounced General Wilkinson as a Spanish pensioner. The General has challenged his accuser, but the latter refuses to fight until the former has cleared his character.

Advices from Gibraltar of the 7th ult. arrived on Thursday, by which we learn that 120,000 French and Spanish troops are on their march against that place, and that 200 gun-boats were destined to co-operate in the attack.

Private accounts from the Continent represent the kingdom of Naples as in a state of anarchy; and that several persons had been convicted of conspiring to overthrow the Government, and assassinate King Joseph Bonaparte. An open attempt upon his person, it is added, was lately made in the open face of day, within a few miles of Naples. A party of men surrounded his carriage, and fired at him without effect. They were resolutely opposed by Joseph's guards, who, with the loss of fifteen men, succeeded in frustrating the attempt of the assailants.

The trial of General Whitelocke has been continued during the whole week. The whole time has been consumed in the examination of witnesses. As the principal part of the evidence is now taken, a few days more will probably bring this extraordinary trial to a termination.

So severe was the weather on Friday night, the snow so deep, the wind so violent, that not half of the inland mails had arrived when this Paper was put to press. The Post-Office will be kept open this day, for the purpose of distributing the letters as the mails arrive; they must, however, be applied for at the General Post-Office.

Sunday morning a duel was fought on Danbury Common, between Lieutenants O——e and M——n, both of the 43d foot, which was attended with fatal consequences to the former, who received a ball through the body on the first fire, and expired on the spot. This melancholy circumstance originated in a dispute at the mess, on the preceding evening. Lieut. M. and the seconds have absconded.

Happy Escape.—On Thursday night last, the Countess of Clare returned to her house in Saville-row, about twelve o'clock, after passing the evening with Lord and Lady Fitzgibbon, her son and daughter; shortly after which her Ladyship retired to her apartments, which are situated in the back part of the house. About two o'clock, she was greatly alarmed by the cracking of the roof of the house; shortly after a large stack of chimnies were blown down by the high wind, which forced in part of the roof and the ceiling of her Ladyship's bed-room, when near a ton of bricks, together with the ceiling, fell in, and literally buried her Ladyship. In this perilous situation she remained till after four o'clock, when she was released by her domestics. —The whole of the back roof, together with the skylight of her Ladyship's back drawing-room, are completely demolished. We are happy to state that her Ladyship did not sustain any material injury, and was able on Friday to receive the visits of her private friends.

Wednesday, at two o'clock, His Majesty held a private Levee at the Queen's Palace, when the following had the honour of being presented to His Majesty:

Argyle Street Rooms.—On Thursday evening, these rooms were opened on the new Establishment, combining a Theatre, with rooms for Cards, Dancing, &c. The Entrance Hall is elegantly decorated; the walls painted in fresco, and divided into compartments by Corinthian Pillars, with a basement in imitation of Verd antique, and illuminated by a superb Grecian Lamp. At the upper end are crimson folding doors, which open to a vestibule, leading to the staircase, covered with scarlet cloth, over which is a rich carpet with border à la grec.—From this we pass into the Turkish room, the floor of which is co-pery, and elegant Ottomans are placed round the room. On the left of this is the Saloon, fitted up as a Theatre, one hundred feet in length, and supposed equal to any thing of the kind in Europe, from its extent and the elegant propriety of its ornaments. The walls are decorated with the most classical specimens of architecture, interspersed with basso relievos taken from Telemachus; the general effect is heightened by gilding and other ornaments of the chastest design. At the upper end are twenty boxes, lightly, and appropriately fitted up for the Patronesses and their friends; and at the lower end is a small Stage, with brilliant scenery, whilst the toute ensemble, affords every convenience for the numerous and fashionable assemblage. This Meeting was by invitation, and intended for Colonel Greville's friends; the party was large, and the entertainments consisted of music, songs, &c. by Signor and Signora Miartani, and in our musical world, Bianchi, Siboni, Lanza, &c.

PANTHEON MASQUERADE.---On Thursday evening the masked and motley votaries of pleasure, had their carnival at this once elegant Abode of Fashion. The reduced prices of this species of entertainment produced such a melange of nobility and mobility, that we were almost tempted to believe, that the ballad-singers and watchmen, were really from the purlieus of Grub-street, and St. Giles's, though they were not the best characters at the Masquerade. Fun, mirth, and hilarity were the order of the evening; here were High-German doctors, without degrees, and quack-doctors with them; nuns without chastity, and Methodist parsons really fond of the spirit, very few punchinellos, devils, or flower-girls, and but one solitary Harlequin.

It was at first supposed the Court of Portugal intended to get up Two Faces under a Hood; however, by particular desire, they were induced to change it for the Regent: the English Fleet next appeared with universal applause; this was followed by the Tempest, and it is expected the season will close with Abroad and at Home. They now intend to perform on a new theatre, as the old one, where they were only tenants at will, has been taken over their heads, by a grasping manager, who has contrived to get possession of most of the country theatres; here, however, as all the scenery and decorations are removed, he finds nothing but empty benches.

A young orator (of great abilities in his own opinion) having thought proper in the course of his oration, to reflect rather severely on Mr. Sheridan—he immediately replied, "that notwithstanding the sarcasms uttered against himself, he should be unwilling to deny the merit of the infant statesman:" in his attempts at fancy, (continued the wit) I recognize the solidity of his judgment, and in his exposition of facts, I am amazed at the flights of his imagination!!!

A Gentleman descanting on the troubles in Ireland some time ago, in presence of an Irishman, rather of the lower class, attributed them chiefly to the number of pretended Patriots which were tolerated in the country.—"Oh, don't believe a word of it, your honour," exclaimed the honest Hibernian, "I know every Pat in the Island, and damn the Pat-riot there's in it."

Madame Bonaparte has been compared to a Bill of Exchange, drawn by Barras, endorsed by Cambaceres, and accepted by Bonaparte. It appears now, she has long been noted, and is at length to be protested, as the acceptor has closed business, on the old account, and means to begin on a new score.

The following curious anagram on Napoleon Bonaparte, not being generally known, is worthy notice:

Bona rapta pone Leno—which expresses, even to a letter, "you rascal! lay down the stolen goods."

Mr. Grattan dined a few days hence with a large party of the oppositionists; when called on for a song, it is said he gave "good night and joy be wi ye all."

DRURY LANE.

As a set off to the novelty at Covent-Garden, Old Drury came forward, on Thursday Evening, with an Opera, in four Acts, called, Kais, or Love in a Desert, in which, whether we regard the performers, or the numerous choruses, we may say the whole strength of the House was engaged.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Amri, an Emir, Father to Leila	Mr. Raymond.
Ahmed, an Arabian Elder, Father to Kais	Mr. Powell.
Kais	Mr. Braham.
Almanzor, Page to Kais	Miss Lyon.
Almoran, a Circassian, beloved by Rozella	Mr. Bannister.
Rashed, an old Slave of the Emir's	Mr. Matthews.
Salem, an Officer of the Emir, in Love with Leila	Mr. Kelly.
Prince of Egypt	Mr. Putnam.
Osmar, Hassan, Hali, — Arab Chiefs	Mr. Smith. Mr. Dignum. Mr. Cooke.
Leila	Mrs. Mountain.
Rozella, a Greek, kidnapped from Circassia	Signora Storace.
An Old Slave	Miss Tidswell.

The story, for we cannot call it a plot, is evidently taken from a modern popular work of Eastern Tales; and has so little in it, really interesting, that it was only by the introduction of pageants, processions, camels, and coffee-drinkers, together with some long ballads, totally unconnected with the piece, that it could possibly be wiredrawn through four long acts.

Kais, the hero, is the son of Ahmed, an Arabian Chief, whose Tribe is encamped near the city of Cairo, and he, of course, becomes enamoured of Leila, daughter of a Turkish or Egyptian Emir, who, of course, intends his fair daughter for Salem, an old fellow, with a long beard, &c. &c.

Kais in the disguise of a Dervise, as it is called, but which might have passed very well as a Domino, at the Masquerade, endeavours to obtain an interview with his beloved, when they are discovered by Amri, and in the contest Amri strikes Kais. This, the latter would have avenged with his poniard, till requested by Leila not to kill her father; he then tells her he can no longer associate with his military companions, and, therefore, will wish her good morning, and retire to the Desert, to lament his dishonour. All this is done with much warlike pomp, and the gentle Leila is seized by a band of strapping fellows, with long pikes, as if, like the King of Brentford, she had got an army in her pocket.

As an assignation is nothing without a confidant, Kais is assisted in his interview by Rosella, a Circassian slave, stolen from her father's cottage, and followed into Egypt by Almoran, under the name of Marvellous, who, it appears, keeps a coffee shed, where he retails out coffee and long stories, to a number of light, airy, skipping, good humoured young Turks; all, of course, very natural and very appropriate!

Rosella, to be on a par with her mistress, has not only a young Lover, but also an old one, Rashed, with whom she undergoes a very amorous tête-à-tête, assisted by a spinning wheel, whose evolutions and accidents are a kind of accompaniment to her song. Those who have visited the countries of the East, may perhaps enquire how long it is since the spinning wheel has superseded the use of the distaff; whilst those not conversant with Eastern customs, might naturally expect a second edition of

"Somehow, my spindle I mislaid."—

Almoran, meeting with Almanzor, the Page of Kais, is informed of Rosella being a slave at Cairo, he therefore attempts to gain an interview with her in the disguise of a peripatetic perfumer, and at last discovers her coming out of a Mosque: a place, by the bye, where the Mahometans are not very fond of admitting the Ladies, as they imagine that those who have no souls, have nothing to do with religion.

We are now presented with a view of Leila and Rosella enjoying themselves by moon-light, when a distant voice, in a soft warbling tone, tells them that Kais is gone to the desart, whither Miss Leila resolves to follow him. She sets off on foot, in a dress which, she was obliging enough to inform us, is a pilgrim's habit, and on her way, meeting with Achmet the father of her lover, intreats his assistance in her search. The old man very kindly asks her into his hut, and walks in himself, when Miss, though in a violent hurry to talk of her lover, stops at the door to give us a song.

Almoran and Rosella having escaped together, join the Ca-swan for Mecca, though why they should go to Mecca in their way to Circassia, is left to the audience to find out. They meet, as usual, with the plundering Arabs, by whom they are robbed and separated, and Leila and Ahmed soon meet the same fate:—at the moment the robbers have seized upon Lila, Almoran steps in and ransoms her, with a jewel worth many sequins, although he had been robbed and stripped but a few minutes before.

Kaid is next seen amongst rocks, sphynxes and blasted trees, where he talks much, and sings more about dying, &c. He is at last traced by his faithful Almanzor; and after some time, a meeting takes place between the two fathers, who rail at each other through a long dialogue. when just as they are drawing their scimetars, the Prince of Egypt steps in and reconciles them. —Different parties are sent in pursuit of the wanderers, who go through several scenes of hide-and-seek, in the Desart, when a party of soldiers arrives, headed by an officer, who seemed quite out of breath, whilst he informed them that he was sent to bring them to Papa.

Quick as thought, or as a telegraphic dispatch, they return to Cairo, which is brilliantly illuminated on the occasion, and, as the old story goes, "all ends happily.".

Such is the outline of the Opera, on which a great expence has been incurred in scenery; yet, however brilliant this was, it was nevertheless disgusting to those at all acquainted with Egyptian or Desart Landscape. In one scene, we have the volcanic mountains and larch trees, of the North-west American Coast; in another, are masses of rocks, cold enough to represent the icebergs of Greenland.

The music, in general, seemed much admired, though some officious friends, by their early and obstinate encores, gave disgust to the audience in general. A song, which Almoran was forced to sing, having a drawn scimetar hung over him, seemed to afford much amusement, though Bannister slyly observed, that he had never sung before to that instrument.

When fame is so long, and perhaps so well established as Mr. Braham's, both for execution and composition, it might seem presumptuous to find fault; yet, as there is something so incongruous in general between the cadence of the songs as read, and the pauses and starts of his finer flourishes, it might be as well if the authors would set their songs to his music, instead of his manufacturing music for their songs. In his very first air, fancy runs over the ear in a single crotchet, whilst the next word, of one syllable, has nearly as many attendant notes as the Prince of Egypt had guards.

The Opera was given out for the next evening, amidst the mixed clamour of applause and hisses.

COVENT GARDEN.

Tuesday evening presented us with a new Comedy, in which there was so much said about novelty and originality, that we despaired, in a very early stage of the performance, of finding either the one, or the other.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Lord Blushdale,.....Mr. Fawcett.
Sir Arthur St. Albyn, ...Mr. Pope.
Algernon St. Albyn, (his son), ...Mr. C. Kemble.
Captain Modern,.....Mr. Lewis.
Solace,.....Mr. Emery.
Danvers,.....Mr. Brunton.
Legis,.....Mr. Creswell.
Geoffry,.....Mr. Simmons.
Selina, (Sir Arthur's niece and ward)....Miss Smith.
Cicely,.....Miss Norton.
Deborah, (housekeeper to Lord Blushdale, Mrs. Davenport.

A dull Prologue, most solemnly delivered by Mr. Brunton, promised us a real, genuine British article, and not as in general "meat as imported;" closing with a deprecation of early censure, and a request to hear it out with patience. Honest John listened to this request with his usual good humour, but his patience was nearly exhausted by the long interval between the Prologue and the opening; another circumstance, most certainly an indecorous one, tended, in some degree, to excite disapprobation. The Proscenium, or Drop Scene, like the invisible petticoats, being rather too short, displayed the legs, not only of the Performers, but also of a table and chairs: and a wag in the Pit, from the very social manner, in which they were assembled, enquired if that was the first Act of "Begone Dull Care!"

We shall now attempt, slightly, to delineate the Plot of Begone Dull Care: or, How Will It End?—A Welch Baronet, Sir Arthur St. Albyn, appears to be greatly embarrassed by debts, arising from dissipation, from which he had expected to be relieved by inheriting the wealth of a deceased brother; but this having been bequeathed to Algernon, his only son, he suspects the young man, of having prejudiced him, unfairly, in his brother's esteem. To guard, however, against the probable consequences of his imprudence, he comes down to St. Albyn Castle, in order to persuade, or even force, his niece Selina, over whose fortune he had controul, to marry his Friend Mr. Danvers. the nephew of Lord Blushdale, but a needy dissipated villain. He now binds himself by a bond to bring about the marriage, and admit Danvers as a partner in his copper-mines, on condition of Lord Blushdale giving up a bond of £6,000.

Algernon being at Bath, a letter arrives from him to Sir Arthur, in which he acknowledges having been married to Selina, some months back; and Sir Arthur having notified to Solace, the Superintendant of his Works, that he meant to admit Danvers as a partner, Solace feels himself so much hurt, by the previous insolence of Danvers, and by his subsequent attempt to injure him in Sir Arthur's opinion, that he endeavours, by persuasion, to prevent the partnership taking place; and is at length unwillingly obliged to produce a deed given him by the late Sir Arthur, who, apprehensive of his son's extravagance and improper connections, involving him in difficulties, had taken this measure of precaution, allowing Solace a share of the profits, and nominating him as a future partner, as a reward for his honest and industrious superintendance.

Selina is now obliged to leave the Castle, and take shelter in the friendly Cottage of Solace; but previous to this, Cicely, an orphan, protected, educated, and beloved by Solace, arrives from a Boarding School near Bath, much in love, but with whom does not appear, until her agitation at being informed of Algernon's marriage induce us to suspect that he had seduced her. Cicely in despair, resolves to leave the cottage of her protector, and on her way to London, is obliged, at the close of day, to ask shelter from an old servant of Lord Blushdales, who, not having room in her own little habitation, puts her into an uninhabited house of his Lordship's in which he had resided, as a plain country squire, previous to inheriting his title. His Lordship sick of fashion, high life, and place hunters, arrives unexpectedly, and much equivoque ensues, which affords two or three instances of good stage effect.

Danvers, foiled in his schemes with St. Albyn, now waits upon his uncle, and proposes some unhandsome measures towards his friend; but the honest Peer, disdaining to comply, Danvers threatens to deprive him of his estate and title, by bringing forward the lawful heir, Capt. Modern, who had been supposed to be the illegitimate son of the late Lord. Modern having slipped into the apartment during this conversation, conceals himself, until, at a fit opportunity, he possesses himself of the certificate of his mother's marriage; and the supposed Peer, convinced of his claim, instantly and most joyously resigns his title to him, accompanied by a number of letters addressed to "Lord Blushdale," consisting of a challenge, a Call of the House, applications for patronage, &c.

The disappointed Danvers retires; and Algernon, who arrives from Bath, having on that day come of age, presents his uncle's estates to his father, and a reconciliation takes place. Cicely, who had set off in the morning to continue her journey, is now brought back, in consequence of an offered reward, and Selina confesses that her marriage with Algernon was a hoax, in order to avoid the union with Danvers, when Cicely is introduced and united to her lover. Selina then bestows her hand on the true Lord Blushdale, and the piece concludes with a hope that the audience will enable the author to say, "Begone dull Care."

Such is the outline of a piece, which certainly had a very fair trial, and which evidently escaped some hisses in the two first acts, from the respect of the audience for the performers, who most certainly, in general, did every thing possible for its success.

An Epilogue, containing some good points, was well spoken by Miss Smith; but as it also contained many apologies for imitation, we must not be too severe on the author, for want of originality.—In some parts, the piece bears resemblance to Anna, or the Welch Heiress. Herbert, the father, is personified by Sir Arthur, and the love of Solace, for the orphan, is evidently the counterpart of Wilkinson and Anna Mansel. It may appear invidious to trace imitation much further, but we must nevertheless confess, that all the bustle and incident, of which there is a sufficiency in the two last acts, has often appeared before; but it is indeed futile now to expect originality in this respect, as every possible incident that can be produced by screens, sofas, trapdoors, and chimney corners, has been already brought into play.

There are some parts which brought down well-deserved plaudits, particularly in the scene where Emery in Solace, in defence of his honesty, after some severe taunts from Sir Arthur, produced the deed, executed in his favour by the late Baronet; Sir Arthur having haughtily demanded, "Why was not this produced before?" he emphatically retorts, "Why was it produced now?"—We cannot avoid noticing the quaint attempts at wit, which often degenerated into puns, some of which, we hope, the public will be excused from listening to in future; particularly where Lewis, in Modern, expresses his dislike for novels; as arising from his love of novelty; and also where Solace talks of having got tipsy, and being liable to a fine, for moving Wine, without a Permit, beyond the quantity allowed by the Excise.

It also deserves notice, that Algernon, the hero of the piece, did not appear, until the last Act; this, perhaps, was in imitation of Terence, in his "Fair Andrian," where Glycerium the Heroine, is never seen, but is heard, by the audience and the old fathers, crying out for assistance, on a very interesting occasion, to Juno Lucina, the patroness of ladies in the straw.

To analyse each Actor's exertions, would be beyond our limits, and where all did well, to notice one or two might appear invidious; but it is not mal à propos to observe, that Miss Smith's character will, perhaps, be better liked, when the plot is understood, as on the first representation it appeared rather disgusting to see the supposed Wife of Algernon, coquetting with Capt. Modern, and suffering him to kiss her hand, &c.

There was another actress, whose general mode of acting and evident efforts to please, ought always to screen her from illiberal censure; but we hope she will not be offended at a friendly hint, that, although a frequent extension and even violent action of the arms, may be allowable in tragedy, yet it is rather unnatural in the simple Country Girl, the protegée of a cottage, notwithstanding she was just come from a Boarding School.

Upon the whole, our general opinion is in favour of this piece, yet we strongly recommend much curtailment, particularly in the two first Acts, where the action seems to hang very much; and also in the common-place puns, and sentimental clap-traps: otherwise the author's attempt at wit, upon the Parliamentary Debates may be turned upon himself; and we may be tempted to congratulate ourselves, "that although forced to hear, it is fortunate that we are not obliged to read."

FINE ARTS.

BRITISH INSTITUTION.

We are happy to announce the re-opening of this truly patriotic and useful Institution, for its original purpose, under a most brilliant Patronage, and with a brilliant display of British taste and genius. Our limits will not allow us to notice every work of excellence; we shall, however, from time to time, present a few to our Readers, with observations, in which it shall be our study, that candour shall walk hand in hand with the necessary severity of critical censure. The Paintings of this year, amounting to 400, are, in general, Landscapes, with the usual sprinkling of sea, and fancy pieces; the historical specimens are but few, and we never recollect at any former Exhibition such a number of candle-light subjects.

No. 33.—Hercules resting from his labour. J. F. RIGAUD, R. A.

As the most remarkable trait in the character of Hercules was his strength, and the most interesting incidents in his poetical life, arose from his almost miraculous exercise of it, we are rather surprised that the artist should have chosen to represent him in a state of repose—it is as unnatural as representing a war-horse asleep, or a frozen catarach. In this composition, consisting only of Hercules and his Club, the pyramidal outline, and the anatomical filling up, are well preserved, yet there is a cold sameness of colouring, like a work done in bistre, which though it produces relief, yet, from the want of contrast in the lights and shades, presents to the mind the idea of a bronze basso relievo, rather than a painting. In other respects, the expression of the countenance, and the lassitude and relaxation of the muscles, admirably denote a state of repose, whilst the foreshortening of the right thigh shews an intimate acquaintance with anatomical perspective.

No. 224.—Sea-Storm—Sun-Set. J. POCOCK.

The well-earned fame of Mr. Pocock, as a Marine Painter, will always induce us to turn to his performances, with an almost certainty of gratification, and in this effort of his pencil we were not disappointed. The surf breaking on the beach seems evidently copied from nature, and not as we are often forced to witness it, as if the Artist had formed his ideas from a storm in a washing-tub!—The effect produced by the Setting-Sun, gives a pleasing glow to the fore-ground, and marks that chequered obscurity in the distance, so characteristic of an evening gale, when the anxious Mariner watches the declining Sun, doomed, perhaps, to see him rise no more.

With such acknowledged skill as Mr. Pocock possesses in this line of painting, we cannot but feel regret when he turns his attention with less effect to other subjects. This observation is drawn from us by No. 358—A Landscape and Banditti—in which there is a tame, uninteresting accuracy of outline, rendered even more displeasing by an affected contrast in the colouring. The distant mountains have a darkness of purple which nature never gives, whilst the trees and rocks in the fore-grounds, are marked with a general smoothness and equality of brownish tint, that destroy the effects, and is by no means consonant to aerial perspective.

No. 471.—Gulliver describing Fortification to Horses. S. GILPIN. R. A.

As a Cattle Painter, Mr. Gilpin has often gained the meed of applause at former exhibitions, and in this piece, his Horses are certainly well grouped, and spiritedly executed as Horses; but were it not for the figure of Gulliver in a corner tracing out a square redoubt on the land, they might pass for English horses in a Park, as much as for the Houhnhyms of Swift.—There is something so bizarre, and beyond nature, in the original idea, that we can attend only to the satire contained in it; we are not surprised, therefore, if Mr. Gilpin has failed in his attempt to embody an idea on canvas, to which the most luxuriant fancy cannot give personifications, and where the expression of wonder or delight might as well arise from the sight of a good feed of corn, as from all the horn works and half-moons of a Pleydell, or a Vauban.

We looked round with anxious expectation for some specimens of Beechey's pencil, but were rather disappointed at finding only some pretty little Landscapes, with the exception of a Monk's Head, No. 329. In this there is much character and expression: the mixed tone of religious Hope and Resignation is well marked, the lights are well managed to aid the general effect, and there is nothing of that stiffness which might be expected from a pencil so much accustomed to Portrait painting.

We shall be happy in a future Number, to notice the numerous efforts of Miss Spilsbury's pencil, together with Westall, Thomson, Drummond, and a long etcetera.

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF CHANCERY, FEB. 12.

OPERA HOUSE.

Friday the Opera House disputes were again submitted to the consideration of the Lord Chancellor, and an application was made to enforce the late award of the Marquis of Headfort and Mr. Ogilvy, subject to the temperage of the Duke of Bedford. The case was stated at great length by Messrs. Fonblanque, Hart, and Johnson, and the old topics of Catalani's enormous salary, the discharge of the Treasurer and Sub-Treasurer, and the misapplication of the funds on the part of Mr. Taylor, were again urged; when the Chancellor observed, that he would hear the other side next week. In the course of the proceedings his Lorship also observed, that it was next kin to madness to submit the disputes in question to the Court. He could do nothing unless all the parties were before him, and in that case it would probably involve the concern in utter ruin.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, WESTMINSTER, FEB. 8.

FRAUD.

William Tucker was brought up from Exeter to plead to an indictment, charging him with feloniously and fraudulently cutting off a stamp from one piece of paper that had served its purpose, and affixing it to another, whereon the contents had not been executed, with a view to defraud the Revenue.—The defendant pleaded Not Guilty.—The trial was fixed for the next Devon Assizes, and, in the mean time, the defendant stands committed.

to a resolution, on a conference with the Judges of the othe Courts, to lay down a new rule with respect to holding bail in Actions of Trover; they therefore were of opinion, and made it a rule accordingly, that no person should be held to bail in an Action of Trover, without an order for that purpose from one of the Judges of the Court.

PORT NEWS.

PLYMOUTH, FEB. 9.—Letters received from the Amethyst, 36 gun, Capt. Seymour, dated at sea some days since, state her being all well at that period, and that a day after he had parted the Emerald, 36 guns, Capt. Maitland, he fell in with L'Irene, 40 gun, and Ethalion, French frigates, which had escaped from St. Maloes, apparently full of troops, and kept in sight of them for two days, in hopes of falling in with one or other of our cruizers, when he would immediately have attacked them. On the third night Capt. S. lost them, and the day afterwards had the mortification to fall in with the Shannon, 36 guns, Capt. Blake, which arrived here last Sunday. Had not the French frigates altered their course, there is no doubt, from the well-known gallantry of Capt. Seymour, and Capt. Blake, with their officers and ship's company, but they would have brought them both into this port as prizes.

MARGATE, FEB. 12.—Last night and this day it has blown a gale from the North West. The schooner Lucy and Alida, Captain Cummings, from the Coast of Africa, for London, was driven on shore in Marsh Bay. A brig with yellow sides, in ballast, was driven onshore near Kingsgate. A gun-brig is riding very close in-shore, with her main-mast gone, and it is feared will strike at low water. A ship, supposed to be an American, is riding in Westgate Bay, with only her foremast standing. Another ship is also lying there, entirely dismasted.

DEAL, FEB. 12.—Sailed through the Downs the Lord Nelson East Indiaman, for Portsmouth. All this day it has blown a gale of wind from the northward, attended with snow. Most of the outward-bound vessels in the Downs have parted from their cables, and gone to the westward. Two vessels are riding in the Downs dismasted; one of them a transport, No. 321 or 334.

THE LATE MARQUIS OF THOMOND

Was of a most ancient and respectable Irish Family. He was nephew and heir to the late Earl of Inchiquin, whose title he bore for many years. So long since as 1753, he married Mary, the eldest daughter of the late Earl, who, on the demise of her mother, became Countess of Orkney. By this Lady he had no Children. His Lordship was celebrated rather as a bon vivant than a fashionable, and for many years had the reputation of being a six bottle man. For many years he had a seat in the British House of Commons, as well after as before his accession to the Irish Earldom of Inchiquin. About the year 1794, he was married (his first Lady being dead several years) to Miss Palmer, the amiable and accomplished neice of Sir Joshua Reynolds, the bulk of whose fortune she inherited: Mr. Burke acted as father to the bride. In 1804, he was created Marquis of Thomond in Ireland, and shortly after made a Peer of the United Kingdom by the title of Baron Thomond. His Lordship was in his 85th year, and to his last hour enjoyed a most enviable state of health. His Irish titles and estates, which are considerable, descend, we believe, to Captain O'Brien, a very near relative. By his Lordship's demise, an azure ribbon, of the Order of St. Patrick, falls to the disposal of Ministers.

A Coroner's Inquest was on Thursday held on the body of the deceased, when it appeared in evidence that his Lordship met his death by a fall from his horse, while turning the corner of Grosvenor-square. He fell upon his head, and a great effusion of blood immediately took place. His Lordship's groom rode up to the assistance of his master, who laid hold of his hand, and grasping it firmly, cried out—"William, William." These were the only words he uttered after his fall. He was taken to the house of Lord Sydney, where he expired in a few minutes. As his Lordship fell, a cart came up, the wheels of which went over his legs; but it was proved that this did not produce his death. Coroner's verdict—Accidental Death.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

FIRE.—The fire which broke out at Mr. Nichols's Printing-office, Red-lion-passage, Fleet-street, broke out at ten on Monday night, and continued burning until four the next morning.—There is no certainty as to the manner in which it originated, more than that it is generally supposed to have begun from a snuff of a candle having been dropped in the ware-room. The whole of that very extensive concern is consumed, and valuable works that have been accumulating for many years have been entirely lost. It is said that Messrs. Nichols and Son were insured to a considerable amount, but by no means equal to cover their loss. There is a remarkable circumstance related, which is as follows:—A servant girl was in the kitchen, almost suffocated with the smoke, and unable, through terror and deprivation of breath, to move; a fireman discovered it, broke open the window, and at the risk of his own life saved the girl's.

The well-known character James George Semple Lisle, commonly called Major Semple, has again been apprehended for having, under false pretences, obtained money from Mary Burroughs, who some time ago advertised in one of the Daily Papers for a situation, as a nursery-maid; the Major had in consequence thereof applied to her, informing her that his name was George Smith, Esq. of Roehampton, and that he was in want of a servant of her description; this being the case she readily accepted of his offer; it was agreed upon, that in the course of a day or two he should call upon her, and inform her when she might go down to his residence. The Major, when about to leave her, said, that he unfortunately had left his purse at home, and, as he would see her shortly, requested the loan of a few shillings, but she having no silver, offered him a seven shilling piece, which he took, faithfully promising to return it her at the next meeting, since which she had never heard from him, or seen him, till the day of his apprehension, and then met him in St. James's-street, from whence she watched him to his abode, and had him apprehended. The Complainant, however, not appearing to substantiate the charge, the Major was dismissed.

MARRIED,

On the 11th instant, at St. Andrew's, Holborn, Mr. Charles Coutts, of New-street-square, to Miss Isabella Langford, of Wandsworth, Surrey.

DIED.

Suddenly, on the 2d of February, at Bassenthwaite Hawes, near Keswick, Cumberland, Mr. Joseph Bell, at an advanced age—his remains were interred in Bassenthwaite church-yard, attended by two sons and a daughter, a considerable concourse of people from the surrounding villages, assembled to pay the last tribute of respect to one who always resided amongst them, and always had been distinguished, not less by the practice of domestic and social virtues, than by the constant exercise of real benevolence and well-directed charity.

NUMBER EIGHT.

HIS MAJESTY'S DONATION

OF CERTAIN SUMS OUT OF THE DROITS OF THE ADMIRALTY, TO THE JUNIOR PRINCES.

It has been lately made known to the Public that a gift of 10,000*l.* has been conferred by the King upon each of his sons except the Prince of Wales, and that a similar sum was given some time ago to the late Duke of Gloucester. The fund from which these donations were made is a branch of the ancient hereditary revenue of the crown, consisting of a certain portion of the captures made by his Majesty's ships of war, called Droits of Admiralty; and of the property captured from any Foreign nation, previous to a Declaration of War, known by the name of Jura Coronæ.

These hard names are useless and worse than useless; for they have a tendency to convey absurd ideas. In plain English, they mean neither more nor less than perquisites of the Crown, and the case is exactly the same in kind with the perquisites of any other office. In regard to the first class of these perquisites, the Droits of Admiralty, certain arrangements were formed some time ago, which left but a slender portion of them at the disposal of the King. The other class, however, are in a different situation, and have remained hitherto exempt from all control and regulation. The eventful contest with the French revolution in which we have been engaged, is distinguished in a very peculiar manner by the vast quantities of property which this country has seized from other nations antecedent to a declaration of war. This immense property, fallen into the hands of the King, has at last attracted some share of public attention, and is about to undergo a Parliamentary Investigation. The decision of Parliament we have no wish to anticipate. But there is an error into which the Public have very generally fallen, which implies real injustice to the high Parties concerned, and which we are anxious to rectify.

It is very evident that the great question, which is before Parliament, respects the policy of attaching this species of revenue to the Crown, not the purposes to which it may have pleased the King to apply it, while the Legislature left it at his disposal. But distinct as these questions appear to be, the Public are very apt to confound them together; and by a kind of hasty and negligent confusion seem to think that whatever doubts may exist in regard to the expediency of having this branch of the Royal revenue in its present state, the same apply to the Donation which has been lately made of part of this revenue to the Junior Princes. By this means a species of odium has been excited against this peculiar application of that property which does not justly belong to it. It is no more but fair that the two questions should be decided on their respective merits. This the Princes have a right to expect, and it will be unjust in the Public not to gratify their expectation.

In regard to the first question, it is no doubt competent to Parliament to examine this source of income to the Crown, and if it discovers that between it and the important principles of the constitution any incongruity exists, to pass a bill for placing this affair in a new arrangement, which, with the consent of His Majesty will pass into a law. It may appear, upon examination, and of this Parliament is the proper judge, that the property which may thus accrue to the Crown, and over which Parliament has no direct controul, has become too large, and is no longer consistent with the vital principles of the British constitution. No principle of that constitution is more essential than that Parliament should hold the purse-strings of the nation, and completely controul the national income and expenditure. But this it cannot do, if the Crown, by any means whatever, become possessed of a great revenue, which is altogether independent of Parliament. Whether this class of the perquisites of the Crown ought to be regarded in this light, it would be absurd in us to pretend as yet to give an opinion. Of this a judgment can be formed, only after their present amount, and that which it is likely to prove in future, are known. The papers which are to be laid before Parliament, will afford the requisite information, and then Parliament and the public will form their conclusions.

But the point to which we wish at present to direct the attention of our readers, is the application which has been made of part of this revenue to the Princes, the younger sons of his Majesty, and to the late Duke of Gloucester. It is evident that this is by no means connected with the great constitutional question before Parliament, whether this revenue should remain at the disposal of the Crown. No one doubts that it did by law belong to the King at the time when he made this application of part of it, in gratification of his paternal feelings. No one can doubt that whatever accrued to the King, by this source, was as much his property as the dividends upon his stock, which his Majesty draws at the Bank. But that property which was unquestionably the King's, it must be absurd to say, that the King had not a right to bestow upon his Family. If it be necessary that a new arrangement, respecting this source of revenue, should take place, be it so. With this question at present we forbear to interfere. But while it remained a source of revenue to the Crown, and while the King remained, by law, its sole and absolute master, it is impossible that any question about his right to bestow a part of it upon his sons can exist.

If it be made a question, whether this Donation was wise, and expedient; or whether, in the present overburthened State of the Nation, the money should not have been applied to alleviate the pressure upon the people, we readily answer, that the alleviation of the national burthens ought to come from the Legislature not from the King. The greatest possible economy should be observed in the use of the public money, and the utmost tenderness in laying new impositions. No man who understands the principles of the Constitution, would wish to see the public burthens relieved by donations from the Crown, because no man would wish to see in its possession more than is requisite for its own fair and legitimate expences.

Besides, how small is the portion of what this source of revenue has lately produced, which has been bestowed upon the Princes? His Majesty has applied from this fund, towards the expences of the State, first, one million, and then another. This is all which his Ministers advised him to appropriate in this manner. Is it to be condemned that he was pleased to ameliorate the circumstances of his sons with the remainder? Would it have been in any degree better employed had it been used in purchasing more stock for his Majesty? Would it have been a more salutary application, had it been employed in bribing the Members of Parliament to consent to a vote of a fair thousands a-year in addition to the present revenue of the Princes. In this view of the subject, the grant to their Royal Highnesses may even be regarded as a saving to the nation. How natural is it for other parents to gratify their feelings by imparting the circumstances of their good fortune to their family? How cruel would it be to deprive a good father of this gratification because he is a King? True it is that the circumstances of th people require amelioration. But the comparative trifle which was bestowed upon the Princes, would have feebly operated toward this mighty object.

But the injustice and indelicacy of the complaints, which have been raised on this subject, are not apparent from these considerations alone. When we compare the revenue, which is enjoyed by the junior male branches of the Royal Family, with the incomes of a great proportion of our Nobility, and even of our Gentry, we shall find that it is far from exorbitant. It is not in the first, it is, perhaps, not even in the second, rank of the revenues which are enjoyed by the leading men of the country. Their rank, however, is the highest of all; and, by the received ideas of our country, it is understood and expected, that expence should keep pace with rank. A great expence, therefore, is not so much a matter of choice with the Princes, as a matter of necessity. No economy on their part could enable them to prevent it. In all public subscriptions, for objects of charity, or of utility, it is expected that the British Princes shall take the lead, and both in the frequency and the magnitude of their donations, give an example to the rest of the community. It is not computed how large a deduction is made from their receipts in the course of a year on this sole account. From all these considerations, it does appear illiberal to criticise, with severity, the paternal generosity of his Majesty on the present occasion. Were it not for the sacrifices which the people are obliged to make, in the maintenance of an arduous contest; were the country in the full enjoyment of peace, and of the blessings, and riches, which it bestows, it would be far more becoming a liberal Nation, joyfully to welcome the proposition of an increased revenue to the Sons of their Sovereign. This, indeed, we are fully convinced would be the case; and were the productive powers of peace enjoyed, for but a few years, we have not a doubt, that a revenue, corresponding with the improved circumstances of the country, would be readily granted to the Princes.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE DOCTRINE OF MR. CANNING,

That the Conferences between Crowned Heads and Ambassadors should not be laid before Parliament.

On a Motion made by Mr. Abercrombie, in the House of Commons, on Monday, the 15th inst. for the production of all the official communications, which were made by the Earls Rosslyn and St Vincent to the Prince Regent of Portugal, together with the answers, Mr. Canning maintained, that all Conferences between Crowned Heads and Diplomatic Ministers at their Courts, should be withheld from Parliament. "He was glad," he said, "that he now had an opportunity of "of making a stand against the practice of disclosing what "passed in confidence between a British Minister and a Foreign "Prince." The sense, in which this was understood by the House, appears, by the remarks of some of the opposite Speakers. Mr. Windham congratulated the House on a new defender of etiquette. Mr. Ponsonby said, "In the best times of "English history, the conduct of persons in the highest stations, "whether Prince or Minister, were openly, fairly, and boldly "discussed in Parliament; it was only at the most disgraceful "periods that we find great men have shrunk from their publicity; Parliament was too easily led, by confidence, in a great "name, or a high sounding title."

Mr. Canning defended his opinion, by stating, that this mode of diplomatic intercourse had become extremely common in Continental Europe. The diplomatic agents of France, he said, not contented with communications, in the ordinary and official channel, pushed their way, even into the closets of Princes, and obtained with them personal conferences. The Ministers of Great Britain, that they might not be treated as inferior, insisted upon similar privileges. It thus happened, that all the most important parts of diplomatic intercourse were included in those conferences. Kings and Emperors, however, would not submit to have their private communications divulged in our Parliaments and Newspapers; and would, for that reason, deny our Ambassadors that access to their persons, which they granted to those of other nations.

This doctrine, without doubt, was very unthinkingly advanced by Mr. Canning. It is opposed to the very office of Parliament. If all diplomatic intercourse, or the most important part of it, takes place in the closet or presence of Princes; and if it becomes a received principle, that what is transacted in the presence of Princes is not to be laid before Parliament, this is a scheme by which the communication to Parliament of this species of intelligence is entirely cut off. No elucidation of the diplomatic transactions of Government can any longer be received by the Legislature. Let Ministers act wisely or foolishly, virtuously or criminally in their intercourse with foreign nations, the power of Parliament to controul them is at an end. It is denied the proper information on which a judgment either of approbation or censure can be founded. What check upon misconduct would there remain? If it be difficult, with all the helps which can be devised, to bind public men to their duty, what ruin must ensue when the most important helps are voluntarily removed?

We were extremely happy to perceive, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer dissented from this doctrine of his colleague. It is not, therefore, a Ministerial doctrine. It was merely a hasty conclusion of Mr. Canning, in which the rest of the Ministry did not support him. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, "he did not go so far as his Right Hon. Friend. He ac- "knowledged it might be right sometimes to communicate to "Parliament even the conferences of Princes, but it ought to be "done, he thought, with caution."

Does not that depend, however, upon the kind of the conference? May there not be many conferences with Princes, in which public matters are discussed with candour and wisdom, and where no caution is necessary in regard to their communication? But the distinction between one kind of conference and another is equally necessary in respect to those of mere agents, as those of crowned heads themselves. There are many of the communications between the Ministers of different countries which could not with propriety be laid before the Public. In fact it is the nature of the communication, and not the person by whom it is made, that determines the propriety or the impropriety of making it public. If we speak of caution, we readily allow that caution is necessary in every part of public business; but we believe there are few occasions on which it is less necessary than in the communication of intelligence. Seldom, indeed, does it happen that any serious injury is sustained from that cause. It is on the other side that danger is most commonly found. Besides, we are confidently persuaded, that there are very few occasions on which a Prince could be offended by the communication of a conference of his own, on which he would not be equally offended by the communication of the conference of his Minister. What, on such an occasion, is the Minister, but the mouth of the Prince? What should offend the Prince in divulging his own conference, if not the disclosure of improper intelligence; but this indiscretion is equally injurious if incurred in respect to the conferences of his Minister as incurred in respect to those with himself.

AMINATION OF MR. COBBETT'S ATTACK ON MR. ROSCOE'S PAMPHLET.

"War," he says, "destroys ...e influence of which prevents these receptacles of ...of infamy, the sight of the interior of which is a ...more horrid than any thing which is the conse- ...ce of" Ah! Mr. Cobbett, war much more neces- sarily and certainly operates in destroying the bread of the poor than the luxuries of the great. It is the bread of the poor that it diminishes first; the luxuries of the great it reaches last of all; and then it generally happens that peace is procured.— But how comes it, Mr. Cobbett, that you ascribe such horrid effects to luxury, you who have been recommending to us with such zeal the doctrines of Mr. Spence, among which, in a most conspicuous place, stands the proposition, "that luxury is "conducive, nay absolutely necessary to the well being of "society?" Truly, if you have no reason for representing war as a good, but that it destroys the evils of society by destroying luxury, you venture a bold doctrine upon a feeble foundation. What! are the luxuries of this country diminished by the dreadful continuance and expenditure of the war in which we are engaged? Do we pay smaller salaries to our singers and players? Are our play-houses and opera-houses less numerously attended? Is the number of our routs and revels, of our livery servants, our coaches, and our horses, diminished? No! But who tells us that the number of quartern loaves which the labouring man can buy in a week is diminished? Mr. Cobbett! Who tells us that the number of paupers has tripled? Mr. Cobbett! Precious panegyrist of war!

Mr. Cobbett's next reason is thus stated, "That war makes "a part of the great scheme of the Creator is abundantly ob- "vious from the universal propensity of his creatures." This is pitiable! This is an observation which has been brought forward by some of the lowest of the infidels, as evincing a contrariety between the analogy of nature, and the great principle of the gospel. But it is a new strain of ignorance to find a man, who ostentatiously boasts himself a Christian, capable of maintaining an absurdity which contradicts the first principle of christianity. "Whence," says St. Paul, "come wars among "you? come they not hence; even of your lusts, which war "against God?" But the observation itself is a wretched misinterpretation of the book of nature, as has been many times clearly demonstrated; and if one may judge by similarity, seems to be borrowed in the present instance from that tissue of vulgar error, Paine's Age of Reason.

Mr. Cobbett next says, that war is necessary to the elevation of mankind. His reason is, that if there were no war, there would be no longer any courage, fortitude, emulation, magnanimity. Indeed! Mr. Cobbett; is this all you know about courage, fortitude, emulation, magnanimity? Has nobody any of those qualities, but those who have been in the wars? Have those qualities no field of action but the field of blood? Do, pray, Mr. Cobbett, look a little into the authors who have treated of those virtues, and you will see how comparatively small a portion of their sphere of operation is the field of war. Do not despise to study; for truly you have a great deal to learn. Let us appeal to a case where every idea of war is removed. Do we not suppose elevation, magnanimity, fortitude, and every ennobling virtue, to adorn the angels in heaven? Will these virtues be entirely eradicated from the spirits of just men in that future state, to which Christianity teaches us to believe they are removed? To analyse these virtues to you, Mr. Cobbett, and by that means attempt to shew you the absurdity of your argument, would be entirely to waste our time.

The above arguments of Mr. Cobbett are borrowed! The following are truly original: "1. By giving to different nations "different languages, the Creator intended they should remain "for ever separate; but war is necessary to uphold that separa- "tion. 2. There would be no use either of wisdom or science if "war were banished from the earth; because the object of the "learned is distinction; because the source of distinction is pub- "lic utility: because public utility rests at the point of pub- "lic safety; and were it not for the occasional existence of "wars, and for the continual possibility of their recurrence, "public safety would be a mere sound without sense."

We know not that we have ever met with any thing in print to match this!

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

FROM THE FRENCH PAPERS.

PARIS, JAN. 29.—The Senate yesterday held an Extraordinary Sitting. We are assured, that in this Sitting an organic Senatus Consultum was presented for the creation of a new Grand Dignitary of the Empire, with the title of "Governor-General "of the Department beyond the Alps:" his prerogatives and functions will be the same as those of the Prince Arch-Chancellor and Grand Elector.

GERMANY.

HANOVER, JAN. 8.—By order of the French Government, the Intendant, Belleville, gave notice, in the course of last month, that a forced loan is to be raised in the Hanoverian dominions, to the amount of 9,000,000 francs; which, in case of non-payment, are to be levied by the most vigorous means of execution.

TRIESTE, JAN. 11.—Yesterday our town witnessed a very unexpected sight; all at once appeared a Russian fleet of 15 sail, which anchored in our Road; amongst the number are three ships of the line, two large frigates of 50 guns, and several corvettes, &c. It seems that this naval force will pass the remainder of the winter here: their visit will be doubtless advantageous to this city, to which the Russians will insure a defence against England.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, JAN. 12.—They write from Koscan, of the date 30th November, that the Negociations with Persia are in considerable forwardness, and that it is expected an Expedition will be undertaken against the English possessions in the East Indies.—General Buxhoveden now commands the Russian army.

JAN. 18.—A corps of 20,000 Russians, with 144 pieces of cannon, is to be assembled on the frontiers of Finland. These troops are still in their cantonments, waiting farther orders.

ELSINEUR, JAN. 7.—According to the last returns made by the Russian Ministry, the Russian navy consists at present of 43 sail of the line, 34 frigates, 59 cutters, brigs, &c. and 226 small vessels. Of this force 20 ships of the line and four frigates were in the Black Sea; and besides them, 11 line of battle ships are in other seas.—According to the last accounts from Batavia, of the 11th of April, Admiral Hartsinck's squadron has been dismantled for want of hands.—Letters from Madrid state, that, according to reports current in that city, the King of Spain is to cede Navarre and Catalonia to France, for part of Portugal, and that the Queen of Etruria is to have the remainder of the latter kingdom.

SWEDEN.

GOTTENBURGH, JAN. 23.—The Stately and Nassau, which arrived last week, have brought 100,000*l.* for the King of Sweden, which is now landing. These ships are to remain in these seas through the winter, if the weather will permit. It is said that one of their first operations will be to relieve the 12 sail of merchant vessels now lying in Carlsham, which cannot come for fear of the Danish men of war, gun-vessels, &c.

RUSSIA.

PETERSBURGH, DEC. 19.—On the representation made by the Minister of Trade, of the great inconvenience which foreign merchants labour under who wish to travel in Russia, on account of their business, in consequence of the Ukase of the 23d of August, his Imperial Majesty has been pleased to ordain:

"1st, That all foreign merchants, who, on account of their business, wish to visit any of the frontier departments, may obtain the passports required for that purpose from the Commandant in such department.—2d, But should such foreigners be desirous of proceeding farther into the interior of the Empire, they must not do so without having obtained a passport from the Minister of Foreign Affairs, with regard to which is to be proceeded agreeably to the Ukase of the 23d of August."—The passports have not yet been granted the English merchants who wish to leave this country.

PORTUGAL.

LISBON, DEC. 23.—On account of the great scarcity of money nothing can be sold at present. But very few houses pay their bills, and few or no bills are accepted, even by the best houses. No goods are dispatched from hence, and the India House continues to be shut. The confiscation of English goods [illegible] on the 26th of this month, at which time the Courier will bring the decision of the fate of Port disturbances which took place on the 12th and 1 were occasioned by the hoisting of the French colo irritated the populace against the foreign military; fired several volleys, but most of them in the air, than 20 lives were lost on both sides on this occasi 14th, public tranquillity was perfectly restored, and reason to apprehend any further commotion, unle should goad the people to despair.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, FEB. 15, 1808.

The Bill for regulating the Issue of Exchequer Bills was read a first time.

Lord Auckland, pursuant to notice, called the attention of the House to the Order in Council of the 11th of November, and his subsequent comments and explanations. He contended, that they were, in their general principle, an infraction of the law of nations, and, in many of their provisions, a breach of municipal law. War did not give either of the belligerent powers a right to remedy the evils inflicted by the other, by inflicting the lawful commerce of the innocent neutral. The Orders were equally objectionable in point of expediency and policy, in a general point of view, and at the particular season when they were adopted. His Lordship entered minutely into the various bearings of the Orders, arguing for the propriety of adopting the motion with which he concluded, viz. "that the same should be taken into consideration in a Committee of the whole House."

Lord Ellenborough contended, that the Orders were not only legal and expedient and necessary; and under all the circumstances of the case, his Lordship argued, that this principle could not have been more effectually acted upon, than by the Orders in Council.

Lord Erskine referred to the dicta of Sir Geo. Lee, Lord Mansfield, Sir W. Scott, &c. to prove, that the decisions of the Courts of Admiralty were to be regulated, not by the Orders of Government, but by the Law of Nations, and the enactments of the Legislature, founded upon an explanatory of that law. He entered at considerable length into the consideration of the Order of January 1807, and contended, that it was strictly within the limits of the Law of Nations, and the rule of 1756.

The Lord Chancellor argued, that a war measure, only incidentally affecting questions of commerce, had never been held to be illegal. He approved of the Order of January, 1807, but thought it did not go far enough. He contended, however, that this Order, and a previous one, placing the coast from Brest to the Elbe in a state of blockade, was founded precisely on the same right of retaliation on which the Orders of November last proceeded.

The motion was supported by Lords King, Grenville, Lauderdale, and Sidmouth, and opposed by Lord Hawkesbury. A division then took place, when the motion was negatived by 106 to 48, proxies included.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEB. 16.

Lord Onslow took the oaths and his seat.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB. 18.

The Exchequer Bills Issue Regulation Bill went through a Committee.

The Malt Duty and Brazil Trade Bills were received from the Commons.

Lord Carlisle gave notice, that this day se'nnight he should bring forward a motion relative to the late Orders in Council.

The Bills brought up from the Commons were read a first time; and the Brazil Trade Bill being ordered to be printed,

Lord Grenville requested that due notice might be given of its second reading.

Lord Lauderdale gave notice, that he should, on Tuesday next, move the second reading of the Reversionary Grant Prohibition Bill.

Lord Grenville moved for a copy of the Instructions sent to the Commissioners of the Customs, for carrying into effect the Orders in Council of November last.—Ordered. His Lordship then observed, that the Order of the 11th of November professed to be immediately founded upon information received by Ministry, that the Decree of the French Emperor had recently been executed with increased rigour. As this averment was at variance with the communication from the American Minister on the 18th of October, and with all the accounts which he had been able to collect from any quarter, respecting the execution of the Decree alluded to, he conceived it necessary to the satisfaction of Parliament and the justification of Ministers, that the substance and dates of such information as they received upon this subject, should be laid on the table.

Lord Hawkesbury opposed the motion, and said, it could scarcely be supposed that, in the present state of the Continent, Ministers had received information in an official shape; and it would be productive of the most serious injury, both to the public service and to individuals, were they to disclose the communications of secret agents or of commercial houses, who might occasionally communicate to Government facts of importance to the interests of their country. In the present instance, there was the less cause for any such disclosure, as the answer of the French Emperor to M. Reguier was matter of notoriety in this country by the middle of October.

Lord Auckland argued in support of the motion.

The Duke of Montrose hoped his Majesty's Ministers would not have the weakness to suffer themselves to be provoked to make a disclosure of the nature required of them.

A division took place, and the motion was carried by a majority of 47 to 38.

Lord Sidmouth addressed the House on the subject of the Danish Navy. From the Proclamations and Summonses of our Commanders, their Declaration on leaving Zealand, the Declaration of War itself, and the admissions of his Majesty's Ministers, he argued, that the seizure of that navy was justified only on the grounds of inevitable necessity, arising out of the law of self-preservation, and that Denmark, the victim of this unfortunate urgency, was still regarded as a friendly and neutral Power. His Lordship concluded with proposing a Resolution for an Address to his Majesty, praying, that the ships taken at Copenhagen might be kept in such a state as not to preclude, or put to hazard, the possibility of their being restored, on the conclusion of a general peace.

Lord Boringdon said, the only effect of such a Resolution, if acceded to, would be to fetter the hands of Ministers when they came to negociate for a general peace.

Lord Ellenborough contended, that, admitting the alledged necessity of the seizure, it was incumbent on this country to restore the Danish fleet.

The Lord Chancellor said, that if his Noble and Learned Friend really viewed the matter as he had just stated it, he was for doing justice only by halves. He ought to move for the instant restitution of the Danish fleet.

Lord Harrowby justified the seizure of the Danish ships upon general grounds, and particularly on the precedent of 1756.

Lord Erskine said, the restitution of the Danish vessels was a matter of strict justice, upon the plea of the necessity urged for their seizure.

In the sequel of the debate, Lords Hawkesbury and Mulgrave opposed the motion, and Lord Grenville supported it: Lord Sidmouth having spoken in reply, it was negatived; on a division, by a majority of 105 to 51, proxies included.—Adjourned.

A Letter was read from J. Fuller, Esq. elected for Sussex, declining to defend his seat against a Petition from Colonel Sergison. Mr. Sergison's Petition was therefore ordered to be taken into further consideration on Thursday, the 21th of March next.

On the motion of Mr. Dent, leave of absence was granted for one month to Sir H. Popham, on account of the state of his health.

The Brazil Trade Import Bill was passed.

In a Committee of Ways and Means, 11,000,000½ were voted to discharge Exchequer Bills of last year outstanding.

THE DARDANELLES.

Mr. W. Taylor rose to bring forward a motion for an Inquiry into this Expedition, which was an attack on a nation at peace with Great Britain. He also meant to investigate, as far as possible, how the Expedition had failed. The whole of the affair seemed wrapped in mystery, but he trusted some communications would be made, shewing why we went to war with Turkey, and what were the motives that led to that war, and what was its ultimate object? The Hon. Gentleman then moved an Address to his Majesty, for a Copy of the Treaty of Alliance concluded between Turkey and Great Britain, on the 5th of January, 1799; for a Copy of Lord Elgin's Dispatches, connected with the Turkish Treaty with Russia; and a Copy of a Treaty concluded by Sir Sidney Smith and Mr. Spencer Smith: also for the Dispatches of Mr. Arbuthnot, and the orders given by Lord Collingwood to Admirals Sir T. Louis, Sir T. Duckworth, and Sir S. Smith.

Mr. Canning said, he was happy to state, there could be but little difficulty in complying with the Motion of the Honourable Gentleman. With respect to the orders given by Lord Collingwood he did not think any public ground had been stated for their production. With regard to his own feelings on the subject, he would advise the House not to persist in the inquiry.

Mr. T. Grenville observed, that as the late Administration were out of office before the result of the Expedition to the Dardanelles was known in England, it was utterly impossible for him to specify what were the Papers that might be essential to the elucidation of the transaction.

Mr. W. Taylor replied at considerable length, and after a few words from Mr. Johnstone and Mr. Wilberforce, the Resolutions were put and carried.

The Hon. J. Abercromby, moved for the instructions given by his Majesty's Ministers to Lord St. Vincent in the year 1806; to Earl Roslyn and General Simcoe during their stay in Lisbon; also copies of the official dispatches received from Lords St. Vincent and Roslyn respecting their conference with the Prince Regent.

Mr. Secretary Canning objected to the production of these Papers, as they could not be of any public utility in the present situation of affairs.

The Speaker then put the question on the first and motions, which were carried. On the third motion bein it was withdrawn. The fourth motion was for copies letters of Lord Vincent and Lord Roslyn after the audie leave with the Prince Regent of Portugal. On this the divided, when the motion was lost by 142 to 82.

On our re-admission, Lord Petty moved an Address Majesty, for a Copy of such communications has had place between Government and the United States, relati Treaty with these States.—Ordered.

Dr. Lawrence moved an Address to his Majesty, for a of a Dispatch from his Minister in America, containing sage purporting to be a Message from the President to t Houses of Congress in America, dated Feb. 19, 1807.—O

TUESDAY, FEB. 16.

Mr. Perceval presented an Account of the number cences granted to Neutral Ships, for carrying on the F Trade since the commencement of hostilities with France the end of November last.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Rose brought up the Report of the Committee of S granting an issue of ten millions five hundred thousand by loans on Exchequer Bills, towards the service of th The resolution was agreed to and a Bill was ordered a ingly.

On the third reading of the Malt, Pensions and offices Bill, Sir J. Newport moved, that the pensions payable widows of military officers be paid free of all deductions, pensions to widows of naval officers. The amendme agreed to. The Bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. Whitbread rose, to move for certain papers mately connected with the discussion of which he had notice for Monday week, and observed that Ministers their memorable transactions of last summer, had given extracts from dispatches of some importance upon the enterprizes they had set on foot. It, however, consist his knowledge that they were in possession of informa a nature peculiarly important and deeply interesting, he upon the intended mediation of Austria between this coun France. He also intended to move for a copy of a conve that took place between the Emperor of Russia an Hutchinson, on the subject of that Sovereign mediati Great Britain. The Secretary of State had roundly as that no such conversation ought to be given; he had al that, were it produced, it would afford an instance of a tion of faith such as never had been heard of before. The Hon. Secretary set himself up as the champion of all t vereigns in Europe. The French Ministers, by the in and authority of their Master, waited upon Monarchs i closets, while our Ministers were waiting in the anti-cha and saw the French Ministers pass. They naturally relish this indignity; and at Petersburgh they wished to on the same footing. After alluding to Budberg's note t G. L. Gower, laying blame on this country for not acco military assistance, he concluded by moving for a variety cuments, the first of which was an Address to his Maje copies or extracts of any dispatches received by the Se of State from the British Envoy at Vienna, in regard mediation of Austria between Great Britain and France.

Lord G. L. Gower stated, that he had received th alluded to from General Budberg; the contents, he unde were known to his Imperial Majesty, and he knew that jesty's Ministers at home were in possession of ample state, in reply to that Note.

Mr. Canning said, that from what had been stated Noble Lord, he trusted the Hon. Gentleman would be co of the impropriety of such motions, and he hoped that t versations of foreign Sovereigns with unaccredited agents no longer be attempted to be called for. The Hon. Gen was under a mistake in supposing Lord Hutchinson to ha an accredited agent. His Lordship was no such pers had visited Petersburgh merely from motives of curiosi would now appear, that communications from foreign Sov were not to be made to Ministers, fit or worthy to be in with them, but they were to be made to travellers. now stated, that a communication in a private letter was proper to be laid before the House. He should be ma prised to see the private letter he had received from the Lord entered on the Journals, and classed among the a and records of the House. Some of the papers moved fo not be presented for a very simple reason. M. Alopeus to the late Ministers several places where it was impor diversion by British troops might be made, in order to the enemy's attention. All these suggestions were neg and it was now impossible to give the names of these places pointed out, as bad consequences might result; and it was not to be presumed that such documents were to be produced for the sake of argument. When the Hon. Gentleman speaks about the assurances of co-operation held out to Russia by the late Administration, he forgets the precise facts. After stating that the Expedition against Constantinople had been undertaken by the late Ministry, as an object purely Russian, he said, that to some of the papers he had objections, but none to the general purport of the motion.

Mr. Whitbread wished to remove the objection to the first paper moved for, and would content himself with copies or extracts of the purport of Lord Hutchinson's conversation with the Emperor of Russia, on the 23d of August, 1807.

Mr. Canning still objected to the production of papers altogether of a private nature. If the Gentlemen on the other side of the House insisted on it, he would go every length, and try the question, and therefore would not produce papers of a private nature, unless compelled by the vote of that House. Indeed the information of Lord Hutchinson was merely the effusion of a traveller, and not of that authentic nature as if it came from an accredited Minister.

Dr. Lawrence said, Lord Hutchinson's character and veracity were conspicuously above being called in question, and though the Hon. Secretary thought lightly of character, it was time for the House to interfere and check such dangerous doctrine.

Mr. Whitbread replied generally; and after a few words from Lord G. L. Gower, respecting the inconsistency of the Emperor of Russia, the first paper moved for was negatived without a division; all the rest were agreed to be produced, excepting the third.—Adjourned till Thursday.

THURSDAY, FEB. 18.

Mr. Sheridan stated, that he held in his hand a Petition, which was of the same nature as that which had been brought before the House in 1800, by an Hon. Baronet, (Sir F. Burdett), and he (Mr. Sheridan) had taken a large share in the discussion, which was upon the management and conduct of Cold-Bath-fields Prison. These abuses, then complained of, had not been done away or remedied, but they had been rather encouraged and increased. The Petition was signed by Mr. Stephens, Foreman of the Grand Jury for the County of Middlesex, and twelve others of the Grand Jury, and a great part of the statement was confirmed by Mr. Sheriff Phillips. He should move, that it do lie on the table for a reasonable time, and if Ministers did not, within that interval, take up the matter, he would do so.

Mr. Perceval said, that he believed the matter of the Petition had been privately communicated to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. No measure could be adopted on such a communication, but a different course of proceeding might be resorted to.

Mr. Sheridan's Petition was brought up and read. It stated an inspection of the prison made by twelve of the Grand Jury, and the Foreman, in November last. They found the prisoners loaves which ought to weigh 16 ounces, defective; they also found the pound weight for the prisoner's meat to be very defective, when compared with the standard at Guildhall. The Petition went on to state several other abuses in the management of the prison, as declared in Sheriff Philips's Letter to Mr. Mainwaring.

Some conversation ensued. Mr Perceval and Mr. Sumner maintaining that 13 out of a Grand Jury was not a Grand Jury. They admitted, however, that the Petition would be receivable were the facts stated in it signed by the individuals who had inspected the Prison on the 3d of November.

Mr. Sheridan consented to withdraw the Petition till to-morrow, stating, that he would then present them with the signatures, as suggested by those Hon. Gentlemen.

Mr. Canning presented an Extract of a Dispatch from the Hon. D. Erskine, late Ambassador in America, to Lord Howick.

The Secretary at War presented an Estimate of the Charge for Land Forces, Staff-Officers, Foreign Corps, Veterinary College, &c. and gave notice he should move the necessary sum in a Committee of Supply on Friday week.

Mr. Dent moved for a copy of the Memorial of Sir Home Popham to his Majesty in 1802, praying restoration of his property condemned in the Etrusco.

Mr. Lushington moved for a copy of the Warrant granted to Sir Home Popham in 1787, allowing him to go to a foreign country on resigning his half-pay. Mr. Lushington then said, he was at a loss to understand what the Papers moved for by Mr. Dent had to do with the question, or what connection they had with the transaction of the Etrusco.

Mr. Dent replied, that his motions were directed to the vindication of the Hon. Baronet's conduct. He then moved for Copies of Dispatches sent from India relative to the conduct of Sir Home Popham while in India.

Mr. Lushington said, the Hon. Gentleman meant, by the papers he was to move for, to prove that his (Mr. L's.) statement was unfounded. The Hon. Baronet's having gone to India was contrary to the charter of the East India Company, and a violation of the laws of the land. (Here there was a cry of Order). Mr. L. proceeded He was not to be at the beck of any Minister, (Hear! hear! from the Opposition), and all he should say was, that there was no forfeiture in the case he had stated it was a fair and positive condemnation of the Etrusco. He then moved for a copy of all Decrees by the High Court of Admiralty, or by the Prize Court, relative to the ship Etrusco.

Mr. Dent asked, should these Papers be produced, whether or not the Hon. Gentleman meant to make a motion upon them?

Mr. Lushington replied, that he certainly should endeavour to impress the House, that the donation to Sir Home Popham, of 25,000*l.* was a gross and wanton expenditure of money.

Mr. Perceval asked Mr. Lushington whether he meant to prove Sir Home what he called him, a smuggler, and if these documents he had moved for were likely to make out that assertion.

Mr. Lushington replied, he had great difficulty in answering that question at present. He should, however, he believed, be enabled to prove that Sir Home had previous knowledge that he was acting contrary to law, and that in receiving 25,000*l.* from the Treasury, he got more than the ship and cargo were worth.

Several other documents were ordered on the motion of Mr. Lushington.

Mr. Perceval moved the Order of the Day for the second reading of the Bill for carrying into execution the late Orders in Council.

Mr. Eden wished to know, whether or not the Note delivered to the American Commissioners, on the 30th of November, 1806, was declaratory of his Majesty's intention not to exercise any controul over the trade of America, or other neutrals? The Hon. Gentleman opposed the farther progress of the Bill, as it enforced taxes on neutral vessels brought into British ports, contrary to their own will.

The Advocate General defended the Bill, on the ground of its legality and necessity, and said, on the best view he could take of the cause of the Bill, that it was deserving of the support of the House and the Country.

Lord Temple contended, that his Majesty had no right whatever to restrict the legal conduct of neutrals.

Mr. Rose insisted on the legality of restricting neutrals carrying to France the produce of her colonies, under the 42d and 43th of the King, which authorised their detention; therefore his Majesty, instead of violating the law, only complied with the powers assigned him by Parliament.

Mr. Smith censured the cause which led to the embargo, and entreated Ministers to consider the measure, and not gall America into further hostility.

Lord H. Petty did not believe that, by restricting neutrals, we could possibly distress France, and he was certain no political advantage could result from it.

Lord Castlereagh in a long speech defended the Bill. The Question was then loudly called for, and the House divided.—Ayes for the second reading now 214. Noes, 94.—During our exclusion, another division, we understand, on the question for committing the Bill, this day, took place. It was carried in the affirmative by a majority of 147 to 53.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 19.

A new Writ was ordered for Boroughbridge, in the room of H. Dawkins, Esq. who has accepted the Chiltern Hundreds.

Colonel Stanley presented a Petition from the Journeymen Cotton Weavers of Lancashire, praying that a minimum price may be set upon their labour.—Referred to a Committee.

Sir C. Pole moved for certain Papers relative to the Royal Naval Asylum, consisting of a Memorial from Dr. Keene, late Surgeon of the Ville de Paris, to the Commissioners of that Asylum, &c. After a few words from Mr. Rose the motion was agreed to.

Colonel Wood moved for Copies of all Orders and Instructions sent to Naval and Military Commanders in the Mediterranean, respecting the expeditions to the Dardanelles and Alexandria.—Ordered.

Mr. Sheridan presented once more the Petition he withdrew yesterday, from the Foreman and twelve of the Grand Jury of Middlesex, stating certain abuses to exist in Cold-Bath-field's prison. He stated, that the Jury had been dissolved on the 3d of November, but that they had afterwards obtained an order from the Court of Quarter Session for inspecting the prison. The Petition was read, and after a few words from Mr. Perceval, was ordered to lie on the table.

Sir J. Newport moved for a Copy of all orders issued by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for completing the Irish Militia, whether by ballot or by volunteers, under the Act of the 42d of the King.—Agreed to.

General Gascoigne moved for an Account of all Salt exported during the last three years, distinguishing the ports from whence. Ordered.

Mr. Rankes moved for an Account of the amount of the Exemptions granted under the Property Act, on Property of Foreigners in the Funds; and for an Account of the amount of Bank Notes, including Bank Post Bills, in circulation during the last year. Ordered.

Mr. Ponsonby moved for Copies, or Extracts, of the Intelligence received by Ministers on the 11th of November, in regard to Bonaparte's Orders for a more rigorous enforcement of his Decree against the Commerce of this Country.—Agreed to.

Mr. Ponsonby gave notice for Monday, of a motion for the production of any Communication made to Ministers by the United States, in regard to the French Decree.

Mr. Perceval gave notice, that on Monday he should move for leave to bring in a Bill, for preventing the Exportation of Cotton Wool and Bark.

The House then went into a Committee of Ways and Means. Mr. Perceval proposed a Duty of 9*d.* additional on every pound of Cotton Wool exported from Great Britain to the Continent of Europe. He next proposed, on the exportation of every Bushel of Salt to the Continent, an Excise Duty of 9*d.* Some conversation ensued; and the Resolutions were agreed to, and the Report ordered to be received on Monday.

Mr. Perceval moved the Order of the Day, for the House to resolve into a Committee on the Bill for carrying into effect the Orders in Council. He stated, that he wished the Committee to be gone into, pro forma, as he had various new Clauses and Amendments to offer, which would, in a great measure, do away the objections of Gentlemen to the Bill.

Mr. Ponsonby observed, that since this morning at three o'clock a change had taken place in the Right Hon. Gentleman's sentiments. With regard to himself he objected to its principle entirely, as it was repugnant to every idea of candour and honour; indeed, it struck him as the most poor and contemptible project he had ever heard of.

Mr. Brand, Mr. Davies Giddy, and Mr. H. Martin, were determined to divide the House, on which the Gallery was cleared. For the Motion, 118—Against it, 32—Majority, 86. The Report was committed pro forma, when it was ordered to be received on Monday. The House then disposed of the remaining Orders of the Day, and adjourned till then.

PROVINCIALS.

DREADFUL EFFECTS OF THE LATE SEVERE WEATHER.

In the interior of the country the severity of the weather has been productive of great calamity. The fall of snow on the North road has been particularly heavy, and in many places is said to have been forty feet deep. In the vicinity of Biggleswade the Newcastle and other mails were stopped, and so completely involved in snow, that it was found necessary to extricate them by the assistance of a great number of hands. The Portsmouth coach lost its way, and was nearly overturned. Two female passengers were frozen to death on the outside, and we fear we shall have to record a numerous list of afflicting events in consequence of the extreme violence of the storm. The Exeter mail coach was unable to proceed beyond Overton, where the passengers stopped. The guard with great difficulty came forward with the mails over fields, &c. The Gloucester and Worcester mail coaches were stopped two miles beyond Benson. The guards brought forward the mails on horseback. The Bristol mail was twice dug out of the snow. The heavy Liverpool coach, which left London early on the morning of Friday se'nnight, did not reach Oxford till eleven at night.

There was so heavy a fall of snow on Thursday night, drifted by the wind blowing violently from the E. N. E. that the road from Bath to London, was blocked up near Kennet, and after several ineffectual attempts to remove it, the guard found it advisable to forward the mails in a post chaise. As the Exeter mail coach was going down Marlborough hill, on the same night, the horses sunk in the snow, and before they could be extricated, one of them perished. A valuable horse, belonging to a post coach, was also lost in the snow, near Kennet.

During the severity of the weather a sentinel on guard at Woodbridge Barracks is said to have perished; and another Soldier, who tried to reach the Barracks near Bury, was lost in the snow.

KELSO, FEB. 15.—On Saturday week a very severe frost commenced, which has continued till this morning, but there are some appearances of a change. On Friday evening a heavy gale of wind came on, which continued to blow during the greater part of the night, accompanied with a considerable fall of drifted snow. In this neighbourhood we have not experienced much inconvenience, but some of the roads in Berwickshire, we understand, are nearly blocked up. On Saturday the Kelso and Berwick carrier, when within four miles of Berwick, found the road so much blocked up, that he was obliged to return, leaving his carts behind. In the south, the falls of snow must have been much more severe, as the London mail, which should have reached Berwick on Saturday night at eleven o'clock, did not arrive there till yesterday, and yesterday's had not arrived when the post left Berwick this morning at one.

BRIGHTON, FEB. 15.—The weather on Friday morning was so tremendous to our stage-coachmen and their passengers, that they all prudently declined the prosecution of their respective journies, and returned, after having proceeded a few miles on the road. Nor was an Undertaker who had to convey a corpse to London in a hearse, on that day, less mindful of the safety of HIS passenger; he therefore deferred his journey till the following morning. The snow was so drifted in many of the hollow ways, that a gentleman's carriage, which stuck fast in one of them, required the aid of seven men to dig it out.

Yesterday morning the body of a man floated on shore at the back of the Chest Arms Tavern, in a most dreadful state: the legs, thighs, and lower part of the body have been either torn or eat away, and his right arm is wanting, and the rest of his body is quite black, apparently with bruises, and there were no clothes about it, except a kind of handkerchief tied round the neck. It is conjectured that the unfortunate man has been either jammed between two vessels, or blown up with gun-powder.

Lord Charleville's beautiful seat at Tullamore has, we understand with great regret, been consumed by fire, owing to the negligence of one of the servants. The fire is said to have commenced in the attic story, which soon communicated to the lead on the roof, and the streams of melted lead soon ran in such torrents, that no person could venture to enter the house to afford assistance. The furniture, and every thing contained in the house, were all consumed. No life was lost.

The Gazette contains his Majesty's permission for the 46th Regiment of Foot to bear "DOMINICA" on its colours, as a distinguished mark of its exemplary conduct in the defence of the Island of Dominica; also his Majesty's permission to the Flank Companies of the 1st Battalions of the 35th and 61st Regiments, to assume and wear on their appointments the word "MAIDA," as a lasting testimony of the gallantry displayed by those Companies in the action which was fought between the British and French Armies on the 4th of July, 1806, on the Plains of Maida.

The Gazette likewise contains Addresses from Haddington, Dumfries, Kincardine, Belfast, Fife, and Aberdeen, congratulating his Majesty on his late measures relative to Denmark, and praying that the most vigorous measures may be adopted for the prosecution of the War.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

All the Gottenburgh Mails which were due, amounting to ten, have at last arrived. Those which were received on Friday evening conveyed to us the intelligence that Russia has actually declared war against Sweden. This, however, was so much expected, that it has not excited surprise. It is even stated that the Russians had commenced hostilities. But this intelligence we are inclined to think is premature. The movements of the Russians are seldom so rapid. It appears that Sweden has no less than 25,000 men in Finland, and from the population it is said that 20,000 more may be raised. The country itself presents formidable difficulties to an invading enemy. It is mountainous, and the defiles are very narrow, and well defended with fortifications. The King of Sweden will make an obstinate resistance; and will, no doubt, be aided from this country. But will this tend in any degree to reduce the power of France? Will it not, on the other hand, tend rather to increase her power, by weakening that of the other states, by which she might, hereafter, be opposed.

Paris Papers to the 31st have also been received. They contained a Declaration by the King of Prussia, in which he renounces all connection with England, and shuts his ports against her vessels. The principal feature of this Declaration, is the plainness with which his Prussian Majesty expresses the necessity under which he acts. The measure, he acknowledges, will bear very hard upon his suffering subjects, but such is the will of the master whom he must obey.

A new decree has also been issued by the King of Holland, in which the exclusion of all British Commerce is enforced with additional rigour.

We have received some intelligence from Portugal. The French commanders have been prolific in Proclamations; some of them of the most ignorant and pernicious description. Thus, it has been ordered, that the price of bread and other necessaries shall not be raised; by which means they will be prevented from coming to market, and the miseries of the people will be enhanced beyond even what the necessity of the war would inflict. This proclamation, at the same time, is undeniable proof of the severe scarcity which prevails. A rigorous military authority is maintained, and by this means a forced tranquillity is preserved.

The Debates in both Houses of Parliament have been protracted and warm. The Opposition seem determined to give the Ministers as little rest as possible. The Orders in Council have been discussed both in the Upper and the Lower House; but with little variety of argument. The material question is, whether, by the measure, we really do any material mischief to our enemy, or procure any great advantage to ourselves. The Ministers say we do both; the Opposition contend that we do neither. The Expedition to the Dardanelles formed the subject of the other principal Debate. This was introduced by the Opposition, in order to vindicate their conduct from the insinuations which had been thrown out against this measure. It had been represented as a transaction, similar in principle to the Expedition against Copenhagen; and we do not see that the explanation of its authors has placed it in a very different light.

We are happy to notice the intelligence which has been received respecting the Rochefort Squadron, the particulars relating to the mode in which an account was conveyed of its course to Sir JOHN DUCKWORTH, and of his sailing in quest of it we have communicated in our Nautical Intelligence. We are sorry to learn, it is Sir SAMUEL HOOD'S opinion, that the chance of Admiral DUCKWORTH'S overtaking the enemy is not very great. But it is a great satisfaction to know, that he will arrive in the West Indies in sufficient time to prevent any mischief which the squadron might have effected, had it been permitted to range those seas for any time. Effectual means, too, have been taken to inform Admiral COCHRANE of their arrival; so that we have every reason to hope we shall sooner or later receive a perfectly good account of them.

The cartel that carried over the Russian Ambassador, M. ALOPEUS, landed on Wednesday, at Calais, and returned to Dover, on Friday. It brought back a packet of Letters from M. ALOPEUS, which was sent express to the Office of the Secretary of State for the Foreign Department. One of these letters, addressed to the Prussian Ambassador, is supposed to contain his order to quit this country immediately.

It is stated, but, we believe, without any authority, that the Ministers mean to frame a Motion, in the House of Lords, on Monday, for rescinding a Resolution which was voted against them on Thursday night, when they were surprised by a division at an early hour, at which their friends had not entered the House.

The following Letter has been communicated to us, dated Stockholm, Feb. 3, which we believe is the latest intelligence from Sweden:—

"Sweden is on the eve of difficulties. The Russians are rumoured to have actually passed the frontiers. So far I know to a certainty, that the officers attached to the Finland regiments received orders yesterday morning to join their corps immediately. General Klingspor, Commander in Chief in Finland, leaves town this afternoon with his Staff. It is stated, that Baron Stedingk had sent orders to the regiments on the frontiers to collect themselves into a body, and that he would come and take the command of them until his Majesty's pleasure was known. Baron Stedink was the Swedish Minister at St. Petersburgh. Operations may possibly begin with unexpected celerity. Finland is a strong military position, of which a great part, however, can be less successfully defended amid the snow and frosts of winter, than in the usual season of campaigns. The actual amount of the Swedish force in or near Finland, it is not easy to determine precisely. The lowest estimate, is fourteen thousand, a force certainly sufficient to guard the country against a surprise. It is said, a number of foreigners are buying up sugar, coffee, &c. which have risen 50 per cent. in Hamburgh and the Baltic. A large quantity, it is said, is in the present difficulty of navigation, going overland to Russia. Sea-coal, firewood, and coffee, are extremely dear at Copenhagen."

Extract of a Letter from Copenhagen, dated January 19—

"It appears, that as early as the month of July last, it was supposed in the Isle of France, that a war must be unavoidable between England and Denmark, on which account an embargo was laid on all the Danish ships lying there; a hope is therefore entertained that by this measure of the French Government there, many of the ships of our merchants and trading companies will escape being captured. By the fitting out of the Danish fleet, orders for which have been sent down to Portsmouth, it is very manifest what was the real motive for the robbery committed here; could any doubt remain concerning it? The English at first boasted that they had ships enough, and only wanted to detain ours that they might not be employed against them. To encourage our manufactures, and annoy the enemy, the following three measures have been proposed as the most efficient: —First, The prohibition of the use and importation of any English manufactures—Second, The introduction of a national dress —Third, the establishment of a great privateering Company, the privateers of which should keep at no great distance from each other, so as to be able to come to each other's assistance, and on the first gun firing, by which means they might be enabled to capture the convoying ship, and all the vessels under its convoy. This, it is stated, is a plan which might easily be effected if the ship of war be attacked at the same time at the head, the stern, and on both sides, by the above number of privateers, each having from 20 to 30 guns. The coast of Norway, and the West Indian Seas, are the proper places for such privateers to cruize in. This plan comes from a Marine Officer."

Extract of a Letter from Gottenburgh, dated Feb. 12.

"The Stockholm post of to-day has brought the important intelligence that Russia has declared war against Sweden; and some accounts state that the Russians have already entered Swedish Finland. Both M. Alopeus, the Russian Minister, and Count Miolke, the Danish Minister, are about to quit Stockholm. The officers and Staff of the Swedish army in Finland, had received orders to join with all possible expedition. A Russian army of 35,000 men is on the frontiers of Finland; there were at first 50,000, but it was found difficult to provision so many.—Six regiments were marched home again."

Extract of a Letter from Petersburgh, Jan. 14.

"Caulincourt, the new French Ambassador, has arrived in this city accompanied with a guard of honour. On the same day he was introduced to the Emperor Alexander, by whom he was most graciously received. By the respectable part of the inhabitants the honours paid to Caulincourt were viewed with sullen silence; but the reflections which have since been unreservedly made throughout Petersburgh, are such as must be far from pleasing to the Emperor, for they are in direct hostility to what is termed "the new order of things." Bonuparte has renewed his demand to receive in marriage a sister of the Emperor of Russia. Her Royal Highness received the first overture with indignation; but the terms in which the demand was made were so peremptory, that it was supposed the humiliated Alexander, rather than risk the displeasure of the Corsican, would force his sister in compliance with the demand. The English merchants have been alarmed by the Swedish war. All communications between the two countries being at an end, the indirect channel of intercourse between Russia and England must, in like manner, be interrupted. The British merchants in St. Petersburgh are apprehensive they may ultimately be refused passports to return home."

Lady Edward Fitzgerald, once so famous as Pamela, the reputed daughter of the late Duke of Orleans, and the elève of Madame de Genlis, left this country last week, in company with Prince Esterhazy. It appears she was narrowly sought after, both at Dover and on board the vessel, by Sheriffs' Officers, who had warrants against her on civil actions. She was concealed in the Prince's carriage among his baggage, and so successfully, that though the carriage itself was searched, she remained undiscovered. She had previously escaped from shore to the vessel, in the dress of a sailor.

The Dutch official Gazette contains the following important article:—

"Abandon common speculations; do not suffer yourselves to be excluded with impunity from the Empire of the seas.—Fit out privaterrs to wrest the prey from the enemy, to procure provisions, become almost of the first necessity: it is in the enemy's ships that you ought to seek for your Colonies; it is at their expence you ought to furnish your correspondents with the merchandise they want.—Recollect the courage of your ancestors; recollect you are fellow-countrymen of Ruyter and Tromp. Must the Danes be of the least populous nation, the only one who dare attack the English in open sea? Must history say that the Danes were in the 19th century what the Dutch were in the 17th.—Arm, Dutchmen! let all your Ports be filled with armed vessels ready to fall upon the enemy."

A letter from Gottenburgh states the following most unjustifiable proceeding on the part of the Danes, and which, for the information of all mariners, it is the more necessary to publish:—

"Near the Scaw, there runs a reef of rocks easterly, about a league in extent, into the Categat; to guard against which there was, until the rupture with Denmark, a light at the Scaw. The Danes have now erected a light about a league to the west of the original light; thus drawing any ship unacquainted with the alteration into certain destruction."

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday being the day appointed for a General Fast and Humiliation, their Majesties and the Princesses went at an early hour in the morning to their private Chapel, where the Form of Prayer appointed for the day was read. At half past ten his Majesty, with the Princesses Augusta, Mary, Sophia, and Amelia, went to St. George's Chapel, where a Sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Cookson, from Psalm ix. ver. 1. They afterwards returned to the Palace.

Fast Day.—Wednesday being the day appointed for a General Fast and Humiliation, it was duly observed in and about the Metropolis. The two Houses of Parliament attended service at the Abbey and St. Margaret's, Westminster. The Volunteers attended divine service at their respective parish churches. The Lord Mayor went in state to the Cathedral of St. Paul, accompanied by Sir John Eamer, and a great many other respectable Gentlemen of the Corporation, in their gowns.

The celebrated Edmund Burke was frequently honoured by a seat at the convivial table of the present Prince of Wales. On one of these occasions, surrounded by bon vivants, and seized with a sudden fit of absence, he allowed the wine to remain stationary beyond the usual time, which the Prince observing, immediately accosted him with that polite affability for which he is so eminently distinguished— "Come, come, Burke, forget the Senate now, and re- "member the bottle—I am absolute here—." "Absolute "you are, indeed, my Liege (replied the eloquent wit), "jure di-vino!"—"The only way (exclaimed the Prince) "in which I could ever wish to be absolute."

Violent discussions are expected to take place concerning the affair of Portugal, during the ensuing Session. Mr. Sheridan thinks the rise on Port very disadvantageous, while Mr. Whitbread declares, he thinks it will have a good effect, by encreasing the consumption of our home manufactures—He recommends Porter.

Hannibal made a passage over the Alps, by means of hot vinegar; but Boney, to surpass him, intends to make a North-about passage to India, through the frozen ocean, by means of hot water!—for supplying him with the latter article, John Bull has the monopoly.

CITY.

Bread.—Tuesday the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be reduced half an assize. The quartern loaf will therefore, sell for 11½d.

Thursday, a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall, which was very numerously attended. The Lord Mayor laid before the Court a letter he had received from General Lumley, in answer to the Vote of Thanks of the Court of the 15th Sept. last, for his gallant conduct at the attack and capture of Monte Video; which was read, and ordered to be entered on the Journals.

Friday the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs went in state to Bow Church, Cheapside, where they heard an Annual Sermon preached before the Bishops for the Propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts. The Sermon was preached by the Right Reverend Father in God the Bishop of St. David's, who took his text from the 28th chapter of St. Matthew, and 19th verse:—

"Go ye, and teach all nations," &c.

THE THEATRES.

So little novelty has been presented this week to the admirers of Thespis, that the port of criticism is almost closely blockaded; and as there seems such a complete embargo on genuine articles of home manufacture, we can only turn our attention to those of a foreign growth. In this predicament we naturally advert to where Didone, as altered from Metastatio, was repeated, to a house, not indeed very full, but with a sufficient sprinkling of fashion. On the first appearance of this Opera, we offered some remarks to the public, and can therefore have but little further to say, particularly as our additional animadversions would fall on that part of the performance which comes more immediately under the regulation of the Manager. As long as this species of entertainments is to be patronized and supported, we cannot but regret, that the squabbles of contending Managers should prevent the fashionable world from having it got up in the best manner; but there are, nevertheless, some errors which might be corrected, even during the present uncivil commotions. As this Opera is taken from ancient history, we have a right to expect an adherence to ancient customs, otherwise the illusion is destroyed, and we no longer see Dido or Eneas, but Mesdames Dusek and Catalani. In the palace of Dido, we did not expect to see a library table with inkstand, &c. as if for the purpose of writing a billet doux in modern comedy; nor can we understand why Iarbas, a Moor, should be represented black as a Negro, whilst his friend Araspes, preserves his original Italian colour. To Madame Catalani's execution we have already done justice, and must again repeat our admiration of her powers, in "Perdaro la dolce Speranza;" in this air she was deservedly encored, and gave it with a degree of pathos beyond her usual manner. Her most spirited passage was in the coquetting scene, with Eneas and Iarbas, when she answers to the threats of the latter, "So che un barbaro sei, no mi spaventi." The latter part of the line was given with a degree of force and articulation which made the house ring, and drew down repeated plaudits. Catalani's attention to the bye play is also deserving of praise, the more so, as the other performers seem to consider such a thing as totally unnecessary; indeed from their apparent anxiety to be near the prompter, they rather appear like children at their school lesson. It is therefore the more to be wished, that a settlement of all disputes might lead to the formation of a respectable company. The divertisement of "L'Offrande à Bacchus," is of that mediocre kind, as scarcely to deserve notice, were it not that the very shabby dresses of the performers gave such disgust as to destroy the impression made by their dancing; we shall therefore pass on to the new ballet of "L'Enlevement de Dejanire," which was repeated with considerable alterations. As the greatest Critics of ancient and modern times have not disdained to analize, and to direct the dance, we may be allowed to dilate a little on this new mythological ballet. In ancient times dancing formed a great part of their dramatic representation, and has been defined as "the art of expressing the sentiments of the mind, or the passions, by measured steps, or bounds, that are made in cadence, by regulated motions of the body, and by graceful gestures; all performed to the sound of musical instruments, or the voice;" but the regular ballet was first invented by Pylades and Bathylus at Rome, of the latter of whom it has been said, that when he danced, the gravest matron was thrown off her guard, and the youngest virgin longed for his addresses. Under authority so classical, as well as modern custom, M. D'Egville is fully warranted in introducing the ancient story on the modern stage; but in doing so, he should adhere as closely as possible, not only to incidents both of time and place, but also to the general costume and manner. Under the definition which we have given of dancing, it is evident, that the performer may represent the most powerful emotions of the mind, without the coupees and cabrioles of the dancing master; and this expressive mode of dancing will be to the judicious, infinitely more interesting, as well as affording to the dancer an opportunity of displaying the powers of the human form to the greatest advantage. This observation applies to some characters more than others, and in the present instance, though ancient mythology tells us, that Hercules learnt from Eurytus to shoot with the bow, from Castor to fight, from Linus to play on the lyre, and from Eumolphus to sing, yet it does not appear that he was taught to dance. Whatever applies to manner will also apply to story, particularly where a strict adherence to it is productive of situation equal to any thing resulting from a breach of the rule.—With regard to those incidents in the poetical life of Hercules, which have been selected for this ballet, a stricter adherence to them, as well as the avoiding of anachronisms, might undoubtedly have produced a better effect. The rape, "Enlevement" of Dejanire, by Nessus, the Centaur took place after her marriage with Hercules, and the mortal wound from the arrow was received by Nessus, whilst ferrying her over the river Eneas, and not on a Bridge, for at that period Bridges were unknown. The incident which obliged Hercules to leave the Court of Calydon in company with his wife, is also entirely omitted, and the accidental Meeting of Hercules with Iole, is very different from the original idea; for Iole had been already refused to him by her father, Eurytus King of Œchalia; and it was after Hercules had killed her father and three brothers, that she was induced to accompany him to Mount Æta, where he raised an altar to Jupiter. In adhering to the story we should certainly have lost that scene where Dejanira yields her claim on Hercules to Iole; but the classical spectator is the more displeased because he recollects that the jealousy of Dejanira was aroused by the tittle-tattle of Lychas, who when sent by Hercules to Trachynia for his garments for the sacrifice, informs her that he had taken Iole with him to assist in his devotions: we notice this the more particularly, because after the apparent consent of his wife to the amour with Iole, there is no reason given for her subsequent jealousy, and sending of the poisoned garment, which destroys much of the effect in the Ballet. The pile on which Hercules perished was also set on fire by lightening, and not kindled by his son Philoctetes, this should be attended to. With respect to the performance, we wish to give it every due praise.—Deshayes produces as much interest as could be expected and shewed some judgment in throwing himself into the attitude of the Farnese Hercules, as well as where he holds with Cupid on his shoulder; this is elegantly allegorical, and in strict conformity with the representation of Hercules on some ancient gems. In the Ancient Mythology we are told that Hercules had a contest with Apollo, but this surely does not justify his breaking the trident of Neptune, of course this might well be omitted by Monsieur Deshayes. As to the female performers, their dancing had so little to do with the Story, that we can only observe, Mesdames Deshayes and Presle shewed their usual agility, and the new dancer Miss Gayton continues to be a girl of much promise. We are pleased to see the fair Cranfield filling up the vacancy occasioned by Parisot's leaving the stage; and though a French wit, whose asked his opinion of a new Piece, advised them to lengthen the dances, and shorten the petticoats, we must confess that Miss Cranfield, by the judicious length of her drapery, gives much effect to the fascination of her graceful motions.

A new Opera is in preparation, and will make its appearance in the course of the week.

DRURY-LANE.

At this Theatre the whole week has been dedicated to "Kais, or Love in a Desart," with some little variety in the Afterpieces: in the first, the curtailments and alterations are for the better, and the singing and scenery may draw decent houses for a few nights longer; in the latter, we have no novelty to notice, but we cannot let the occasion pass without adverting to the very excellent acting of Bannister and Miss Duncan in The Citizen. In witnessing the spirit and correctness of these two, we felt some amends for our tiresome seat at a tedious Opera.

COVENT GARDEN,

In imitation of her elder Sister, has passed the week in endeavouring to drive away "Dull Care;" but if she continue it much longer, we can easily anticipate "How it will End."

A new Comic Ballet, "Poor Jack; or, The Benevolent Tar," was got up on Friday, as a kind of make-weight to the new Comedy. In this melange of dancing and dumb shew, there is an attempt at plot, as trifling as the execution of it is ridiculous; to develope it would be time thrown away; but we cannot help noticing that the idea of an Officer throwing away his hat and uniform jacket, when on duty, then slapping an old man in the face, &c. is as derogatory to the general conduct of Officers in the Navy, as the turning of boats' oars into dancing crosses, is contrary to plain common sense. This might be intended to produce effect, but we hope that the hisses from the gallery will afford a lesson to the Ballet Master. The dancing (strictly speaking) was excellent; Miss M. Bologna, in her hornpipe, received repeated plaudits, and Mr. Bologna is too well known to need any praise. It is but fair that the Manager should receive some return for the great expence, incurred by new scenery, &c. for a new piece; and it may be but fair, that all the children of a larger growth should be entertained with camels, bearded Turks, sphinxes, rosy-faced peers, puns and copper-mines; but all this expence might be saved, if our dramatists would but attempt to throw a little rational plot into their productions, chequered with lively sentiment, and some honest English wit, instead of antitheses and puns. An attempt of this kind might tend to cure a vitiated taste; and even the many (who are oftener allured by the decorations, than by the sterling merit of the piece) would soon find a higher relish in the genuine English comedy, than in all the tricks of the mechanist, or the most brilliant Chefs d'œuvre of the scene-painter.

THE DRAMATIC DETECTOR.

No. II.

Impiger, iracundus, inexorabilis, acer!

In these times, when the spirit of chivalry is almost extinct, and a single warrior no longer ventures to storm an enchanted castle, there is some boldness in attacking an enemy who is not only armed with powerful weapons of defence, but guarded by the talismans of public favour. In assailing The Examiner we have, therefore, undertaken a service of danger, and opposed to the talents which glitter there, we shall be fighting like the knights in Mr. Skiffington's Sleeping Beauty, against thunder and lightning. But if the enchanter employ his art to the purposes of mischief, we will try to sound the horn, by the blast of which his magic influence may fall, and to rescue all the unhappy men and distressed damsels who for so long a time have been beneath his oppression.

The theatrical censor, in The Examiner, announces himself to be the same who formerly brandished the critical quill in The News. In that paper he did not content himself with lashing those writers who came regularly under his review, but scarcely ever passed a week without introducing the names of some three or four authors, whom he seemed to consider as the vicegerents of dullness upon earth. We are sorry to find, that in The Examiner he pursues a line of conduct exactly similar, and that the same people are introduced by head and shoulders, merely that they may be abused. Our impartial readers will be a little surprised, when they are informed, that among those who are stigmatised as the greatest blockheads that ever insulted the taste of a nation, are the authors of the Dramatist, and of the Jew and Doctor. That Mr. Reynolds has too often dressed comedy in a harlequin jacket, and that Mr. Dibdin has usually spread puns, as thick as duck-weed, over the waters of his dramatic Helicon, we are perfectly ready to confess: But that men who have done so much for the relaxation of rigid muscles are to be considered as blockheads we never can allow: and we think that, even if they were duller than the fat weed on Lethe's wharf, a Critic could have no right to abuse them, except when their works were regularly the subjects of his animadversion. But this gentleman has set up Shakespeare and Congreve as the north poles of genius, and the modern authors as their diametrical opposites: and in proportion as any writer approaches to the standard point at either extreme, his literary latitude and longitude are calculated by this theatrical philosopher.—There is no subject, however apparently unconnected with the names of the modern authors, that is not immediately coupled with an invective against their absurdities: and if all his readers are like us, they must by this time be heartily tired of the sounds, Reynolds, Dibdin, and Cherry, Dibdin, Cherry, and Reynolds, Cherry, Reynolds, and Dibdin, with which the changes are so uniformly rung upon our ears. If the Critic has occasion to speak of the revivals at Drury Lane, he tells us that the other house is always in the extremes of Shakespeare and Dibdin. If he mentions Mr. Bate Dudley's opera, which he very deservedly condemns, he tells us that Mr. Cherry must be in "a happy "moment of inspiration" to compose any thing as good: and though the unfortunate frequency of bad plays gives him frequent opportunities of fair censure, he cannot be comfortable unless he drags the poor authors, even when they are unoffending, before the dreadful tribunal of criticism. He is not content with taking his gun, like a regular sportsman, and shooting the game that starts before him; but converts every Sunday into Shrove-tide, and brings the poor fowls from their peaceful roosts, merely that he may have the pleasure of breaking their legs and wings. Besides we are not sure that the privileges of a theatrical Critic are quite as extensive as this writer would make them. Every body who sees a new play, and thinks it stupid, has an undoubted right, publicly or privately, to say that he thinks so: but we do not conceive that any body has a right to call its author stupid: because a very clever man may write a very stupid play: and censure, when transferred from the individual piece to the general capacity which produced that piece, is no longer criticism, but personality. This we hold to be the case of justice, even if the author attacked were really a blockhead; but when a man has actually produced one good piece, he has proved himself ingenious, and though his subsequent efforts may merit individual condemnation, he never deserve to be called a fool on the whole.

From time to time, as occasion may require, we shall point out the most material defects of the theatrical Examiner. The Critic has great talents, but, paradoxical as the assertion may appear, those very talents are likely to prevent him from ever attaining perfection in this pursuit. When his mind is running on comedy, he has too much wit himself to do justice to the wit of others: and when he has to speak of tragedy, he appears to stifle that poetical feeling which alone can enable a man to criticise with justice. When he writes on comedy he should therefore remember, like the swift runner in the fable, to tie himself, lest he move too nimbly: and, when he investigates a tragic performance, he should not suffer cold caution to remain on guard at the avenues of his heart.

FINE ARTS.

We are happy to observe that many of the Paintings exhibited in the British Gallery, are now marked as sold; and we shall hope that this species of encouragement is the only thing wanting to place the efforts of the British pencil on a level with the unfinished works of Claude or Salvator. For the perfection which the Arts have arisen on the Continent, the World is indebted to the munificence of a few Princes, or to the enthusiasm of religion prompting the Painter to decorate the shrine of his patron saint; but if perfection arose from those sources, what may we not expect from the fostering care of a British Public. To return to our Examination—

No. 359.—The Battle of Trafalgar, as seen from the starboard mizen shrouds of the Victory. J. M. W. Turner, R.A.

One great, and almost universal error, to which our marine Painters are subject, is that of comprising too much on their canvas; this gives a crowding and confused appearance to the works which is very dissimilar to reality. If Mr. Turner were to stand on the poop of the Victory, with a picture frame, the size of his own placed before him, at a proper distance, he would then see, that so many objects could not be crowded together under a small an angle as it would subtend; unless, indeed, the objects were removed to a much greater distance, when, of course, their relative size would be considerably diminished below that in which he has here delineated them. He has also drawn many of the objects with much greater exactness than reality will warrant. In the groupe in particular, which surrounds Lord Nelson on the fore part of the quarter deck, 'tis impossible that the features could appear so well delineated to a person standing on the poop. In this painting also, the ships are much undermasted; indeed they look like three deckers under jury masts. This disproportion is very glaring, and is rendered more so from want of attention to other circumstances. The yards of the Victory, making allowance for the fore-shortening, are not sufficiently square; the tops are too small, in proportion to the size of the ship, and to the size of the people who are represented in them, whilst from the length of the lanyards and the consequent distance of the dead eyes, the main mast rigging seems as if it had never been set up. There are several other errors, which we have not room to notice, yet, in other respects, we must allow it the merit of being well executed though its outline is faulty; the figures are spiritedly done and to those who are not disposed to criticise its linear accuracy it must afford much interest and gratification.

In the center of the room, and opposite to Mr. Turner's painting, is

No. 486.—A Model, by Mr. Wiatt, of a Monument to the Memory of the immortal Nelson.

This Monument stands in the centre of a circular range of steps, and consists of an elegantly ornamented base, on which is a figure of Nelson, supporting a flag, and receiving a wreath from Fame. Beneath him is Death, starting from a shroud, with a hand fixed upon his gallant heart; and behind the base, or pedestal, is Britannia weeping, and resting on her shield, which is decorated with the insignia of his different orders. The figures in chains at the foot of the pedestal fill up the space, with much nature; indeed, all the figures, considered separately, have much sense, and are grouped in a masterly manner. This Monument is designed for a central situation in some public building, and therefore finished entour.

No. 427.—Landscape, a Composition: and No. 438.—Landscape near Arckthovel, B. Barker.

These two Landscapes, from their size and situation, seem designed for companions, and if the painter intended to shew the effect of the contrast, he certainly has succeeded. The first deep valley, with most romantic mountains enlivened by the general light of day, but in some places more strongly tinted by a ray of bright refulgence, breaking from a cloud. This gives a splendour and richness to the composition, rivalling the brightest glow of Lorrain's sun-sets. The general repose in the valley is only disturbed, or indeed rather more strongly marked by the smoke issuing from a habitation "bosom'd high in tufted trees;" and the limpid brightness of the almost quiescent rivulet is finely contrasted by the deep shade of the impending cliff. In the dark shades, and tangled shrubs of this cliff, there is a richness of colouring which starts through the gloom, and shews the painter an accurate observer, in the silent dell, or on the sequestered mountain's side. When we turn from this to 438, it is scarcely possible to believe them the work of the same artist; this is given as a sketch from nature, but if so, it must be nature in her gloomiest dress. There is a good broad light in the sky, but on the ground, all is one sombre shade of darkened brown, without light to enliven, or outline to define the different objects, unless some solitary streaks in the distance may be considered as sufficient for this purpose; and yet there seems to have been much pains taken to tint it into obscurity. We notice this the more particularly because Mr. Barker, in many of his efforts bids fair to rival the happiest specimens of the Italian School.

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF KING'S BENCH, FEB. 16.

THE KING v. D'EGVILLE.

The Attorney-General stated; that this indictment was found against the defendant, who, is ballet-master at the Opera-house, for a malicious assault on the prosecutor, Mr. Waters, the executor of Mr. Gould. It appeared in evidence, that Mr. Waters went to the Opera-house on the 24th October last, and just as he entered the room where the workmen were employed, he heard a dispute between the defendant and one of them respecting a bench. The prosecutor interfered, when the defendant, who is a very powerful man, gave him a knock-down blow.—After which they both obtained warrants from separate Police Offices against each other, and they were bound over to answer the complaints at the Westminster Sessions, but the prosecutor preferred his complaint in this Court.—The Jury, without hesitation, found the defendant guilty.

BLEWSTER v. ROYLE.

The defendant in this case is a lady, living at Rotherhithe.—She had conceived an aversion to the plaintiff, who was servant to her friend, a tallow-chandler, because he stood like a post between her and the direct path, which leads to happiness; on that account she was determined to have him removed, and with that view she called on the master of a press-gang, informed him that the plaintiff was a fit subject to serve his Majesty, and sealed her information with a seven shilling piece. The plaintiff was accordingly taken, but when brought before the Regulating Captain, who knew him, he was discharged, never having been at sea. This action was therefore brought for a malicious assault and false imprisonment, and it was fully substantiated by evidence. The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 10l. with costs.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS, FEB. 20.

JOHN FROST v. SIR F. BURDETT, BART.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover £2,100 of the defendant, said, to be due to him for services at the several contested elections for Middlesex.

Here was a multiplicity of items, such as three guineas a day for attendance at the hustings; five guineas a day as a committee man, &c., and various charges were made of disbursements at public houses, &c. Sir F. Burdett, it appeared, had paid the plaintiff £800, and thinking that sum sufficient, he refused to pay any more. The case lasted the whole of the day, and Sir James Mansfield adjourned the Court until Monday.

OLD BAILEY.

Thursday the Sessions commenced, when William Walker, a soldier in the West Middlesex Militia, was indicted for assaulting Thomas Oldfield on the King's highway, and taking from his person six pence and a penny.—The prisoner was found Guilty of Death.

FRIDAY, FEB. 19.

BIGAMY.—John Cheesely was indicted for having intermarried with Sarah Martin, on the 22d of December last, at Stoke Newington, while his former wife was living at Tottenham.—Both marriages being proved, the Jury found the Defendant Guilty.—Catherine Jennings was capitally convicted of uttering bad silver, at the house of Mr. Miller, a tallow-chandler, in Holborn. The prisoner was convicted of a similar offence in July, 1804. The other trials were destitute of public interest.

SATURDAY, FEB. 20.

A soldier in the Guards of the name of Aymes, was convicted of a robbery in the house of one of the sufferers at the late fire in Princes-street, Westminster. The prisoner was discovered in the house carrying off a bedstead, and on being questioned, he said he had been employed to remove the goods, some of which he offered for sale.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

The General Quarter Sessions of the Peace for the County of Middlesex, commenced on Monday at Hicks's Hall, Clerkenwell, Mr. Mainwaring in the Chair.

William Booth, a gamekeeper to Lord Berkley was indicted for assaulting T. Moore, and forcibly taking from him a ferret. The Prosecutor, Moore, stated, that on the 14th of January he was going on the road leading from Hesson to Uxbridge; he had a bag and a ferret, having had permission from some neighbouring farmers to kill the rabbits on the grounds. He met Booth whom he knew to be gamekeeper to Lord Berkley. Booth asked him what he had got there; he replied a ferret. Booth immediately ordered him to give it up to him; he replied he would not, Mr. Booth immediately knocked him down, and took away the ferret. At the same time he ordered his assistant to search the Prosecutor's brother-in-law, who was in company with him. The Prosecutor told him he would go to a Justice and make complaint against him. Booth replied, if he did not immediately get off as fast as he could, he would give him a worse drubbing. It was argued by the defendant's counsel that a gamekeeper, by law, was authorized to take away a ferret from any person found with it on the manor. But the Court said, there was no legal proof that the Defendant was a gamekeeper. He was found Guilty, and sentenced to one month's imprisonment.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

No advices have yet been received from Admiral Duckworth. The general opinion continues to be, that the Rochefort squadron is destined for the West Indies. On being informed of its course, Sir Samuel Hood dispatched the Dragon, of 74 guns, with the intelligence to Admiral Cochrane. The Dragon is a fine fast sailing ship, and it is supposed that she would reach the Leeward Island station in due time to apprize Admiral Cochrane of the enemy's approach, and sufficiently reinforce his squadron, to enable him successfully to cope with them. The probability therefore is, that one or other of our squadrons must fall in with the enemy.

Sir Samuel Hood arrived in town on Thursday, and had a long interview with Lord Mulgrave, at the Admiralty. The gallant Admiral, we understand, holds out no very sanguine hopes that Sir John Duckworth will be able to come up with the French squadron. He is of opinion, however, that he may reach the West Indies time enough to prevent their doing any mischief.

Sir Sidney Smith, it is now said, has proceeded to the Brasils, to take the command there. The squadron which is to blockade the Tagus is under the command of Sir C. Cotton and Rear-Admiral Otway.

PORT NEWS.

PLYMOUTH, FEB. 15.—The Centaur, 74, Admiral Sir S. Hood, arrived just now. The gallant Admiral is just landed, and set off for London in a post-chaise and four horses. By what we can learn, the Rochefort squadron and Duckworth's squadron in pursuit, is as follow:—A few days before Sir S. Hood left Madeira, the Comus frigate, under his orders, was chased by the Rochefort squadron, and soon after fell in with Vice-Admiral Sir T. Duckworth, in chace of them; both squadrons, it is supposed, are gone on to the West Indies, one in pursuit of the other. If Duckworth get up with them, we have no doubt of the event.

FEB. 17.—Letters received here from the Aigle, of 44 guns, Captain Wolfe, dated the 7th instant, state, that she did not accompany Rear-Admiral Sir R. Strachan, K. B. in his pursuit of the Rochefort squadron, but was left on her old station, to watch the port of L'Orient. By these letters we learn, that the enemy's squadron in L'Orient is in an apparent state of readiness for sea; and from all the intelligence that can be gained from fishing-boats, and other small craft, they are determined to push out to sea the first favourable opportunity.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

The following are among the accidents in and about the metropolis, occasioned by the inclement weather, which has reached us:—Two persons were found dead on Saturday morning, from the intense cold, the one near Bayswater, and the other in St. James's Park. Mrs. Samuel, the wife of a broker, in Westminster, fell down at the corner of Brydges-street, Covent-garden, and broke an arm on Sunday evening. A similar accident befel a young lady, in Soho-square, the same night, who was conveyed to the hospital. A stack of chimnies blew down in the Hampstead-road, on Friday night, and killed a butcher's boy, of the name of Groves, on whom an inquest has been taken; as was also one on the body of Mr. Hartland, of Gower-street, who was killed by the falling of his horse, on Sunday evening, in Oxford-street.

Coroner's Inquest.—An Inquisition was taken at the Load of Hay, on the road to Stevenage, on Tuesday, on the body of Miss Amelia Mary Piggot, who met her death on the preceding day. It appeared in evidence of a Mr. Smith, that he was accompanying the young lady in question from the house of a friend at Merdon, to her home at Croker's End, Middlesex, on Monday; from the heavy fall of snow, the road being imperceptible, the horse went out of his track, and the chaise which they were in, was hurried down a precipice of nine feet from the road, and turned completely over, with a violent crash; Miss Piggot, a promising girl of 18 years of age, was killed on the spot; Mr. Smith, by holding fast to the vehicle, escaped unhurt. The horse was so much hurt as rendered him useless, and was shot.—Accidental Death.

Suicide.—A gentleman, accompanied by an elderly lady, took a coach on Tuesday evening, at the stand, in Oxford-street, near Rathbone-place, when the lady left him, and the gentleman desired to be driven to a coffee-house, in Piccadilly. On the arrival of the coach at the end of Bond-street, the coachman was alarmed by the breaking of one of the windows, and on alighting and opening the door, he found his passenger weltering in blood, he having with a pen-knife cut his throat in a most shocking manner. Inquiry was made at the coffee-house, whither the coachman was ordered to drive, but the unfortunate man was a stranger there. A porter's ticket, which was brought with game to a house in Cleveland-street, and which was found in the pocket of the deceased, led to a knowledge of him.—He proved to be Proprietor of a Cotton Manufactory, in Somersetshire: he had only been four days in London, but was supposed to have met with embarrassments which led him to commit suicide.

Riot at Shadwell.—Thursday afternoon an affray and riot took place at Shadwell. A sailor, in a state of intoxication, passing by the residence of the Lascar seamen, gave one of the latter some offence. A quarrel ensued, and the sailor beat his antagonist, who ran into his quarters. The whole of the Lascars then sallied out to attack the sailor, armed with bludgeons, pokers, &c. The sailor, finding himself likely to be overpowered, fought desperately with a knife in one hand, and a bludgeon in the other. In the scuffle the sailor stabbed one of the Lascars in three parts of his body, and finally effected his escape to a public house. The Lascars then surrounded the house, and brought the sailor out. They would have conveyed him to their quarters, where he would, doubtless have fallen a sacrifice to their fury, had not the funeral train of a Volunteer, which happened to be near, obstructed their progress. The Volunteers, who belonged to one of the Whitechapel corps, hearing the shouts of the Lascars, and being informed of the cause, immediately cut off the retreat of them, by pushing forward with fixed bayonets on each side the street. The Lascars immediately surrendered. They were then made prisoners in their quarters, sentinels being placed before their doors.

Thursday a poor woman was suddenly taken with the pains of labour, and dropped down in Parliament-street. A surgeon and apothecary administered some temporary relief, and some females from the houses near where she fell, helped the poor woman into a coach, and had her conveyed to the Westminster Infirmary.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER NINE.

WAR BETWEEN RUSSIA AND SWEDEN.

The Russian Declaration of War has not yet reached this country; and by consequence we are unacquainted with the pretexts upon which it is grounded. We know, however, the great cause by which this course has been prompted, and no doubt can be entertained that the British attack upon Copenhagen will be held forth as the reason which has induced Russia to make War upon Sweden.

Russia, in this case, is guilty of flagrant injustice.—Sweden has committed no crime against Russia; and because Great Britain has been guilty, in the eyes of Russia, of an act which calls for her resentment, Sweden is condemned to suffer. The vengeance of Russia is wreaked, not against the guilty, if guilt has really been committed, but against the innocent. But why should Sweden be made to suffer because Great Britain has seized the Danish Fleet, and bombarded the Danish Capital? Sweden was in no respect concerned in that transaction. She was no otherwise connected with England, than that she was in Peace with that country. But if that were a reason for declaring War against her, it would be equally a reason for declaring War against America. Sweden, to be sure, is at War with France; but, undoubtedly, that can be no just reason why Russia should make War upon her.

The arguments of Russia, in defence of this procedure, will be found to resolve themselves into a pretended necessity. The unjust attack of England upon the Danes, has compelled her, it will be said, however reluctant, to this strong measure. But this is exactly the reason which Great Britain has urged in defence of the attack upon Denmark. The injustice, and the violent designs of France, have necessitated her, it has been said, to seize the Danish Fleet. This plea, however, Russia has rejected. These constructive necessities, she has said, can never justify a violation of an evident, a fundamental, and an eternal rule of justice. A constructive necessity may, in fact, be employed to justify any thing. It will justify the assassination of the Duke d'Enghien, or the poisoning at Jaffa, as well as the War against Sweden, or the attack on Copenhagen. In fact it cannot be doubted that the necessity of these measures must have appeared to the mind of Bonaparte, fully as urgent upon him, as either of the other measures to the parties who adopted them. Russia, then, is condemned by her own sentence against Britain; and in the name of justice has committed a gross violation of its sacred principles. There is a memorable passage in a remarkable speech of Mr. Pitt, in which the use of necessity, as a plea to justify unlawful conduct, is exposed with high indignation. Having lately read it, the impression which it made was very deep, and we offer it to the consideration of our Readers. In the debate on Mr. Fox's India Bill, on the 18th of Nov. 1783, that lamented Statesman said, "It was true the Bill was said to be founded on ne-" cessity; but what was this? Was it not necessity which "had always been the plea of every illegal exertion of "power, or exercise of oppression? Was not necessity the "pretence of every usurpation? Necessity was the plea for "every infringement of human freedom. It was the "argument of tyrants: it was the creed of slaves."—Of much human calamity has the plea of necessity been the detestable cause. It is therefore a wretched excuse which Russia has to offer in her own behalf, to talk of the necessity under which the injustice of Britain placed her to imitate that injustice.

Condemning, therefore, as we thus do, the War of Russia against Sweden, it is with the deepest sorrow that we contemplate the calamities which it will too certainly inflict upon that feeble and unproductive country. Sweden is perfectly unable to sustain the pressure of a Russian War. The people of this country may delude themselves as they please. They may fancy that the Swedes will resist the Russians, as they fancied, in persevering succession, that the Austrians, then the Prussians, and next the Russians would resist the French. They will find, too, plenty of hireling writers to flatter them in this belief, and to abuse the persons who would lead them into the path of reason. Unfortunate it is that the event, it is far too probable, will deceive their expectations. The whole population of Sweden is scarcely more than three millions of souls. The revenue of Sweden is computed at about a million and a half, which leaves but little for the ordinary expences of Government, after paying the interest of a debt of 10,000,000*l.* This debt, too, is chiefly incurred at Hamburgh, where she has at present no opportunity of borrowing. The whole amount of the forces, both native and foreign, is generally computed at 48,000. The exaggerations which we receive in our Newspapers are ridiculous. We have been told that the troops in Swedish Finland are 25,000, and that 20,000 more may be raised from the population; whereas the whole population of Swedish Finland is only 1,000, as was found by the enumeration made in 1784.

The amount of the force which it may be deemed advisable in this country to send for the protection of Sweden, is not as yet determined. It is a matter of important deliberation. Whatever can serve to protect her high-spirited Sovereign, we seem to owe to his perseverance in the contest which has engaged us to so vast an extent. But it is a sacred obligation on the Councils of this country, to examine deeply what is really for the protection of that unhappy Monarch and his people; and to distinguish it from what can serve only to precipitate him and them into inextricable calamities. Whatever is for their protection, let us do. But if we encourage them, beyond our means of affording them support, to brave the resentment of their powerful antagonists, and to sacrifice the occasions of making their Peace, we shall perform the office of the cruelest enemies, instead of performing the service of wise and discerning friends. It is of infinite consequence, both for us and for the Swedes, at this unhappy moment, that we should determine, with sound judgment, what can really be done for them, and that we should not attempt what there is no likelihood we can perform.

The real statesmen, who should be called to deliberate on this momentous subject, would first endeavour to resolve the question, Whether Great Britain can afford to Sweden the means of waging an effectual war of defence against the enemies who now assail her? Were this question, on probable and satisfactory evidence, determined in the affirmative, they would then put forth every effort to accomplish the object. But were it on equally good evidence determined in the negative, they would entirely abandon this project, and immediately consider what next could be done for this unhappy country. As soon as ever they had, by patient inquiry, satisfied themselves what was the greatest good they could procure for her, abandoning all other hopeless objects, they would bend their whole powers to accomplish this attainable advantage. To leave, however, this clear and manly course, and to make some feeble and drawling attempts towards the highest object, without any satisfactory evidence that they can accomplish any good, is the part of common empirics of office, and according to the stile in which the affairs of all nations are too commonly managed.

France is again about to menace this country with invasion, and it will be altogether inconsistent with what we owe to our own safety to permit any considerable portion of our forces to leave our own shores. Our East India possessions are already threatened with a formidable armament; and it would be to risk the existence of those splendid dominions to place ourselves out of a condition to send an important reinforcement there on the shortest notice, when the march eastward of a Russian or French army begins. That we can, in these circumstances, afford an aid to the warlike, but feeble and disunited Swedes, to enable them to resist the force of the Russian Empire, is surely maintained with signal inconsistency by those who only a twelvemonth ago expected from that Empire an effectual resistance to the gigantic power of France; who even now insist that the Emperor Alexander concluded the Peace of Tilsit without necessity, and that he might still have maintained the contest. The mountains and narrow defiles of Finland are reckoned a powerful barrier. With so great a superiority of force, however, they might soon be penetrated. But, it unfortunately happens that there is a track along the shores of the Finland Gulph, of considerable extent, which opposes little resistance to the march of an army, but a number of insignificant rivers.

The dangers, however, which threaten Sweden are not all on the side of Russia. That there is a perfect possibility of an invasion by a French and Danish Army from Zealand, can never be denied by those who have maintained that a French Army might have passed from Holstein to Zealand, a much wider passage, in spite of the utmost efforts of the British Navy; and who on that ground have vindicated the attack on Copenhagen. But independent of this circumstance, a formidable invasion may unquestionably be made from Norway, which supplies 30,000 men for the Danish army. It cannot be forgotten that only twenty years ago a Norwegian army did invade Sweden, and was only prevented from taking possession of Gottenburgh by the intervention of Mr. Elliott, the British Minister.

If it seems impossible to conclude that any effort which this country can safely make, can enable Sweden to wage a successful War of Defence against the united attacks of Russia, Denmark and France, should these powers be stimulated to engage obstinately in the contest, the question which next remains for the considerate statesman to resolve, is, what is the greatest benefit after this which Great Britain can procure for her. If the question were about Peace absolutely, there would be no difficulty in the deliberation; as there is no doubt that Peace would be granted to Sweden, upon her own application, probably without any diminution of her territory. But then a condition would be annexed to it, that she take part in the War against Britain; and this it is our interest, if possible, to prevent. Now, this it fortunately does not seem altogether impossible, by the prompt exercise of wisdom and discretion, to prevent. Though we cannot put Sweden in a condition to defend herself through all hazards against her united and most powerful enemies; we can enable her to assume such an attitude of resistance, as will make them see it will not be very easy to overcome her. This accordingly it is our duty to do. We should, with the utmost promptitude and energy send to the relief of Sweden such an assistance as we can reasonably spare; we should employ all our wisdom and activity in stimulating and directing the Swedish Government to call forth in the most effectual way the resources of the country; and when we have placed her in the most complete posture of defence possible, and when her enemies see before them the difficulties which they must overcome, then we should open for her a negociation, and then, in all probability, Peace for her might be procured, and her neutrality preserved inviolate. Even with the knowledge that they would ultimately subdue her, the sight of real and serious obstacles would weigh deeply with her enemies, and lead them to balance the possible gains with the obvious losses. It may be taken for granted that not one of the hostile parties would wish to see Sweden absolutely subdued, except Russia alone. To her the dominion of Sweden, or at least the more important part of it, would necessarily fall. France, however, has no inclination to see the power of Russia aggrandised by so very important an acquisition. And as to Denmark, there are few things of which she has more reason to stand in dread. If Russia were in possession of Sweden, Norway would become a very precarious possession, and the command of the Sound must be instantly abandoned. In the state of defence, therefore, which we have described, there is every reason to suppose, from the known interests of the hostile parties, that reasonable terms of Peace might be procured for Sweden. But if we shall foolishly hold out vapouring pretences of a complete and absolute defence, and shall encourage Sweden to hold the language of defiance and irritation, the combined enemy may be urged from the dictates of offended pride, and from the motive of baffling, mortifying, and exposing Britain, to engage in a determined and exterminating warfare. In that case the doom of Sweden is sealed. No efforts in the power of this country can prevent it.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. IX.

EXAMINATION OF MR. COBBETT'S ATTACK ON MR. ROSCOE'S PAMPHLET.

In our last Number we have seen that Mr. Cobbett, in his strange attempt to prove that War is a good, affirmed, "that "War makes a part of the great scheme of the Creator." In this rash assertion so much impiety is involved, it conveys such an imputation against the divine Government, that it urgently demands a few more reflections. We beg, however, it may be distinctly understood, that we do not accuse Mr. Cobbett of intentional impiety. We do not believe he is of the number of those infidels who are at pains to represent the divine Government as imperfect, for the sake of ridiculing the doctrine of a superintending Providence. We believe it was entirely his ignorance of the tendency of his argument, which led him into this irreverent and irreligious language. There is, however, a rashness in thus meddling with divine things beyond the reach of a man's understanding and knowledge, which is severely to be reprehended. And there is a levity and audacity in the manner of Mr. Cobbett's meddling, which seems little accordant either with right sentiments or right feelings in regard to religion.

Mr. Cobbett says, that War forms a part of the scheme of the Creator, because War, and a propensity to War, are found to exist. To this we answer, that vice, by the same argument, must form part of the scheme of the Creator, because vice, and a propensity to vice, are found to exist; therefore the Creator, for the same reason, is the author of sin. Did we not with justice then say, that the argument by which Mr. Cobbett would prove War to be a good, is full of blasphemy?

Shall we follow out Mr. Cobbett's argument? It is absurd, he says, to rail against War in general, since it forms part of the scheme of the Creator. For the very same reason, we say, it must be absurd to rail against vice, for the one forms part of the scheme of the Creator just as much as the other. It will be Mr. Cobbett's next task to chastise, therefore, our divines and moralists, who, in their sermons and discourses, arraign vice in general, as well as in all its particular shapes and completion.

Disease forms part of the general scheme of the Creator; therefore, according to the wisdom of Mr. Cobbett, the physicians are a parcel of rogues and blockheads, who set themselves in opposition to a good. Disease too gives occasion to the exercise of many virtues as well as War. It is one of the most signal trials of patience in the sufferer, and of humanity in those who surround him. When Mr. Cobbett, therefore, says that without War we should have no courage and magnanimity, we may say, with equal evidence, that without disease we should have no patience and humanity. Dr. Jenner, therefore, must be a worse offender than Mr. Roscoe. What a precious stock of elevation, fortitude, and magnanimity, (if these are the offspring of war alone) must Bonaparte have, and Bonaparte's people? The Algerines are perpetually at war with all the world. What a noble and magnanimous race they are! Till within the last fifty years, Italy had been for centuries a perpetual scene of war and bloodshed; yet the Italians are the most pusillanimous and ignoble people in Europe. It is only about fifty years since the Russians became connected with the politics of Europe, or were ever involved in wars; yet the readiness and obstinacy of their courage may be compared with that of any people on earth. Mr. Cobbett instances England and France, the most noble minded nations, he says, in Europe, as the nations which have been most engaged in wars. Here again he is grossly deceived. The population of those countries have seen less of war than the population of almost any other country in Europe. From their strength or their position all their war has been for centuries carried on abroad and they have been able to repel its horrors from their own soil. All they have known of war has been from its rumours, or from the conscriptions, ballots, and taxes required for carrying it on. There will surely not be regarded among the ennobling circumstances, if experience be accurately consulted it will be found, that wherever nations have been habitually engaged in wars for such a length of time as to create a national character, and not with a pittance of the population, selected as an army, but with the whole as a people, they will be found the most base, treacherous, cruel race on the face of the earth, devoid of generosity, devoid of magnanimity, devoid of honesty, and devoid of truth. We know not one exception to this rule in the whole experience of history, except the Romans, and even this is apparent only; for the Romans owed their virtues to causes very different from their wars. As to the Greeks, it is only the ignorance of Mr. Cobbett, which could have led him to quote them. They attained all their virtues in a period of Peace, and when they became involved in perpetual and bloody Wars, they lost them with a rapidity of which there is hardly any example. War, demonstratively, is as injurious to the virtue as to the happiness of mankind; and they, whose ignorance, whose passions, or whose interests induce them to make efforts to lessen the natural horror with which all good men naturally regard it, are so far most pernicious members of society, and cannot be too zealously opposed.

Mr. Cobbett, too, has an excellent hand at construing the English language. An admirable opportunity is afforded him by the assertion of Ministers in the King's declaration, "that the "Negotiation of 1806 was broken off upon points, immediately "affecting, not his Majesty's own interests, but those of his "Imperial Ally." By means of the word immediately, Mr. Cobbett makes this sentence signify just what he pleases,— "The word immediately," he says, "so qualifies what follows, "as to give to the declaration a meaning, which plainly is, "that, though, as to the interests of England, there were great "differences, yet, it happened, that it was upon points more "immediately connected with the interests of Russia, that the "negotiation was broken off." Well done, Mr. Cobbett! Lord Peter himself was hardly better at making out a meaning to his own purpose than this! There is something inverted, and rhetorical, in the arrangement of the sentence in the declaration, which seems to have confounded Mr. Cobbett. Let us put it in the natural order, and then we shall more clearly see what is its necessary construction. "The negotiation of 1806 was "broken off upon points immediately affecting the interests of "his Majesty's Imperial Ally, not his Majesty's own interests." In the first clause it is distinctly asserted that the negotiation was broken off upon points immediately affecting the interests of the Emperor of Russia; the meaning of which unquestionably is, otherwise the observation would have been nugatory and absurd, that but for those points affecting the Emperor of Russia, the negotiation needed not have been broken off. Mr. Cobbett has put in the word more, to answer his own ends, as if the word immediately, standing in opposition, as it does here, were ever opposed to the word less. It is opposed to the word mediately, and the meaning is, that the Negotiation was broken off upon points which concerned immediately the interests of Russia, and only mediately, or secondarily, the interests of Britain. What were those points? These will best teach us the meaning of the expression. Why, Dalmatia chiefly, which added, or rather was supposed to add, immensely to the power and consequence of Russia; but added to our power and consequence only, by keeping power and consequence out of the hands of our enemy. When Ministers tell the Emperor of Russia that the Negotiation was broken off upon points immediately affecting His interests, not those of their Royal Master, they surely do not mean that it was broken off upon points affecting the Emperor's interests, and also upon other points along with these; because such an observation would have had no force whatever in their remonstrance. This was certainly not doing for an Ally any thing of which there was the smallest occasion to boast. But if they could say, as they did, that Great Britain had forborne to make a Peace, when she could have made it on terms safe and honourable to herself, because she could not obtain terms satisfactory to her Ally, this was an act of stedfast adherence, of which there was the justest reason to boast. The Ministers did not, according to your construction, Mr. Cobbett, tell the Emperor of Russia that we could not, to be sure, have made Peace on account of points affecting ourselves, but He truly had the mighty advantage of having the negotiation stopped when it came to the points more immediately affecting him. This was a benefit, this was an act of heroic and honourable attachment which ought to have made his Imperial Majesty blush at the facility with which he has turned his back upon us! We might excuse Mr. Cobbett for missing the construction of a complicated sentence; but these obvious circumstances ought to have made him see that his paraphrase was at variance with the context.

THE BRITISH PRINCES.

At a moment like the present, when all Europe is in arms, and when the flames of war and devastation seem spreading fast on every side, it appears the duty of every man to step forward in the line of his profession, or in the active exercise of his powers, to aid and assist his country. These are no common times; it is not now, that the many are to be defended by the few; every thing is at stake: our friends, our fortunes, our civil and religious liberties, are assailed, and in them is assailed every thing dear and valuable to man, yet left in Europe. But we need not confine ourselves to Europe alone; the whole world may be affected by the triumph, or even by the preponderance of a new regime, which seems formed to return us to ancient barbarism, and to destroy that social system which has taken ages to nurture to maturity. Under such circumstances, elevation of rank calls for a more conspicuous and decided part, and happy are we to observe that on all occasions the manly and rising hopes of the House of Brunswick have manifested an alertness in the exercise of their military and social duties, and a wish to place themselves on a level with the Henry's and Edwards of old, that is highly creditable to their feelings as men and as British Princes.

Conspicuous as they are from their rank, and exposed as they must be to the shafts of obloquy, or to the malignant attack of cold sneering censure, we would feel pleased to extend our observations to the several periods in which their desire to serve their country has brought them into public notice; but our limits will only allow us to call the attention of our readers to the remonstrances of the Heir Apparent to the active services of the Commander in Chief, the offered and repeatedly offered services of a Naval Prince, and the honourable details of the conduct of several of the younger Branches. We feel ourselves more particularly called to these observations from an event of the past week:—when Gibraltar was threatened with an attack, and all Europe seem interested in the fate of a Fortress, which had before so nobly resisted the combined forces of Spain and France, it was natural to enquire, "who is the Governor? who shall now reap another "crop of glorious laurels in the defence of this Rock, the "boast of Britain, and the humiliation of Spain?". When to such a question the answer is, "a British Prince commands"—every heart that wishes well to Britain, must pant with ardour for the expected Siege. How keen then must [illegible], how bitter must be our disappointment, [illegible] glorious occasion is withheld, and [illegible]ary to his anxious wish, is forbid to [illegible]tant and most trying duties of his

Of his courage, his gallantry, there can be no doubt; the reports of his brother soldiers where he has been on service, all speak highly in his favour; 'tis true, until the year 1794, he had no opportunity of distinguishing himself by active exertions, but in that year, his conduct in the West Indies, whither he went from Halifax, at his own solicitation, speaks more than volumes in his favour.—Every public dispatch mentions his name with credit; in a letter from the late lamented Earl Grey, we find the following passage.

"Major-General Prince Edward, joined this army, the "4th instant, and commands at Camp La Coste, with great "spirit and activity."

Immediately after this, as the point of honour, and of marked approbation, his Royal Highness took possession of Fort Bourbon on its surrender.

At the attack on St. Lucia, his Highness landed with the Grenadier Brigade at Marigot, and was particularly active in the affair of that night, taking possession of Morne Fortunée, and receiving the highest encomiums from the Commander in Chief, for the "examplary conduct of his "Brigade."

At the subsequent reduction of Guadaloupe, his Highness, as usual, distinguished himself by his strict attention to duty, and by his spirited exertions at Palmiste and Trois Rivieres; at the former of which places, though the Gazettes are silent on the subject, it is well remembered by those who served with him, how arduous the duty was, in leading the Grenadiers up a precipice at all times difficult, but then almost insurmountable from the rain of the preceding evening. To the rapidity of this movement, by which the enemy were unexpectedly taken in flank, we were indebted for the speedy surrender of Basseterre.

With such claims to confidence, we are the more surprized at the result of an application of his Royal Highness for leave to proceed to his Government, and we shall now give the article alluded to without farther comment.

"Kensington-Palace, Feb. 21, 1808.

"Although the Duke of Kent flatters himself that the Officers of the British Army, with whom he has had the good fortune of serving in the Mediterranean, America, and the West Indies will do him the justice to believe, that his absence from Gibraltar at this time, when that fortress is menaced by a formidable attack of the enemy, is not owing to any backwardness on his part to repair to that station to which his duty calls him, or for want of his using his utmost exertions to be allowed to resume the active command of his Government, he feels that he owes it to his own character, no less as a man than as a soldier, to make known to them, to the whole army, and to his countrymen in general, the terms on which he felt it his duty to address His Majesty upon this subject, immediately upon the arrival of the last accounts from Gibraltar, and trusts, that when these have been perused he shall stand acquitted in the opinion of his Brother Officers of the Army, and of his Countrymen, of having been deficient in his duty.

"SIR—The letters received by the Mail just arrived from the Mediterranean, having brought the certain information that orders had reached Algeziras from Madrid, immediately to make such preparations in the neighbourhood of Gibraltar as to put beyond doubt the intention of the enemy to besiege it, I could not, under such circumstances, reconcile it to my feelings were to delay a moment in not only assuring your Majesty of my readiness instantly to go out there, but in earnestly soliciting your sanction for my resuming the duties attached to the Commission I have the honour of holding as Governor of that Fortress.

"To your Majesty, who yourself possess so nice a sense of honour, it is quite unnecessary for me to represent, that on the results of your decision upon this request, which I beg leave the most dutiful, yet in the strongest manner, to press upon your attention, every thing most dear to me in life, I mean my character as a man, and my professional credit as a soldier, are at stake. I will not therefore presume to say more, than that I place the in your Majesty's hands, with no less confidence in your justice as my Sovereign, than in your indulgence as my Parent.

"With every sentiment of the most devoted attachment, and the most dutiful respect, I have the honour to subscribe myself,

"Your Majesty's most affectionate Son,

"And most faithful Servant and Subject,

"To the King." (Signed) "EDWARD"

"The Duke of Kent conceives that it would superfluous to add any observations upon the foregoing lines, except that he is not going out to Gibraltar, that being a sufficient explanation of the result of his application, and his sole motive of intruding the perusal of them upon the Public at this time, being that of clearing his own character from the aspersions that must unavoidably attach to it in consequence of his absence from his Government at such a moment as the present one, were it conceived to be voluntary on his part, or that he had been passive on the occasion."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

FROM THE FRENCH PAPERS.

PARIS, FEB. 4.—We read in the Moniteur of this day the following Article:—"The King of England, in his Message to Parliament, laments, that the Court of Vienna should have declared war without making known its motives, and without setting forth its grievances. As there are in this Message several assertions that are unfounded, we suppose that this also is equally incorrect. The following are some paragraphs, literally extracted from the dispatches of the Court of Vienna, which we must believe, that its Minister made known to the Court of London.

"The Court of London only answered by the refusal of the mediation of Russia—a refusal confirmed at the same time by the expedition to Zealand—a measure which, was an aggression on the rights of neutral nations, and accompanied by official declarations, diametrically in opposition to the principles adopted by the other Great Courts * * * * * *."

"Let the Court of London declare sincerely its readiness to enter into negociations for a maritime peace, on a basis suitable to the reciprocal interests of the Powers who may take a part in it. And as a preliminary testimony of its intentions in this respect, let it declare that it will not refuse to consider the hostile measures that it has taken against the Danish Court, as well as the declarations with which they were accompanied.

"It is certainly impossible to pronounce grievances in a manner more express. If the Cabinet of London were not acquainted with what the Cabinet of Vienna complained of, it is certainly owing to their desire of remaining in ignorance."

On the expression of Lord Hawkesbury, that Ministers had received information of the designs of France from the Irish, the Editor says—"This merits an observation, because it is a Member of the Cabinet who speaks.—You hold communication, then, with a traitor—and do you not yet know what confidence one ought to place in a traitor? The credulity of the English Government—and its confidence in traitors of all descriptions—are inconceivable.—We are authorized to announce, that but a few weeks will pass over before Europe shall have new proofs of this credulity and this confidence: but these traitors shall, by and bye, reveal you information, if they are really in the way of procuring it, which you will not disclose."

On Lord Hawkesbury's assertion, that France had proposed to Portugal to make common cause with Europe against England, the Note is—"This is, above all, absurd, and perfectly false."

These Notes say, that our Subsidies to Austria are now in the Bank at Paris, as our Subsidies to Sweden will soon be in the Bank of St. Petersburgh—They hold up to ridicule the debates in our Parliament—and exclaim, "Shades of Fox and Pitt, where are you?"

The Moniteur speaks of the magnificent reception of their Minister at St. Petersburgh, as the proper return for the distinction shewn to Monsieur de Tolstoy, at Paris.

Prussia is mentioned with some sort of pity the most contemptuous; but the Moniteur says, that the Right Bank of the Vistula is totally evacuated by the French. There have been pamphlets and libels published against the Prussian Nobility, as if to prepare the minds of the people for their degradation.

The Danes are spoken of in the highest terms of applause; and it seems resolved that Sweden shall be extinguished.

The statement in the King's Speech concerning Portugal is thus noticed:—"His Majesty rejoices in the prospects of the re-establishment of his Ally in the new world with augmented strength and splendour. And whence will this augmentation of strength and splendour come to a fugitive Prince, who abandons three millions of subjects, the country of his ancestors, one of the finest countries, and one of the most beautiful capitals of Europe, in order to reign over 300,000 Europeans, scattered over vast desarts: If this be not cruel irony, we wish the King of England a like augmentation of force and splendour. Let him choose the East or the West Indies, we do not think that France has the intention of opposing it. Is it possible, in truth, to make a Sovereign speak with less dignity?"

The Moniteur makes the following observations on the capitulation of Madeira:—"The capitulation perfectly explains the manner in which his Britannic Majesty intends to treat his allies; why did he begin by seizing on Madeira? Is it to secure to the Prince of Brazil augmented strength and splendour, that he takes from him one of the possessions which still remained to him? If he considers him his ally, why does he not trust to him for the defence of Madeira? Do the English ministry fear that France should seize on that Island? They will, perhaps, say so; but they do not think so. It is at the very moment when his Britannic Majesty wrests Madeira from his Ally, that he implores for himself the protection of Divine Providence. When we see what is done in England—when we hear what is said in Parliament—we are tempted to think that England has need of the aid of another Dr. Willis."

PRUSSIA.

BERLIN, JAN. 21.—The plan for the new organization of the Prussian Army is entirely finished. There will be a general conscription totally new. The Army is to be entirely composed of natives; in consequence, all foreigners, whether officers, subalterns, or soldiers, will be diminished; the regiments will have only Colonel. There will be only two Captains of the Staff of each regiment; the Quarter-masters and Almoners will be suppressed; there will be Almoners only in time of war.

PORTUGAL.

LISBON, JAN. 15.—On the 13th of December, the French flag was hoisted on all the fortresses, under a discharge of a great many guns. The Marquis of Lorna, is appointed by Junot, Commander in Chief of all the Portuguese forces, on the North side of the Tagus, and Gomes Freire is appointed by the Spanish General, to the same command on the opposite side. The French on their march through the country killed all the bullocks the farmers had for working on their lands, in consequence of which they cannot be cultivated; a glorious proof too of the humanity of these self-named protectors. It is said the French army has lost no less than 6,000 men, since they passed the frontiers; the peasantry have killed an immense number; and it is thought the people would have risen in mass upon them, but for the exhortation of the Heads of the Church, who are suborned by Junot. The army is reviewed every Sunday by Junot, who is then mounted on the horse, which was only destined for the image of St. George, on the day of the grand procession of Corpus de Deos. The Hanoverian troops attached to the army, are on board the hulks, in the river. Many naval officers arrived here with the army, and the works in the Dock-yard go on briskly. The Russian ships have dropped down to Belem, in a line of battle, the English officers in their fleet have not as yet given up their commissions. The Russians are never seen to associate with the French. No neutral vessel is permitted to sail without paying the exhurbitant price of a hundred pounds sterling for a pass. The French are going to enforce another contribution on the inhabitants of this devoted city; of the first contribution of about two hundred thousand pounds, one of the principal Portugese merchants was compelled to pay near ten thousand: at the house of this person Junot has fixed his head-quarters; the expenditure of Junot's table amounts daily to about a hundred pounds, which this merchant has also to pay. One hundred and twenty of the clerks of the Treasury have been dismissed. As yet the Spaniards have not hoisted any colours, nor taken any steps to oppress these miserable people, for such they may now truly be called. The British subjects who had not the means of quitting Lisbon with their fellow countrymen, had, a few days previous to the entry of the French, found protection on board the Russian squadron. This was effected through the medium of the English Officers on board that fleet, before it was known that hostilities had commenced between England and Russia. The circumstance, however, having come to the knowledge of General Junot, he demanded of the Russian Admiral that the refugees should be delivered up without delay. A Council was held upon the subject on board the squadron, by whom it was determined, that the demand could not be complied with consistently with the honour and character of the Russian navy, without an order from the Court of St. Petersburgh.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, FEB. 22.

Counsel were heard in the Scotch Appeal, Crawford v. Patrick.

The Malt Duty Bill went through a Committee.

A Petition was presented from the Insolvent Debtors in the gaol of Appleby, and ordered to lie on the table.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEB. 23.

The Malt Duty Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Bank Three Million Loan Bill, and Unclaimed Dividends' Bill, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

Lord Hawkesbury laid on the table a return to the order for laying information before the House respecting the execution of the French Decree of Blockade with increased rigour; and also a variety of papers relative to the American Treaty, &c.—Ordered to be printed.

On the motion for the second reading of the American Intercourse Bill,

Lord Auckland said he should not advert to the instructions of the Treaty of 1795, which had taken place on the other side of the Atlantic; nor to the inconsistency of Ministers in bringing in this Bill after the decided opinions which they had formerly expressed on this subject. The 37th of the King, which this Bill professed to continue, would be violated most materially by the new imposts proposed. There was, in violation of the Treaty, to be imposed an addition of 20 per cent. on tobacco, and about 40 per cent. on rice, exported. Wine, brandy, &c. exported to America, would also be liable to a heavy duty, though by the Treaty she was to enjoy the same exemptions as our own colonies. The duty of 2s. per ton on vessels brought in under the Orders in Council, and the compelling American vessels bound from Europe to the East Indies, to go into the East India Dock, were also at variance with the stipulations of the Treaty, and of course with the provisions of the present Bill.

Lord Bathurst stated that there would be found no inconsistency in the proceedings alluded to. The American Intercourse Act, passed last Session, would expire on the 1st of March. The Bill now before their Lordships did no more, in effect, than to prevent that Act from expiring before the other measures in their progress in the other House had received the sanction of the Legislature.

The Bill was then read a second time.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 24.

Heard Counsel in the Scotch appeal Crawford v. Patrick.

The Bank Three Million Loan Bill, and Unclaimed Dividends Bills, were read a second time.

The American Intercourse Bill went through a Committee.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB. 25.

The Unclaimed Dividends Bill, and Bank Three Million Loan Bill, went through a Committee.

Lord Bathurst rose to move the second reading of the Brazil Trade Bill. The only object of the measure was to make such an alteration in the general Navigation Laws as to admit the produce of the Brazils, when imported in Portuguese ships, on the same footing as if imported in British vessels; or, in other words, to place the Colony, under the present circumstances, in the same relation towards us as the Mother Country.

Lord Auckland did not mean to oppose the measure under the present circumstances, but the subject would require the most serious investigation whenever it came to be considered with a view to a permanent arrangement. The imports from the Brazils must enter most materially into competition with those from our own colonies. The Brazils furnished for exportation yearly, about 73,000 hogsheads of sugar, and 24,000,000 lbs. of cotton. The produce of all our colonies was, of the former article, 280,000 hogsheads, of the latter 16,000,000 lbs. It, therefore, struck him as a policy extremely questionable, to give facility and encouragement to the importation of foreign colonial produce to such an extent, at a period when we had a dead surplus of 80,000 hogsheads of sugar, and immense quantities of other commodities lying in the West India Dock Warehouses. He did not think the evil would be removed by the permission to distil from sugar; for, if the distilleries were confined to that article alone, the demand would not exceed 12,000 hogsheads.

Lord Hawkesbury stated the purpose of the Bill to be no more than that of placing the colony, which had now become the seat of the Portuguese Government, in the same situation with the mother country.—The Bill was read a second time.

Lord Lauderdale moved that the paper containing information relative to the more rigorous execution of the French Decree of the 21st of November, should be printed.

Lord Hawkesbury thought that every purpose for which the paper had been required, would be answered by its being laid on the table; and by not giving it further publicity, the inconvenience of deterring commercial men from communicating intelligence to Government might be avoided.

The motion was put and negatived; as was also a motion by Lord Lauderdale, for a Copy of a Report from an officer of the French Custom-house at Antwerp, relative to the execution of the Decree of the 21st of November.—This was the suppressed document to which his Lordship previously referred.

On the suggestion of Lord Auckland, the third reading of the American Intercourse Bill was postponed to Tuesday next.

Lord Carlisle directed their Lordships' attention to the Order in Council of the 25th of November, as bearing upon the Act 7th of the King, respecting the trade to and from the Isle of Man. By the Act, teas, wine, &c. could not be exported from that island but to Great Britain; whereas the Orders in Council permitted the free exportation of all articles legally imported. His Lordship contended, that this was an assumption of a dispensing power, and urged Ministers to apply for an Act of Indemnity; conceiving that the breach of the law committed was the result of inadvertency. He concluded with proposing a Resolution, declaring the regulation referred to a manifest breach of the law.

The Lord Chancellor contended, that the words of the Order did not carry the meaning annexed to them by the Noble Lord, and therefore that no violation of law had taken place. They bore reference not to the 7th of the King, but to the Order in Council of the 11th of November.—The motion was negatived without a division.

In answer to repeated questions from Lords Auckland and Lauderdale, Lord Bathurst stated, that under the Orders in Council the Americans could not export enemy's colonial produce direct from America to Sweden.

Several alterations were then made in the order of discussion of the different notices of motions before the House. Among these the second reading of the Debtor and Creditor Bill was postponed to Friday fortnight.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 26.

The Ten Millions and a Half Exchequer Bills Bill, Petty-Customs-Surveyorship Abolition Bill were read a third time.

The Unclaimed Dividends Bill, and Bank Three Million Loan Bill, were read a third time and passed.

Lord Hawkesbury laid on the table a copy of the Correspondence between Lord Grey and the Hon. Mr. Stewart, elucidating the policy of the late Administration with regard to Russia.—It was ordered to be printed.

Lord Lauderdale moved for an Account of the Ships sent to the British Ports under the late Orders in Council; and also those permitted to re-sail, under bonds, with a statement of the conditions and penalties thereof.—Ordered.

Lord Bathurst moved the third reading of the American Intercourse Bill, which stood provisionally for this evening or Tuesday.

Some conversation ensued between Lords Auckland, Bathurst, Grenville, and Hawkesbury, when the Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEB. 27.

The Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Malt Provisions, and Officers Duties Bills, the Bill for regulating the issue of Money from the Treasury, for paying Exchequer Bills, the Bank Unclaimed Dividend Bill, the American Treaty and Continuation Bill, the Curates Suspension Repeal Bill, and several private Acts. The Commissioners were the Lord Chancellor, the Duke of Montrose, and Lord Walsingham.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, FEB. 22.

Mr. Villiers made a report from the Dublin University Election Committee, in consequence of which the Committee was allowed to adjourn till convened by the Speaker's warrant.

An Account was presented from the Office of the Chamberlain of London, shewing the expenditure of the City in keeping Blackfriars'-bridge in repair, and in improving the entrances to the City by Temple Bar and Snow-Hill.

Mr. Wharton brought up the Report of the Committee of Ways and Means of Friday, granting a duty on Salt exported to the Continent.

Mr. Perceval stated, that he intended to relinquish that duty, so far as it regarded salt exported to America, and to any territory on the Continent which might be, or might become in amity with his Majesty. The resolutions were then agreed to; as were likewise resolutions prohibiting the exportation of cotton wool.

Col. Stanley presented a Petition from a number of inhabitants, manufacturers of Great and Little Bolton, in Lancashire, praying the House to advise his Majesty to use every means and opportunity for restoring the blessings of Peace.

Mr. Canning said he had no objection to the Petition, and Ministers would certainly keep such applications in their eye. He had every feeling of commiseration for the privations under which the petitioners laboured. Still he must contend, that those who were entrusted with the Executive Government, were invested with the responsibility of commencing a negociation or not, and it was a point of some consideration, whether or not, if a negociation was to begin, it would terminate in a Treaty of Peace. The Petition was ordered to lie on the table.

Several Papers, respecting the conduct of Sir Home Popham, while in India, in 1787, were presented.

Mr. Ponsonby wished to know from Ministers, as they had stated on the first day of the Session, that it was likely a Subsidiary Treaty would soon be concluded between this country and Sweden—whether there was any prospect of such a treaty, and whether any money had been advanced to that Monarch.

Mr. Canning stated, that the only reason for the silence of Ministers on this subject, was the non-arrival of intelligence from the Continent. Within these few days Mails had arrived from Gottenburgh, and they announced that such a treaty had been signed between that country and England; it was daily expected to arrive here, and he should then have the honour of submitting it to the House. A sum of money had been advanced to the King of Sweden in contemplation of that treaty.

In a Committee of Ways and Means, a resolution was agreed to, prohibiting the exportation of cotton wool and Jesuits bark. The report was received, and a Bill was ordered to be brought in accordingly.

On the question for bringing up the Report of the Bill for carrying into effect the late Orders in Council,

Mr. Tierney rose, and objected to the farther progress of the Bill, as if had not originated according to an Order of the House of 1772, which enacted, that all measures relating to trade should originate in a Committee of Trade and Commerce. He contended, that a Committee of Ways and Means was not the competent authority for the institution of such a Bill.

Mr. Perceval replied, there was no necessity for a Committee of Trade to afford a ground for the Bill. He admitted, in regard to commercial regulations, a Committee of Trade was necessary; but this was a different thing—this was a Committee of Ways and Means imposing duties, which was the only competent authority for the imposition of taxes.

Some conversation arose, in the course of which Mr. Tierney suggested the propriety of dividing the Bill into two. This was acceded to by Mr. Perceval, and the Report was brought up. The Bill was then ordered to be recommitted on Wednesday.

Mr. Horner moved, that the order for taking into further consideration the Petition complaining of an undue Election and Return for the Borough of Great Grimsby be discharged, on the ground that the Petitioner had not, within fifteen days, presented to the Clerk of the House an account, specifying his qualification to a seat in that House.

The Solicitor General resisted the motion, contending that if a Petition against a return was presented, it was out of the power of the House to get quit of it in such a way. The motion was negatived.

THE OUDE PAPERS.

Lord Folkestone moved the Order of the Day for the House taking into consideration the Oude Papers. On the question being put,

Mr. Creevey rose, and in a speech of some length expressed a wish that the Noble Lord would consent to the postponement of the discussion on these papers, which involved matters of great and high importance. His reason for wishing this was, that this subject was connected not only with one transaction of Lord Wellesley, but that it embraced a period of 17 years, touching the conduct of Sir John Shore, the late Marquis Cornwallis, and Lord Wellesley. The matter now brought forward by the Noble Lord, concerned only the Treaty between Lord Wellesley and the Nabob of Oude, who had dethroned that Prince, surrounded him with troops, and taken from him a considerable portion of his territory, having instructed the Resident at Lucknow to do so, telling him to take for his model the Treaty of Tanjore, and other Treaties made with different Powers in India. He was therefore of opinion that a Committee ought to be appointed to examine the conduct of Lord Wellesley generally, and to report the same to the House.

The House divided on the proposition of Mr. Creevey, which was carried.—For it 210—Against it 34. The further consideration therefore stands over till Tuesday March 1.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, FEB. 23.

On the motion of Mr. H. Thornton, the Bill for the better Assessing and Collecting the Poor Rates, for the parish of Saint Saviour, Southwark, was read a second time, and referred to a Committee, consisting of the Hon. Gentleman, Sir T. Turton, and the Members for the Home Counties.

Mr. Maddox moved for an account of all Coals and Culm, on which duties had been paid, carried coastways from London to other ports, for three years, ending the 1st of January, 1808, and also for an account of the quantity of Coals and Culm Imported within the said period, from foreign ports.

In a Committee on the Act of the 46th of the King, relative to the Distillation of Spirits in quantities not less than 50,000 gallons. Leave was given, on the Report being brought up, to bring in a Bill for amending the said Act.

Mr. Foster obtained leave to bring in a Bill for Regulating the Issue of small Notes, under the value of 20s, and for Preventing the Forgery of Bank-Tokens, in Ireland.

Mr. Canning presented the Information received by Ministers, respecting the further enforcement of the French Decree of the 21st of November, 1806. Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Wharton brought up a Report from the Committee of Ways and Means, imposing the like duties on goods exported from Ireland to the Continent, as those imposed on goods exported from Great Britain. Bill ordered.

The Petty Customs Offices Abolition Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 24.

Mr. Fawkener, the Clerk of the Privy Council, presented a Copy of the Memorial by Sir Home Popham to his Majesty, praying restoration of the proceeds of the ship Etrusco, condemned as lawful prize by the High Court of Admiralty. Ordered, on the motion of Mr. Lushington, to be printed.

A new writ was ordered for a Burgess to serve for Truro, in the room of Mr. Boscawen, now Viscount Falmouth, called up to the House of Peers.

Sir E. Knatchbull presented a petition from twelve respectable Magistrates of Kent, praying a Repeal of an Act of last Session, for the recovery of small debts in Dartford and Gravesend.—Laid on the table.

Mr. Mellish obtained leave to bring in a Bill preventing the damaging of raw hides, in the cities of London and Westminster, and the borough of Southwark.

General Gascoigne presented a petition from the African merchants at Liverpool, praying a loan of 18,000l.—Laid on the table.

Lord Castlereagh brought down a Message from his Majesty, stating, the Sovereign's having taken into his royal consideration the eminent services of the late Lord Lake in Europe and in India, being desirous of conferring upon the present Lord Lake, and his two immediate heirs male, a pension of 2000l. per annum, and requested the House to enable his Majesty to do the same in the way most fitting. Ordered to be taken into further consideration on Friday next, in a Committee of the whole House; when the Noble Lord gave notice, he should move an Address to his Majesty, for the erection of a monument, to perpetuate the memory and services of the late Lord Lake.

Mr. Calcraft wished to know whether the squadron under the command of Sir R. Strachan, had been compelled to move from Basque Roads, on account of a scarcity of provisions, as by that gallant Admiral being obliged to relinquish that station, the Rochefort squadron had escaped to sea.

Mr. Sheridan replied that neither himself nor Mr. Whitbread had such information, neither did they understand that there was any thing like a dearth of provisions on board the squadron of the gallant Admiral. The Hon. Gentleman, if he wished for information, ought to bring forward a specific motion.

Mr. Calcraft fixed Tuesday next for so doing.

Mr. Perceval then called the attention of the House, pursuant to a notice, to the embarrassed state of the West India trade. One point struck him, for alleviating the present state of difficulty under which the West India trade laboured, was the encouragement in home consumption of West India produce, by distillation from sugar and molasses. He moved for the appointment of a Committee to examine the state of the West India Trade, and report its opinion thereon to the House. Ordered.

TRADE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. Tierney rose, in pursuance of his notice, to move that the House should resolve into a Committee on the Trade and Navigation Act, in order that a full opportunity might be afforded for an ample discussion of the merits of the late Orders in Council, which he contended had undergone no serious discussion whatever; and concluded by moving that the House, on Thursday se'nnight, resolve itself into a Committee on the trade and navigation of the country.

Mr. Perceval defended the submitting of the Orders in Council to a Committee of Ways and Means, as a perfectly correct mode of proceeding. In the Committee on the Orders in Council Bill, all that was to be done was to leave out a clause discovered to be unconnected with the objects of that Bill.

Dr. Lawrence supported Mr. Tierney.

Mr. Tierney replied to the arguments of Mr. Perceval; and the Speaker delivered his opinion on the propriety of the Bill originating in a Committee of Ways and Means, as it imposed duties on the exportation of goods.

For Mr. Tierney's Motion—Ayes 55—Noes 108.

The House then formed itself into a Committee to consider the Orders of Council Bill, when a desultory conversation took place between Mr. Tierney, Mr. Rose, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Whitbread, Sir John Newport, and Mr. Eden, respecting the inconsistencies between the present Bill, and the American Intercourse Bill, which was now in its progress through the other House.

Mr. Whitbread entered his protest against the clauses which prevented the exportation of Peruvian bark and cotton wool, and called the serious attention of the House to this part of the measure, which seemed calculated to provoke a war with America; and said, that instead of distressing the enemy by the privation of bark, it was making war with the poor, the destitute, and the helpless paupers in the hospitals of France; and such as every friend of humanity would consider as childish, cruel, and contemptible, and worthy only of the savage barbarian. It was an execrable mode of warfare; and every British heart would revolt at the very idea of depriving the wretched of the only medicine, which, in certain cases, could afford them relief.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, that this Bill did not prevent the exportation of bark, but intended to lay a duty on it, and to enable his Majesty to allow its exportation, with a certain portion of the manufactures of this country, at the option of the enemy. He positively denied the imputation of making war on the wretched. With respect to the Baltic being shut against us, should we stand in need of any supply of corn, he had no fear but that the enemy would find it his interest to wink at its exportation, whenever he had occasion for money.

Mr. Canning said, the present measure was absolutely necessary, for the sooner this privation was felt in France, the sooner, he was certain, the enemy would be brought to his senses.

Mr. Whitbread explained, and adverted to a shocking instance of the conduct of some of the British soldiers at Copenhagen.

Sir A. Wellesley said, that the orders of Lord Cathcart had been unfortunately such, as did not authorise him to punish the soldiers alluded to.

Mr. Whitbread said they had been guilty of rapes, robbery, and murder, and yet they had not been punished; on the contrary, though found guilty by a Court-martial, they had been released. He would therefore, on an early day, give notice of a motion to investigate this atrocity.

The House divided on the first question, for omitting the words "Jesuit's Bark."—Ayes 76, Noes 167; majority in favour of Ministers, 91. On the second question, for omitting the words "Cotton Wool," it was negatived by a majority of 87; the numbers being Ayes 78, Noes 165.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, FEB. 25.

Committees were balloted for to try the merits of petitions complaining of undue elections for Downpatrick and Saltash.

Mr. Mellish obtained leave to bring in a Bill, enabling the East London Water Works Company to purchase certain Water Works in the parish of St. Paul, Shadwell.

Mr. Mellish then presented a petition from Mr. Dodd, Engineer, praying for leave to bring in a Bill for constructing a bridge across the Thames, from Vauxhall to Millbank. Referred to a Committee.

The Sheriffs of London presented two petitions from the Lord Mayor, &c. the first, praying for leave to bring in a Bill for enlarging Smithfield Market, by the purchase of lands in the parish of St. Sepulchre; and the second respecting the recovery of Small Debts. Referred to a Committee.

Lord H. Petty intimated his intention of moving to-morrow for further information respecting the late Orders in Council, so far as related to their operation in several parts of Europe.

On the motion of Sir J. Sinclair, a Committee was appointed to consider the late Act for regulating Broad Wheel Waggons, and for limiting the number of outside passengers on Stage Coaches.

Mr. Sheridan then rose to bring forward his promised motion, respecting Stockholm and Copenhagen, and said, he confessed he was not sanguine in imagining that success would crown his motion, as several motions of a similar description had already been negatived by large majorities. He would, however, move an Address to his Majesty, for a Copy of all Correspondence between Ministers and Denmark, after the surrender of Copenhagen, relative to bestowing Norway upon Sweden; and of all correspondence with the Court of Stockholm in regard to that project.

Mr. Canning said, as Sweden was now at war with Russia, it would not be proper, nor could his Right Hon. Friend wish Ministers to divulge the confidential intercourse that had taken place between Sweden and Great Britain. With respect to his other motion, there was no necessity for complying with it, as the proposal of giving Norway to Sweden had never been attempted to be carried into effect. After enlarging on these points, Mr. Canning terminated by opposing the motion.

Mr. Windham contended, that the assertions of the Right Hon. Gentleman did not by any means apply to the question before the House. The papers required by his Right Hon. Friend were such as could not be prejudicial to the public service.

Mr. G. Ponsonby insisted on the propriety of producing the papers, in order to do away the odium thrown on the character of the British nation, by the conduct of Ministers, with respect to Denmark.

After a few words from Lord Temple and Mr. W. Smith, Mr. Sheridan replied in his usual strain of animation, and said he was not by any means astonished at the silence observed on the other side of the House: it originated in prudence, as they could not deny the facts which had been alleged against them. The House divided—For the motion 85—Against it 184—Majority 99.

Mr. W. Taylor moved for copies of the Orders in Council which had been granted, during this war, to different merchant ships trading with the Spanish colonies, which were ordered.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, FEB. 26.

The Chairman of the Saltash Election Committee reported, that the petitioner against the last return was duly elected.

The Chairman of the Horsham Election Committee reported, that the Committee had determined L. P. Jones, Esq. to have been duly elected.

The Chairman of the Great Grimsby Election Committee reported, that C. A. Pelham, Esq. was not duly elected, but that Mr. Loft was.

Sir E. Knatchbull presented a petition from the inhabitants of Woolwich, praying for leave to bring in a Bill for better supplying that town with water. Referred to a Committee.

Mr. Dawes, from the Bank, presented an account of the Notes in circulation, including Bank Post Bills, from the 1st of February, 1807, to the 1st of February, 1808, distinguishing the amount in each year, and those under the value of 5*l*.

Mr. Irvine, the Inspector-General of Exports and Imports, presented an account of the quantity of sugar imported into Great Britain in 1807; the quantity exported from Great Britain to Ireland in that year; and an account of Jesuit's Bark imported for home consumption within the same period.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Mellish presented a petition from the Master Bakers of London, complaining of various violations of the Act for setting the Assize of Bread.—Laid on the Table.

Sir F. Burdett presented a petition from the Journeymen Bakers in the City of London, and within twelve miles round the same, complaining of their being obliged to work on Sundays, contrary to the Act of the 34th of the King, chap. 31. The petition stated, that that Statute imposed a penalty of 10s. on every master baker, who suffered puddings, pies, or tarts, to be baked in his oven on that day. That the master bakers had wholly disregarded the Act, on account of the lowness of the penalty. The petition prayed relief, and was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Mellish presented a petition from the Tanners of London, in support of the Bill for preventing the damaging of Raw Hides.

Mr. Vansittart moved for accounts of the quantities of Jesuit's Bark, imported for six years, ending 1796, and for six years, ending 1808, shewing the average quantity imported in each year.—Ordered.

Mr. Davenport presented a petition, signed by two thousand manufacturers and labourers of Stockport, in Cheshire, entreating the House to advise his Majesty to avail himself of all opportunities for concluding a peace.—Laid on the table.

Mr. Rose obtained leave to bring in a Bill for the better regulation of Pilots. The only novelty in the Bill was, vesting in the Elder Brethren of the Trinity-house the power of appointing fit and able men for that important duty, instead of those who now exercise that vocation.

Mr. Canning presented Copies of certain Dispatches from the Hon. Mr. Stewart, at St. Petersburgh, to Lord Viscount Howick.

Mr. Huskisson brought up two Bills, one prohibiting the exportation of Cotton Wool to the Continent, and the other for imposing a Duty on all Raw Cotton, imported from the British Colonies. These Bills were severally read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

Mr. Huskisson brought up a Bill, prohibiting the exportation of Jesuit's Bark.

On the question being put, that it be read a first time, Mr. W. Smith observed, that there was something very strange in a division that had taken place the other night, as two Gentlemen only seemed to think that cotton wool and Jesuit's bark were one and the same thing. The minority against the one was 78, and against the other 76.

Sir W. Elford said, an Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Whitbread) had the other night declared, that if he had the command of an army, and the forces of the enemy should labour under a dysentry, he would readily supply it with bark. This he thought was as absurd as if he would furnish them with arms and gunpowder.

Mr. Sheridan said, that the idea of his Hon. Friend was not quite so absurd as the Hon. Baronet imagined. Mr. Whitbread did not mean to say that Peruvian bark alone would enable the enemy to take the field. The Pilchard and Herring Fisheries on the coast of Holland were never molested in time of war, as these fish were esteemed in that country a medicine. It would appear from their reluctance to part with bark, that Ministers themselves were affected with a Typhus Fever. (A laugh). The House divided, when the question was carried by a majority of 34; the Ayes being 74, and the Noes 40.

On our re-admission, we found Mr. Secretary Canning moving an Address to his Majesty, for Copies or Extracts of any Dispatches received by Ministers from the British Envoy at Copenhagen, in December, 1806, relative to any actual invasion or menace for occupying a part of the Danish territory by France. The Right Hon. Secretary stated, that he was induced to move for these papers, in order to vindicate himself from the charge of having given a garbled account of Lord Howick's Dispatch to Mr. Garlicke, and of that Gentleman's answer. He concluded by moving accordingly.

Mr. Ponsonby observed, that the papers proposed to be produced, evidently shewed that Mr. Canning did wilfully misrepresent Lord Howick's dispatch, and that he now wished to vindicate his own character; and insisted that all the other papers ought to be produced, indicative as it was said of Denmark's hostile disposition towards Great Britain.

Some conversation ensued of a desultory nature, when Mr. Sheridan, in a long speech, supported the motion, and moved as an amendment, calling for all information received last year by Ministers respecting Copenhagen, and the equipment of the Danish fleet, for the purposes of France. He also moved for papers in vindication of the conduct of Mr. Garlicke.

Mr. Canning dissented to the amendment, defended his conduct, regarding an extract from Lord Howick's dispatch, and insisted that the expedition to Copenhagen could be warranted on the opinions advanced by his Lordship.

The gallery was ordered to be cleared, when two divisions took place.—For the amendment 40—Against it, 110—Majority 70. And on the original motion—Ayes 140—Noes 9. Majority 131.

On our return, we found the House in a Committee of the whole, considering of the Army Estimates, and the Secretary at War stating, that the Cavalry remained on the same establishment as last year. The Infantry were 147,000 men, which increased the last year's numbers by 12,812. In the Waggon Train there was a considerable reduction; but the Militia, notwithstanding the volunteering into the Line, had reached its usual establishment; and as for the Volunteer Corps, they were nearly on the same footing. The Right Hon. Secretary therefore proposed, that 14,752,000*l.* should be granted to his Majesty for the military service of the current year, making an increase of 592,000*l.* on that of last year; that increase, he said, was entirely owing to the number of Officers appointed, and to the number of men volunteered from the Militia.

Mr. Windham condemned the mode of recruiting from the Militia, and said, that men could not be had to make up deficiencies, as 60*l.* was the current payment of a substitute; consequently, a grievous burthen, not only on individuals, but on parishes.

Lord Castlereagh presumed, that the Volunteering System was the most convenient, and less oppressive than any other, and found more productive, as 37,000 men had been already added to our regular establishment, and 4,000 more would be produced before the 1st of May. Hence it would be found that 60,000 men had been recruited since the Hon. Gentleman had left his office.

On the question for granting 2,980,000*l.* for the service of the Ordnance, a long discussion ensued. It involved a debate on the Corps of Drivers, the Works of Woolwich, Chatham-lines, and Dover. It was agreed to, and several resolutions, of minor import, were put and carried. The report was ordered to be received on Monday.

Lord Castlereagh deferred till Monday, his motion for granting a pension to the family of the late Lord Lake.

The Committee on the Orders in Council Bill was deferred till Monday.—Adjourned.

SATURDAY, FEB. 27.

The Deputy Clerk of the Crown attended and amended the Return for Horsham, by erasing therefrom the names of Sir S. Romilly and Love Parry Jones Parry, Esq. and inserting those of Joseph Marriot and Henry Gouldburne, Esqrs. For Saltash, the Members returned were Matthew Russel and James Peuly, Esqrs.

AMERICAN STATE PAPERS.

Monday evening American State Papers, were laid upon the table of the House of Commons, and delivered to Members. They are in substance as follow:—

1. The first set of papers contains Lord Howick's Dispatch; the Honourable David Erskine transmitting to him a copy of the Treaty of Amity signed on the 31st of December, 1806; together with the notes delivered, at the time of its signature, by Lord Holland and Lord Auckland; and also transmitting the Order in Council, of the 7th of January, 1807, for preventing all commerce from the port of Brest to the Elbe.

To these papers, when communicated to the Government of America, Mr. Madison returned two answers. In the first, he said, "With regard to the particular Order issued against the trade of neutrals, from one port to another of the enemies of Great Britain, no fair objection can lie against it, provided it be founded on and enforced by the actual blockades, as authorised by the law of nations."

In the second letter Mr. Madison enters into a long series of objections to this Order, on the ground that so extensive a line of coast could not have an actual blockade; and that it could not be founded on any supposed illegality of the trade of neutrals between these ports.

2. The next set is the communication by Mr. Erskine, of the President's Message to Congress, stating the adjustment of the Negociation between the Commissioners of Great Britain and America, and also the Correspondence between the American Minister at Paris, and the French Minister of Marine, relative to the French Decree of November 21, 1806.

3. The third set of papers—containing a Note from Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, to Mr. Secretary Canning, dated July 24, 1807, proposing to renew the negociation for a Treaty of Amity, and transmitting the Treaty of the 31st of December, with the President's objections to it. And in this note they require distinctly compensation for losses sustained by American citizens—and also, that a formal and explicit arrangement should be made relative to the practice of impressment of the mariners of American vessels, or British seamen; they stated that they had been induced to sign the Treaty—"on an informal understanding, as in its practical effect it would remove the vexation complained of,"—but the President had instructed them to say that a formal and explicit arrangement on this subject should be made. They also pointed out the declaration made by Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, relative to the French Decree, which gave a new and unexpected character to the Treaty.

The Treaty, with Mr. Jefferson's observations upon it, fill twenty folio pages, but we have already given its substance.

Mr. Secretary Canning applied by letter to Lord Holland and Lord Auckland, to know if they had given any, and what acquiescence, to any formal understanding, "of a forbearance by British cruizers, in regard to the practice of impressment of British seamen on board American vessels;"—in which these Noble Lords replied distinctly, that they did not pledge their Government to abstain in future from impressing British seamen from American merchant vessels; but they certainly did mean to pledge the British Government to make its cruisers observe the utmost caution, moderation, and forbearance, in the exercise of that practice; but they never either expressed or implied, that they were to desist from taking British seamen from American merchant ships.

Mr. Canning then transmits to Messrs. Monroe and Pinckney, his official answer to their proposal of renewing the negociation. This answer is dated the 22d of October, 1807. He commences by saying that his Majesty is not satisfied that the American Government has taken any such effectual steps with respect to the Decree of France, as to do away the ground of the reservation contained in the note of Lord Holland or Lord Auckland: and that he therefore reserves to himself the right of taking such measures of retaliation as he may think right. But at the same time if the Treaty had been ratified on the part of America, it should have received from him the fullest effect, in all its stipulations.

With respect to the question of impressment, it was certainly a matter referred for discussion, separately, at some future period, more favourable to its successful termination. But he distinctly protests against the alterations made in the Treaty by the President, as a practice altogether unusual in the political transactions of States, as it would lead to the most inconvenient and dangerous consequences, and he therefore concludes with saying, that "he is commanded to apprize the American Commissioners, that the proposal to negociate anew, upon the basis of a Treaty already solemnly concluded and signed, is a proposal wholly inadmissible; and his Majesty has therefore no option, under the present circumstances of this transaction, but to acquiesce in the refusal of the President to ratify the Treaty signed on the 31st of December, 1806."

IRELAND.

DUBLIN, FEB. 15.—This day his Grace the Lord Lieutenant attended by a great procession, proceeded to New Sackville-street, to lay the first stone of the monument to be erected to the Immortal Admiral Lord Nelson. The procession was numerous and splendid, and the event was announced by a display of sky rockets, a discharge of artillery from the Park, the Pigeon-house, and all vessels carrying guns in the Bay, and a feu de joie from the infantry, military and yeomanry. It is said to be a simple column 168 feet high, resembling Pompey's Pillar in Egypt, which has long been the admiration of the world.

FEB. 16.—The Prince of Wales packet which was stranded near Seapoint, on the 19th of November last, by the very disastrous storm that then took place, was almost beaten to pieces by the dreadful storm of Thursday last, by which upwards of thirty dead bodies, that remained in a state of incarceration since the first mentioned day, were driven on shore in the vicinity of Seapoint; and, on Saturday last, inquests were holden on their miserable remains by William Burke, Esq. senior coroner of the county of Dublin.—The bodies driven in were in such a state that it was impossible to recognize them by their features.

A most indecent outrage was committed lately at St. Mary's Chapel, Limerick. While the Rev. Mr. Herbert, was engaged in Divine Service, an infuriated ruffian rushed through the congregation, and advanced towards the rails that surround the altar, with an iron hold-fast, made an attempt on the life of the officiating clergyman; the stroke was luckily averted by the interposition of Mr. Edy Lacy. The wretch was, after some difficulty, secured and committed.

PROVINCIALS.

Extract of a description of the Mineral Bason in the counties of Monmouth, Glamorgan, Brecon, Carmarthen, and Pembroke, by Mr. Edward Martin:—"In this basin are 23 seams of coal, from 18 inches to 9 feet in thickness, besides several of inferior dimensions. The total thickness of the coal in the above 23 seams is 25 feet; the average extent of each is about 1000 square miles, from which, in the usual way of working, may be obtained 64,000,000 tons per mile. Interposed between several of these strata are beds of nodular iron ore, with which the numerous iron forges in this district are supplied. The external boundaries of this bason are banks of limestone."

The new line of the Grand Canal near Stoney Stratford, was on Friday last greatly injured by two of the arches under the high embankment giving way. The old line of canal, however, has received no injury.

HORSHAM, FEB. 24.—From the late mortality and extreme unhealthiness among the soldiery in our barracks, it has been judged expedient to diminish the number by the removal of the Bucks or King's Own; one division of which marched off this morning for East Bourne, another to-morrow, and the rest, with such of the sick as can be safely removed, will follow in convenient succession. Inflamatory fever and opthalmia have loaded the wards of the Hospital, and made dreadful havoc among the young recruits. On Monday last, 250 of the long-expected Sicilian regiment, lately returned from the neighbourhood of Syracuse, marched in here from Petworth on their way to Kent; they are for the most part young men below the middling stature; dark complexions, and appeared extremely dirty in their habits and manners. A great number of women accompanied them, whose long black hair and strange costume afforded much amusement to our inhabitants.

Sporting Anecdote.—Last week a fox broke cover before the hounds of Mr. Wilson, of Hawkes-head, and near that place, when, after a severe run of many miles, in the course of which the wily efforts of Reynard to escape were prevented by the superior sagacity and excellence of the hounds, the fox had nearly attained his old retreat. He was, however, so hard pressed, that he leaped into an old coal pit, where he was soon afterwards followed by two of the foremost hounds: a rope being procured, an intrepid collier consented to go down and learn the fate of poor Reynard and the hounds. On his reaching the bottom, he found the fox and one of the hounds lying peaceably together, but the other killed by the fall. By the assistance of the hunters the collier was hauled to the surface, with the fox in one gripe and the live dog in the other.

On the 8th instant a cow, belonging to Thomas Holmes, of Litherland, near Liverpool, died, being within a month of calving. On being opened, five bull calves were found, in perfect form, and haired. The largest was found dead, and in a putrified state, and was suppposed to have been the cause of the cow's death.

Last week the skin of a man or woman's face was found on the sea-shore, at the back of the Isle of Sheppy, near Churchenhole, or Inshrook, by some copperas-ore pickers, who conveyed it to the house of a poor man near the coast, and buried it in his garden. It appeared to have been recently taken off, was quite fresh, the eye-brows, eye-lashes, and hair perfect, and having much down growing on the upper lip, seemed never to have been shaved; but had only one ear attached. This very uncommon mutilation gives but too much cause to suspect, that some person has unfairly been deprived of life, but by whom no traces may ever be discovered.

The following curious inscription is written over a door in a village in Somersetshire.—"Petticoats mended, children taught reading, writing, and dancing, grown-up people taught to spin roses distilled, and made into a proper resistance with water; also old shoes bought and sold."

SUNDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1808.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

A rumour was circulated yesterday of a second French squadron being at sea. It was occasioned by a letter from the Snap Dragon privateer to her owner, stating, that she had been fiast chased by one French squadron, and then by another, off Madeira. Government has received no information which encourages the belief that a second squadron has escaped from any of the French ports. The squadron seen last by the Snap Dragon privateer, was most probably that of Admiral DUCKWORTH.

It is said that letters have arrived at Falmouth, and were sent by express to Plymouth, from Admiral Duckworth, dated at sea, and stating, that he was in acive pursuit of the enemy.

The Papers of yesterday gave an account of a violent demand for delivering up the Russian ships in the Tagus having been made by the French, and carried into execution. The Russians, it was added, opposed the demand, till JUNOT threatened to open the batteries upon them. It was said that Ministers had received intelligence of this by dispatches from the blockading squadron off the Tagus. But this is not true. Ministers have received no intelligence to this effect; nor is the statement worthy of credit.

It is said that Count STARHEMBERG was received with great coldness upon his introduction to BONAPARTE, and that in consequence he left Paris, for Vienna, in a day or two after. This story has probably no foundation, but some cold expressions respecting the Count which were found in the notes on the King's Speech in the Moniteur.

Letters and Papers have been received from Boston to th 14th ult. They mention the arrival of Mr. ROSE at Washington, and that he had met with the most flattering reception. It was added that the Non-Importation Act, and the Embargo, were either annulled, or just about to be so. In regard to the first part of this intelligence, we have no doubt that the reception of Mr. ROSE was respectful; but there are too many subjects of complaint between the two countries, to permit so rapid an adjustment of their differences, as the latter part of this intelligence would imply.

The discussions respecting the Indian government of Marquis WELLESLEY have again been introduced into the House of Commons. On Monday, Lord FOLKESTONE moved that the Oude papers should be taken into consideration. The question on which the debate turned was, whether the House should now proceed to a decision on this part of the charges against the noble Marquis, or should refer the papers to a committee. The committee being rejected, it was finally agreed the subject should be taken into consideration on Tuesday se'nnight.

There have been several other sharp debates in the Lower House; but they have turned almost entirely upon the old topics, respecting either the orders in council, or our relations with the northern powers.

The debate respecting Marquis WELLESLEY has served to revive reports about his admission into the Cabinet. On one hand it has been asserted, that Mr. CANNING would make way for him to occupy the station of Secretary for the Foreign Department. On the other hand, it has been affirmed, that Lord CASTLEREAGH would be raised to the dignity of the British peerage, and admit the Marquis to the War Department. We have reason to think that there is more difficulty in these Cabinet arrangements than the intelligencers of the Morning Papers seem to be aware.—There is another great man, whose pretensions the Ministry find it nearly as difficult to satisfy as those of the noble Marquis; we mean Lord MELVILLE. A species of secret jealousy too has arisen between them, on account of an apparent opposition in their pretensions, which it is feared may produce disagreeable consequences. It is understood that the Ministry rather prefer Marquis WELLESLEY, because it will be easier to get over the charges against him, than the vote of the House of Commons which is against Lord MELVILLE; but this is the very reason which renders the latter more importunate.

Another set of Papers relative to Russia was laid before Parliament on Friday. They consist of extracts of the correspondence which took place between the Courts of London and Petersburgh, from the end of October 1806 to the end of April last. They would occupy more space than we could possibly devote to them, but fortunately they are of such a nature, that to peruse them in detail would be a task more tedious than satisfactory to our Readers. Having been written during the important campaign between France and Russia, the events of that period are occasionally alluded to; but the points upon which the correspondence chiefly turns are the propositions respecting a loan for Russia, and the repeated demands made by the Cabinet of Petersburgh to the late Administration, for military co-operation in the war with France. The trade between Russia and France is also the subject of some communications. It appears that some Russian ships bound to France, had been, at an early period of the war, detained by our cruizers, the ground on which the Emperor Alexander founded the complaint of depredations committed on the commerce of his subjects.—It appears, that though Russia was at war with France, no restriction was imposed upon Russian vessels in trading with France.—As it was presumed, that the cargoes with which the Russian ships were freighted for France could have no other than contraband of war, our cruizers stopped them and brought them in for the propor tribunal on that question. In answer to the representations of the Russian Government on this subject, Lord Howick declared that orders would be given for the release of all Russian ships which had been brought into British Ports, and which appeared to have been freighted with articles of an innocent nature. The idea of raising a loan in this country for the Russian Government is first mentioned in a dispatch from Mr. Stuart, the British Charge d'Affaires at the Court of Petersburgh, previously to the arrival of the Marquis of Douglas. Mr. Stuart's letter is dated November 4, 1806; the sum proposed to be borrowed was six millions. But Lord Howick advances very solid reasons against this proposition, and refers to the recent examples of the Austrian loans in support of his opinion.—With regard to the co-operation expected by Russia in this country, in almost every dispatch from Mr. Stuart, and the Marquis of Douglas, this topic is brought forward. In a dispatch, dated 18th December, 1806, Mr. Stuart says, "At Court this morning, his Imperial Majesty urged, in the strongest terms, the expediency of a diversion on the enemy in the north of Europe, by a powerful expedition to the coasts of France or Holland." To these representations Lord Howick replied, that to send our troops to the coast of Holland or France, in the depth of winter, would be wantonly to sacrifice them; but, that as soon as the season would permit, attacks would be made upon every practicable point, for which preparations were making. In March, however, the change of Ministers took place.

A Cabinet Council sat yesterday at Downing-street, at the breaking up of which, at five o'clock, Mr. Canning gave audience to the Portuguese Ambassador.

The Expedition under General Spencer sailed from Falmouth on Sunday last, under convoy of the Antelope. It consists of between 12 and 14,000 men.—The fleet, consisting, besides the ships of war, of about 60 transports, were all clear of the harbour without any accident by twelve o'clock, and proceeded on their voyage with a fine breeze at N. E.

By a letter from Algiers, of Dec. 21, it appears that the Dey was then on the eve of declaring war against France. He had positively refused to deliver up the prisoners claimed by the French as inhabitants of Genoa.

Intelligence has been received of great exertions making at Antwerp, to fit out a powerful armament, intended to operate in favour of Russia and Denmark against Sweden, in the Baltic; and it is said to be in such forwardness as to have excited some anxiety lest it should be ready before our Expedition, which is preparing for the same scene of action. We are, however, under no serious apprehensions on the subject. The Antwerp armament will find it very difficult to put to to sea, unobserved by our fleet cruizing off the coast of Holland.

A General Review of all the Volunteer Corps in and about London, will take place in Hyde Park about the middle of next month.

M. Boyer, who was brought from Falmouth to London, from on board the American schooner Hope, which had been detained by the Mars privateer under suspicious circumstances, has had the whole of his papers examined, and is sent as a prisoner of war on his parole to Chesterfield.

FASHIONS FOR MARCH.

LADIES' DRESSES.

EVENING FULL DRESS.—A soft satin, of a beautiful amber and brown shot, worn over a sarsnet slip, made with a short train, a quarter and an half in length on the ground; the back of the dress is short and square; the sleeves are made in straight stripes down the arm, with a row of amber and white satin; they are quite plain, and worn close to the arm, long sleeves confined round the wrists, with pearl bracelets; a French body of white satin, fastened in the centre of the bosom with a pearl broach, confined to the shape, and drawn down at each side of the neck, with pearl clasps to correspond. A broad band from the centre of the bosom, confined round the waist, laced behind, and cut with a peak to fasten in the middle of the back. The front of the dress is made in one complete piece; the front is brought straight across the bosom, and the satin body is placed over it, which forms a satin tucker to the bosom. A rich drapery of white lace is thrown carelessly over the shoulders.—The hair is dressed in a new style; ornamented with a pearl crown placed over the right eye, necklace, and bracelets to correspond; French kid gloves, and white satin shoes.

OPERA FULL DRESS.—A simple white muslin gown, made with a short train, and enriched round the bottom with a superb border of ruby foil, made perfectly plain, with a square back, and loose front, gathered into a band of white satin; the shoulder straps are also of white satin, which continue round the back; the sleeves are made short to cover only the top of the shoulder, gathered into a band of white satin, with scarcely any fullness, to correspond. The dress is worn over white satin; a rich India ruby mantle, edged with gold, is suspended over the left shoulder, and conceals the arm. The hair is dressed plain, with a ruby handkerchief, tastefully placed across the head. Cornelian necklace and ear-rings. Shoes to correspond with the mantle and head-dress.

GENTLEMENS' DRESSES.

THE EVENING DRESS of the circles of fashion still continues to be dark blue coats, with large gilt buttons, with either a velvet collar, or of the same cloth, according to the fancy of the wearer; white quilting Marsailles waistcoat, single breasted; and light drab kerseymere breeches, with covered buttons and silk strings at the knees.

Digitized by Google

Such has been the prevailing dress during the month of February; and, as far as colours are worn, will, doubtless, continue for the present; but the approach of Lent will, in its usual course, introduce the wearing of black suits, as the most genteel and most proper Evening Dress, in all polite parties. The coat will, of course, be made double-breasted, and in the same stile of fashion as the coloured coats, and with covered buttons; and, though black kerseymere waistcoats and breeches may be considered genteel, black silk Florentine will be more gentlemanly and fashionable.

For Morning Dress we observe many browns or mixtures, and the most fashionable are single breasted, with collars of the same cloth, and white plaited buttons; plain buff kerseymere or stripe toilinet waistcoats still take the lead in preference to scarlet; drab colour ribbed kerseymere breeches, with gilt buttons and brown top boots; or plain drab colour kerseymere pantaloons, with Hessian boots.

Dark olive colour cloth great coats, single breasted, with covered buttons, and collars of the same cloth; the forepart and skirts lined with silk of the same colour; and if with the addition of brown fur cuffs and collar the more fashionable.—Silk loops on the forepart, with silk barrel buttons, and a trimming on the hip of the same, as mentioned in our last, constitute what may be termed a dress great coat for the Opera or Public Assemblies.

Captain Charles Graham, of the William Pitt; and Capt. Alexander Campbell, of the Sovereign, for Madras and Bengal; Capt. W. Gielston, of the Europe, for St. Helena and Bengal.

The East India Company's annual orders for camblets, called broad whites, have been issued, and about 24,000 pieces have been contracted for by the manufacturers of Norwich, which has given temporary employment to numerous distressed journeymen weavers.

THE THEATRES.

OPERA.

On Tuesday Evening La Frascatana was repeated to a brilliant and numerous assemblage of fashion:—In this Opera, the part of Donna Violante is well adapted to Catalani's smiling countenance, and her continual simper accords not ill with her arch naivete, in tricking the old man. Her affected simplicity on the first interview with Nardone excited much mirth, and though the air of "Giovanette simplicette" did not afford an opportunity of displaying great powers, yet it was heard with general applause; and we were much pleased with the playful manner in which she received the encore—preserving all the sportiveness of the character, with the respectful good humour of the actress. The Caratina, in the second Act, "Non vi fidate" was given with a force and pathos unequalled; but we cannot say so much for the others, as there was a sameness and insipidity in them that precluded all interest or admiration.—With respect to the other performers, if they cannot act, yet still they might dress well. Rovedino's singing, in general, and his acting, in some parts, was above mediocrity, but the interest of the scene is completely destroyed by his costume, which, though it might do for the Clown in a pastoral Ballet, is yet unfit for the lover of the gay Violante; surely, Mr. Lestini might recollect the dress of a young Italian country gentleman. Giovanni, in Fagnotha, did all that his part would allow him to do! but the humour of the Italian populace is so different to that of John Bull, that it can be understood only by a small proportion of the audience, and if well done must appear to many as a caricature.

The new Divertisement was repeated, but why this is called a Fete Chinoise, we cannot exactly tell; for, with the exception of the dresses and the scenery, it might have passed for a Fete any where else; indeed, we believe the fashionable folks at Pekin, or the pastoral folks at Lien-toug, are seldom entertained with the cabrioles of a D'Egville, or the whirligig movements of a Presle or Deshayes. If we must have Chinese Festivals, or Arcadian Divertisements, let the manner be preserved as well as the costume, otherwise we may as well amuse ourselves with the surprising Turks, and Sylvan Goddesses of Bartholomew-fair!

COVENT GARDEN,

The only novelty, this week, was a Farce brought out on Thursday Evening, from the prolific pen of Mr. Allingham, with music adapted to the piece by Mr. Condell, Who Wins or, The Widow's Choice.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ.

Iambic Extempore, (a Poet).....Mr. Fawcett.
Caper, (a buckish Merchant).....Mr. Liston.
Matthew Mole, (the old Steward).....Mr. Simmonds.
Friendly, (an Attorney).....Mr. Chapman.
Trust, (the Executor).....Mr. Denman.
Widow Bellair.....Mrs. C. Kemble.
Miss Serena Softly.....Mrs. Liston.
Lisette, (the Maid).....Miss Decamp.

The piece opens with the expected meeting of three expectant legates, under the will of an old gambler, who had won a fortune by the dice-box, viz. the Widow Bellair, Extempore, the poet, and Caper, the merchant, all the children of three sisters of the deceased, but who had never been acquainted with each other. The Widow Bellair, under the disguise of her own waiting maid, arrives first, accompanied by her attorney; but, seeing her own picture hanging up in her uncle's apartment, in order to avoid discovery, she makes her attorney change it for that of an old maiden grand-aunt; and Mr. Matthew Mole, having broken his spectacles, very opportunely is unable to observe the change.—All the parties being met, the will is read, when it appears that the property, 50,000*l.* is left to the Widow Bellair, on condition of her marrying one of the nephews; and, in case of her refusal, to be divided equally between the poet and the merchant; but, should they both wish to marry her, then the choice to be determined by the dice-box. A Quintette is sung, during which the dice are thrown—Extempore throws deuce ace; when the merchant considers the widow and the fortune as his own, but on trying his luck he throws aces! —Extempore is now enamoured of the widow, as Lisette, and she is equally pleased with him, but retiring to make her arrangements for the discovery, the two cousins apply to Mr. Mole for a description of the Lady, when he directs them to the picture, expatiating in raptures on her eyes, mouth, &c.—Disgusted with his lot, the Poet sells his chance to Caper for one thousand pounds, but on the entrance of the widow in her own character, he becomes sensible of his error. She, however, lays a scheme to entrap Caper into a refusal of her, which is soon brought about, and the Piece concludes. There is also a Miss Serena Softly, to whom Caper is bound by promise, which induces him the more readily to give up his bargain, from the apprehension of a lawsuit.

Such is the outline of a Piece, which was received with universal applause, and most of the songs encored; and which considered as a Farce, we do not hesitate to pronounce as excellent. The situations and the equivoque, are well managed, and the allusions, temporary and personal, are not so broad as to displease, but give a kind of relief to the performance, perfectly allowable in an After-Piece.

The Plot (for it has a Plot which might be cut up to serve half a dozen modern Comedies) never stands still, but every scene naturally arises out of the other. The Performers were perfect in their parts; and even if it had been less favourably received, still the acting of Mrs. C. Kemble, and Liston, in the dancing Duett, would have saved it from damnation!

OLD BAILEY.

TUESDAY, FEB. 28.

This day the Sessions ended, when the Recorder proceeded to pass Sentence of Death upon the following capital convicts:—Edward Westbroke, Fiewell Polman, Charles Pickener, Edw. Tabin, Edmund Hickery, Ann Holton, alias Playfair, Wm. Walker, Mary Fletcher, and Catherine Jennings.—Susannah Carter, Robert Hiam, Henry Sells, Wm. Morgan, Daniel Walker, John Hind, Benjamin Thornhill, Thomas Robinson, Francis Aldridge, Wm. Hunt, Sarah Childs, Wm. Mills, John Ward, Samuel Casten, John Locke, John Murphy, Sarah Crawford, Wm. Dukes, and Benjamin Foggatt, were severally sentenced to be transported beyond the seas for the space of seven years.—John Peake, for buying stolen goods and knowing them to be such, was ordered to be transported for 14 years.—Forty-five others were also sentenced, some to be imprisoned in the House of Correction, and others to be fined, whipped, and discharged.

The Court of Common Pleas was occupied all Monday, in the further hearing of the case of Frost v. Burdett, which was determined in favour of the Defendant.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—Another charge of a daring highway robbery, similar to one a few weeks since committed by a woman of the name of Davis, in St. Giles's, was exhibited on Wednesday against an abandoned woman, of the name of Elizabeth Thompson, of which the following are particulars:—A youth, 16 years of age, an apprentice to a tradesman in Bloomsbury, was returning home through Kepple-street, Bedford-square, in the evening, when he was followed by the prisoner, who did not speak; but on his arrival at the door of a dark passage, she forced him down the same, and hurried him into a dark room, where another wretched woman was waiting. The most horrible imprecations and threats silenced the youth, who was stripped of part of his cloathing, and a seven shilling piece was taken from him. He was forced from his loathsome dungeon, through another entrance, into the street; but, on being liberated, he discovered the passage where he was first forced down, and a watchman found the prisoner, and took her into custody. She was fully committed for trial.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

No certain advice of the Rochefort Squadron has yet been received. A letter from on board Sir John Duckworth's squadron, of which the following is a copy, was on Sunday posted at Lloyd's:—

"Off Madeira, 27th July, 1808 from Sir John Duckworth's squadron.

"This morning the Comus frigate hove in sight, and telegraphed to say she was chased on the 24th by an enemy's line of battle ship and a frigate, in lat. 30. long 50. This has determined the Admiral to go after them. The Dragon is now in sight. These seas are covered with merchant ships belonging to a dispersed convoy (doubtless that which sailed from England on the 18th of December). We saw about 40 sail yesterday, and now about 20 are in sight. Sir John means to order one of our frigates to take charge, and send them on to the body of the fleet, so as to run in a direction to avoid the enemy; and we shall push forward with all dispatch."

Advices have been received from France of the capture of three American vessels by the enemy's cruizers, viz. the Charlotte, bound from Plymouth to Gottenburgh, the Two Marys, and the Octavia. The latter ship had touched at a British port and was in consequence sent into Belle Isle, where her cargo was landed and her crew made prisoners. The Two Marys was boarded and examined at sea by a cruizer; she afterwards put into Calais, where the Captain innocently relating the fact, the ship was declared a lawful prize under the late decree of Buonaparte. The French papers mention two more instances of that decree having been rigorously acted upon, namely the capture and confiscation of the American ships Mary, from New York to Belle Isle, and the Catherine captured in the Mediterranean by the Josephine privateer.

A young gentleman in the army, the son of an officer of rank, made an attempt to put a period to his existence, yesterday morning, at his apartments in Mortimer-street. The people of the house were alarmed at an early hour by the report of a pistol, and on a young man going into the bed-room of the officer, he found him loading the pistol a second time, with his hand bleeding copiously. He had, it appeared, fastened the pistol to the sacking at the foot of the bed, and a string that was tied to the trigger was brought round the bed-post, which he pulled. A ball had passed through the mantle-shelf, in a direction parallel with the foot of the bedstead, the pistol having been removed by the pulling of the trigger. The young man, it appeared, had returned to his apartments, at five o'clock in the morning, from a gaming-house in St. Anne's parish.

SUICIDE.—A few days ago, some carpenters who were preparing the mansion of Lady F. Moreton, in Lower Brook-street, knocked at the door, but could not gain admittance, and at ten o'clock it was judged necessary to force an entrance, when Mrs. Deacon, the house-keeper, who was the only occupier, could not be found, until they proceeded to the back kitchen, where they discovered her lying dead. From appearances it was at first supposed she had been murdered, as a wound had been inflicted in the inside of the bend of the left arm, but there was scarcely any blood to be seen, although it was two inches in depth across the veins. Dr. Heaviside, who had endeavoured to restore animation, made the case known at Marlborough-street Office, and Mr. Butler, the clerk, and Hamilton, the officer, were dispatched to make the necessary investigation. After searching the house for above an hour, they at length discovered, in the front kitchen, which was darkened, a chair and a counterpane covered with blood, and a pair of large scissars, which were also bloody, on the floor. At the side of the chair was a bucket, nearly half full of blood, so that it was evident that the deceased had bled into the bucket, and the only conclusion that can be drawn is, that the unfortunate woman struggled into the back kitchen, after having nearly bled to death. It is not surmised what were her motives. On the preceding day she had received a letter from Lady Moreton to get the house ready for her reception. A Coroners Inquest held on the body on Friday brought in a verdict of Lunacy.

BIRTHS.

EXTRAORDINARY BIRTH.—On Tuesday Feb. 16, the wife of a labouring man in Slippery-Green, Ireland, of the name of Farrell, was delivered of a male child, which had neither eyes, mouth, or nose; through a small aperture above the chin, it was enabled to breath. This phenomenon expired the morning after its birth, exactly at the hour at which it came into the world.

MARRIED.

On Tuesday last, D. Curling, Esq. of Cheapside, to Miss Davies, daughter of James Davies, Esq. merchant, of Beckford Place, Walworth.

On Sunday se'nnight, Mr. Wildblood, of Huddersfield, to Mrs. Midgeley, widow of the late Mr. Midgeley, of Leeds, grocer. This alliance, take it for all in all, is unique in the annals of matrimony. The husband is not less than thirty years older than his wife—the courtship has not been of less than three weeks duration—and the degree of consanguinity in which the happy pair stand to each other, is not less than father and daughter (by marriage).

DIED.

On Sunday last, at half past six o'clock, at his house in Lower Brook-street, Lord Lake. His Lordship was taken ill at the Court Martial at Chelsea, on Thursday, but he was not considered in a dangerous state until Saturday morning. By his Lordship's death, the office of Treasurer to the Prince of Wales becomes vacant. The deceased was a full general in the army, and Colonel of the 80th foot. Lord Lake has left issue two sons, the eldest Colonel Francis Gerrard Lake, of the 1st Regiment of Foot Guards, who succeeds to the title; the second, Lieutenant-Colonel George A. F. Lake, of the 29th foot.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TEN.

LORD LAKE'S PENSION.

Our readers all know that a proposition has lately been made to Parliament, in the name of his Majesty, for bestowing upon Lord Lake, and his descendants, a pension of 2000*l.* a-year for three generations yet to come. It has also been proposed, that this pension should have a retrospective operation, commencing from the battle of Delhi, thus adding 8000*l.* to the grant, and extending the pension, in fact, to four lives.

We have not witnessed any public action, for a great number of years, which has met with so universal a condemnation. Persons of all political creeds have lifted up their voices against it. Even those who are on ordinary occasions the least sensible to the public burthens of the people, and the most disposed to go along with the demands of government, have been loud in their censures. The very alarmists themselves, who are too apt to think that the people can never be sufficiently weak, nor the government sufficiently strong, till they find themselves as well as the people, equally the victims of an undistinguishing despotism, even they have joined the common cry of reprobation.

The present is not an ordinary crisis. It speaks to the feelings of those, on whose reason the abuse of the people's earnings makes too feeble an impression. When they contemplate the disastrous effects which taxation is now working in this country, and consider the arduous contest in which we are still engaged, the most unthinking wonder at the prodigality with which demands are constantly made, from the most frivolous pretexts, on the purse and the blood of the people.

On ordinary occasions, when the produce of labour is but lightly taxed, and the demands of the times are moderate, we are apt to regard a slight addition with much indifference; too often forgetting that such deductions are not merely taken from the people, but from the prosperity of the country. When the taxation of labour, however, has reached that terrible and hazardous pitch, that it can be raised no higher, when its springs are wound up ready to burst, and when at the same time we are placed in one of the most awful situations in which any nation was ever placed, a situation more urgently demanding vast means of exertion than any which the history of mankind can easily parallel, to add to the demands upon the people, by frivolous pretexts, revolts the understanding and the heart of all but an ignorant and hardened courtier. The general sense of mankind is against it. Their feelings enlist their prejudices on the side of reason; and the most determined aristocrats become the friends of the people.

For us, this motto speaks for us, that we are attached to our King, our Constitution, and to our Laws.—But every sentiment and dictate of our understanding and of our heart tells us that the interests of our King are involved in the prosperity of his people. If they are destroyed, and their prosperity is blasted, where is the dignity and the happiness of our King? They are the mercenary, unfeeling enemies of the King, who would prey upon the people. The people are the King's friends, and the King's stewards. It is in their pockets the King must find the means of effecting the great purposes of the State on every emergency; but how are these means to be found, if the purses of the people are previously drained by unworthy demands. Detestable is the fraud which knavery tries to work, when attempts to stem the torrent of prodigality are represented as acts of disloyalty. Who would be the first to fly from the King, in circumstances of real distress? The wretches who now suck, or desire to suck the sweat and the blood of the people, and who are ready to bite with their gory jaws those who manifest the least desire to disengage them from their obstinate fangs. All history bears evidence to this. The unfortunate King of Prussia, we are informed, now lives in the most private manner, and is surrounded and attended only by a few ordinary people. The great, and the noble, among whom he formerly dispensed the taxes, which his people paid, have all disappeared.

In what situation are the people of England, at the time when a demand is made upon them to maintain the family of Lord Lake in affluence and splendour? In that situation, in which, according to the confession of a Minister, the taxes are driving them from a house to lodgings; from a first floor to the garret; and when a seventh part of the whole population are parish paupers—a situation, in which the very tax-gatherers say, that we can hardly go on another year; that having sacrificed, to pay the taxes, till they have no longer any thing to sacrifice, the people can pay no longer. Let any man who pleases make the experiment. Five out of six of all the collectors of taxes in England, will not hesitate in making a similar declaration. Hear the opinions, not of our tax-gatherers only, but of our Statesmen: "I beg the House to consider, that the "question now is as to a choice of evils, and that money "must be raised for the exigencies of the State;" (Lord H. Petty's Speech, 9th May, 1806.) "The fact is, that we "are now placed in such circumstances, that we are driven "to adopt modes of taxation, which must, in some degree, "affect the prosperity of one branch or other of our trade "or commerce;" (Mr. Fox's Speech, 9th May, 1806.) In this unparalleled state of taxation are the people of this country called upon to pay 2000*l.* a year, and 9000*l.* besides to the family of Lord Lake. That the family of Lord Lake may keep three carriages instead of two, five livery servants instead of three, a thousand hungry families must be curtailed a loaf of bread in the week; or the country must be stript of the power of maintaining 50 sailors.

You talk of the services of Lord Lake. Have you never heard of the important maxim, "Let us be just, "before we are generous." Is it not fit to be considered, that what you give to Lord Lake, you take from the people of England? And ought you not to deliberate a little what the one can afford to give, before you determine what the other should receive. Might you not reflect, that the people of England pay ten times more per head to the service and retainers of Government than any other people on the face of the earth. When we talk of merits, ought we not to allow that the merits of such a people are very extraordinary? Applying, as we do, so much generosity to others, ought we not to apply a little mercy to them? Would not this be good policy, even in the way of self-interest? The woman should have carefully fed and tended her hen that laid golden eggs—this was the plan for getting many eggs. Our politicians should recollect, that the people are the hen that lays the golden eggs, and if they allow her to get lean and sick, they will soon find a failure in the eggs.

There are too many among us who arraign those truths as not salutary, but dangerous. And those who dare to express them, they denounce as the most execrable of mankind, whose object is to excite disaffection among the people. The accusation is hypocritical and unjust. The natural and proper effect of these truths is to excite in you, the authors of the abuses, a spirit of correction and amendment, and then the affections of the people would be gained rather than alienated. If you adhere to the abuses, you ruin the country, were the people as tame as sheep. The more tame they are indeed, the more rapidly will the ruin be accomplished. You, who arraign these salutary truths, are the people of evil design. You are not only thieves and robbers, but you wish to have the power of knocking all the watchmen on the head.

But it is a mockery of the British army, and of the British people, to talk to us thus of the services of Lord Lake. Who ever fought in India that did not gain battles? There is hardly an officer in the service who would not have done the same things, if placed in the same situation. Lord Lake obtained his reward. He was raised to the highest honours and emoluments of his profession. These are the reward of the soldier; and these are and ought to be a sufficient reward. How many a meritorious officer, struggling up the ascent of preferment, would regard the attainment of such a command as that with which Lord Lake was invested in India, as the most noble reward of a life devoted to the greatest exertions and dangers? Why, after this magnificent recompence, fully adequate to the merits of Lord Lake, are the people of England, smarting with taxation at every pore, to be called upon to pay from the profits of their labour, enormous sums to his family?

Lord Lake, we are told, has died poor. The more unworthy he. It is well known that he got in India what might have kept him from being poor: nor is it unknown in what way a great part of what he got went from him. But why should that conduct which in others is the object of reprobation and disgust, give the family of Lord Lake a claim to dip their hands in the exhausted pockets of the people of England?

But Lord Lake was made a Lord, and his family must be enabled to support the dignity of the Peerage. So! the Peerage must be supported, at the expence of the bread of the poor! The dignity of the Peerage is to be upheld by having a race of Lords, who are to live upon an assessment levied on the people! They who betray the dignity of the Peerage, and sacrifice it to their own selfish ends, are the men who are instrumental in making such Lords. Is it possible that the people can respect an order of men, for whose support the poor remains of their hard earnings is unnecessarily diminished? In fact, such a situation is one of natural and inherent degradation. The whole order of Peerage suffers by it. Such wretched experiments on the Peerage have made dismal inroads in this country on the respect for rank. They have been most powerful levellers.

It is not enough for us, the people of England, that this poor Lord, was the co-adjutor of Marquis Wellesley, and a favourite of the Prince of Wales. Of the two parties that debate against one another in Parliament, these circumstances might afford motives to the one for proposing the pension, and the other for not opposing it. But these motives concern not us. They depend on interests with which ours have nothing in common.

What becomes of the mass of rich sinecures when alleged services of this sort are to be rewarded? They are defended, on the score of being a fund for rewarding merit and services. How happens it, that always, whenever services are to be rewarded, Parliament is called upon to go into the pockets of the people, the sinecure places being all absorbed in other ways. For what great services has the Marquis of Buckingham a sinecure worth 20,000 a-year? If all services are to be rewarded by demand upon the people, let the people, at least, have the benefit of the sinecures. Let them all, to the last farthing, be abolished, and let the taxes to an equal amount be immediately remitted.

EXAMINATION OF MR. COBBETT'S ATTACK ON MR. ROSCOE'S PAMPHLET.

We are afraid our Readers will become tired of Mr. Cobbett's attack. That is not our fault. We have pledged ourselves to expose whatever we find most absurd in reason, and most dangerous in practice, in the political writings of the day, and we cannot help it, if Mr. Cobbett just now stands pre-eminent. Let our Readers, however, only reflect, if they are tired with what we have given them of Mr. Cobbett's speculations, what his own Readers must be. They have already had three days allowance of Mr. Roscoe, and are threatened with a fourth, and not a fifth.

We cannot help reverting to that most interesting and important, at the present crisis, of all national subjects of deliberation, the question of Peace or War; and with the recollection full in their minds of the doctrines of Mr. Cobbett, which in our last two Numbers we have laid before our Readers, we entreat them to reflect seriously what sort of advocates they are to whom the system of terror and of war is promulgated. Let them reflect too, upon the consequences of Mr. Cobbett's doctrines. In his Register of June 28, 1806, pp. 968, 969, he says "I have declared, and now repeat the declaration, that it is "my fixed opinion, that without a great reduction of expence "it is impossible for this country to carry on the war for on "a very few years longer. And, if this be the case, the only "question that remains to be determined is, how is this reduction to be effected? I believe, there is but one way, namely, "by greatly reducing the amount of the dividends paid upon "the national debt." That is to say, we can only hope to carry on the War for a few years longer, by declaring the nation unable to pay the interest of her debts, that is, literally and strictly, by a national bankruptcy, by taking a spunge to the national debt, or at least by a composition with her creditors, and that a forced and arbitrary composition.

There may be a species of consistency in the present system of Mr. Cobbett, to which the public does not advert. He has asserted, and that assertion he has repeated again and again that a national bankruptcy would be the greatest blessing to this country. This is one of his favourite topics. He is fully convinced too, as we here perceive, that a continuance in the war must produce a national bankruptcy, that great British blessing. He has at present employed himself, with great zeal, to discredit the cause of Peace. May not this be done with a view to the actual accomplishment of a national bankruptcy? May he not wish the war, which he says cannot be carried on for even a few years longer, without a national bankruptcy, to continue those years, that this bankruptcy may be ensured? May he not deprecate a Peace, lest, by the financial relief which it would afford, a national bankruptcy might be avoided? If Mr. Cobbett, however, desires the continuance of war for this purpose, it is for those who dissent from Mr. Cobbett in the wish for a national bankruptcy, to consider what object they can propose to themselves, by the continuance in a course which is represented as leading to such extraordinary consequences.—Whoever looks upon a national bankruptcy as one of the most terrible calamities, ought to be cautious how he adopts the alacrity of Mr. Cobbett, in cheering the orators of war.

There is an admission of Mr. Cobbett's, made with great naïveté, in some observations on the first intimations respecting peace, which transpired from the Grenville Ministry. In the Register of August 2d, 1806, he says; "For the state in which "we now are, none but the Addington part of the Ministry "are to blame; and I shall not be in haste to say that any peace "they make is inexpedient; for I cannot see how our situation "is to become better by war." This, Mr. Cobbett, is a very just and sensible observation. Yet, at that time, both Russia and Prussia were unsubdued, from both of which powers there were many among us who expected the defeat of Bonaparte. But, if with the assistance of Prussia and Russia, you could not see how our situation was to become better by war, how can you see it now, when those two powers are ranged along with Denmark on the the other side?

It is true, you add, "that you cannot see how, on the other "hand, our situation is to become better by the name of Peace, "being convinced that no treaty will, under the present circumstances, produce any thing more."

But, Mr. Cobbett, it can be made very clearly appear, from your writings at that time, that it had never entered into your mind as a possible case, that we could by any means obtain from Bonaparte the terms which he actually offered. You were firmly convinced that he would demand concessions from this country of the greatest and most momentous extent, and that he would refuse to make Peace unless he attained them. What was the fact? Bonaparte made concessions, instead of demanding them. Had you been a consistent man, were your eyes not blinded to the interests of your country, by your passions and your prejudices, you would have exulted to find yourself thus mistaken in the character of our enemy. You would have regarded this extraordinary fact as a proof that our enemy, instead of declining peace, was sincerely desirous to obtain it.

In proof that you expected the whole business of the negotiation to be a mere arrangement of the concession which England was to make, we appeal to your own words. After the quotation above, you immediately add, "As to anything that we have "taken, or any thing that we possess, out of Great Britain and "Ireland, and the West Indies, I shall feel no sorrow at any "surrender or cession that may be made." Thus, then, Malta, and the Cape of Good Hope, and Hanover, and Pondicherry, and Sicily, all these you expected to be demanded, and all these you would have resigned, without sorrow, in a treaty of Peace. Nay, it appears, that all your fear was, lest concessions of still greater moment should not only be demanded, but made. You were alarmed lest, in order to recover Hanover, the Ministers should even sacrifice some of the greatest interests of the state. To the above quotation you add, "Yet I have my fears, and "those fears I will express now, before it be too late. I fear "that HANOVER will be the great object. I do fear that, for "this Electorate we shall make almost any sacrifices that may "be demanded at our hands." You next go on to explain what you feared those sacrifices would be—sacrifices "affecting "even our maritime establishment, and in our internal govern-"ment;" sacrifices "by which our interest and our safety "at home would be hazarded."

About the same time we find some very severe and pertinent observations in the Political Register on the Morning Post, and some other of the Papers in the cause of the "Pitt crew," as Mr. Cobbett at that time denominated the present Ministry, then in opposition. These papers attempted to provide themselves beforehand with a plea for railing against the expected Peace, by holding out exorbitant terms, as what should be insisted on by this country. "To hear these writers," says Mr. Cobbett, "one "would imagine that we were negotiating at the end of another "Queen Anne's war. But the fact is, they expect no such "terms. Shallow and uninformed as they may be, they well "know, that, after the proposing of such terms, Lord Lauder-"dale would not remain long enough at Paris to pack up his "papers. They know this, and they are mean enough to hold "a high-sounding language, in order to provide themselves be-"forehand with a sort of consistent ground for censuring such "a Peace as they know must be made. If any Peace at all be "made under our present circumstances. In order, however, "to give a colour of reason for these feigned expectations as to "terms, these writers, and particularly my foolish friend of "the Morning Post, deal largely in flattering descriptions of "the advantageous position in which this country is now placed, "and as if he was resolved to set ridicule and contempt at open "defiance, he dwells with peculiar delight upon the flourishing "state of our finances!" After several remarks to prove the absurdity of these representations, Mr. Cobbett adds, "Enough "has been said to expose the ignorance of this stickler for high "terms of peace, upon the ground of our pecuniary ability to "carry on the war.—The fact is, that, if the war be carried "on, new taxes must be imposed; or, in other words, an addition "must be made to the Income Tax; or still, more properly "speaking, a greater deduction must be made from the dividends. "People may cry out against this as long as they please; but, "let them, then, not expect high terms of Peace; let them not "vapour about security; let them submit to the deduction to a "greater, and a greater, and a greater deduction at the Bank; "or let them be silent about the terms of a disgraceful Peace; "for one or the other they must submit to. Many of the "measures of the Ministry I greatly dislike, particularly those "which have had a tendency to screen public robbers; but I "shall not for this, or for any other cause, join in the cry of "those, who one minute reproach them with having hastened "to put an end to the War, and the next censure them for having "adopted the only means, by which it is possible, under the "present system of expenditure, that the War can be supported "for any length of time."

Such was the strength of Mr. Cobbett's impressions respecting the unfavourable terms of Peace, which would alone be offered by Bonaparte. How different was the fact! Scarcely was there an object we proposed, with which he did not comply. All the grounds of Mr. Cobbett's fears were removed. Hanover was yielded up without a stipulation; and to this were joined Malta, the Cape of Good Hope, Pondicherry, and Tobago. But, as is well observed by the author of "Commerce De-"fended," (p. 152), "It is not so much the favourable terms "here offered to us as the tone of the negociation, which is the "wonderful circumstance. On our side appear the utmost "haughtiness and impatience. At every untoward incident "were we for putting an end to the negociation instantly; "demanded our passports; and seemed to think it condescension "to say to the French negociator that we would meet him again "upon the business. The French even submitted to court us, "not to break off the negociation; and offered such terms, as "we should not beforehand have easily believed we could ob-"tain."

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE SWEDISH AND DANISH PAPERS.

SWEDEN.

GOTTENBURGH, FEB. 15.—The accounts from Stockholm lately received, stating that Russia had declared war against Sweden, appear to have been premature, for though that event is expected, it has not yet taken place; neither have the Russian and Danish Ministers left Copenhagen, nor the Swedish Minister that of the Court of St. Petersburgh.—Every preparation is making in Swedish Finland to oppose any hostilities that may be attempted against it. On this side the greatest activity prevails. The Swedish fleet in Carlscrona, consisting of twelve sail of the line, &c. is nearly ready for sea.

FEB. 20.—Intelligence has just arrived, that the French, to the number of 40,000 men, are marching in two divisions for Zealand; the first division was to leave Lubeck, on the 12th of this month. Bernadotte was at Copenhagen on Wednesday last, making the necessary arrangements.

Digitized by Google

FEB. 22.—Letters received from Hensingburgh to-day state, that the object of the above army is not to go to Zealand, but to march through Jutland, and from thence embark for Norway, and by this route enter Sweden. We are now more impatient than ever for the arrival of an English fleet to watch their motions. All accounts seem to corroborate their being on their march through Holstein. We have a strange report to-day, that the Rochefort squadron is bound hither, to co-operate with them.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, FEB. 6.—The brig Martha Helena, from St. Croix to Copenhagen, had the good fortune to escape the enemy, and to get into Klevens, in Norway. A ship belonging to the East India Company, which left Batavia about seven months ago, has likewise arrived at Walderhoug, in Norway, into which port a privateer from Bergen has brought an English ship from Archangel, with 2200 tons of tar. The French lugger Le Glaneur, of 16 guns and 64 men, commanded by Capt. Merleer, a Member of the Legion of Honour, has come into Stavanger with three English ships, laden with coals.

FEB. 16.—According to the last accounts from France, an embargo has been laid on all Sardinian ships in the French ports; and all cruizers and privateers have obtained leave to chace not only all ships under Sardinian colours, but also all ships which set sail from Sardinia as are bound to that Island. We learn by a letter from Vienna, that the Russian troops in Italy, who were under marching orders to return to Russia, have received counter orders, in consequence of the Emperor Napoleon finding it necessary that they should for the present remain in Italy.

RUSSIA.

PETERSBURG, JAN. 6.—General Baron Samokelsky has been appointed Inspector of Artillery, instead of Count Arakatchgew; and Prince Lebanof Rostowsky, Military Governor of Petersburgh.

PRUSSIA.

KONINGSBERG, JAN. 21.—Orders have been sent by their respective Courts to the Russian and Prussian Ministers at Copenhagen to make the strongest remonstrances against the violent proceedings of the Danes in the Baltic, and against the jurisdiction they have assumed over Russian and Prussian ships.

GERMANY.

VIENNA, JAN. 23.—A report is in circulation, that the Grand Duke Constantine is expected at Jassy. An English squadron has appeared in the Adriatic, with a view, it is thought, of observing the Russian squadron that is at Trieste.

JAN. 30.—The last courier which our Cabinet sent to London, returned here on the 27th inst. and brings dispatches, which state that the British Government rejects the offer of our mediation, since which preparations indicative of the departure of the English Minister are observed, and we learn that our late Ambassador at London, Prince Starhemberg, is on his way hither. A report is circulated, that the English have taken possession of several Islands in the Archipelago.

TRIESTE, JAN. 17.—It is said, that the Russian squadron lately arrived here, will sail immediately for Venice, for the purpose of wintering and revictualling.

FRANKFORT, FEB. 6.—We are assured that the troops of the Prince of the Confederation of the Rhine have received orders to hold themselves in readiness to march at the first notice. Perhaps they are destined to replace the French troops in Dalmatia, in case these should be obliged to march to India. According to the latest intelligence, the English have possessed themselves of all the islands in the Archipelago.

HOLLAND.

AMSTERDAM, JAN. 30.—We have received intelligence that an English expedition, having on board from 10,000 to 12,000 troops, is arrived in the Archipelago. It is said, that it sailed from England on the 15th of Nov.

FRANCE.

Dispatches [illegible] They write from Bourdeaux, under date [illegible] four French frigates which were in the [illegible], as well as the Rochefort squadron, [illegible] of the line, and two frigates.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, FEB. 29.

The Brazil Trade Bill, and Treasurer of the Navy Regulation Bill, were read a third time.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

On the Order of the Day being moved.

Lord St. John rose to make his promised motion, for Resolutions to be adopted by the House declaratory of the impolicy of these measures, and the absence of every ground on which they could be fairly supported, particularly as they went to affect America. Out of five Regulations which he had to move on the subject, he should first move the following:—"That it is the opinion of this House, that no information has been received that the United States of America had up to the 11th of November last, acquiesced in the injustice of the French Decree, or that the French Government had entered it against the United States.

In the sequel of the Debate, the original motion was supported by Lords Lauderdale, Howick, and Grenville; while Lords Redesdale, Westmorland, Hawkesbury, and Galloway, argued in support of the previous question, which was carried, on a division, by 137 to 47, Proxies included.

A Protest against the decision was entered on these Journals, and signed by a considerable number of Peers.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 1.

The Ten Millions Exchequer Bills Bill, and the Petty Customs Bill were read a third time and passed.

LORD LAKE.

The Order of the Day being read to take into consideration His Majesty's Message. Lord Hawkesbury rose, and entered into a general survey of the long and various services of General Lake. The Noble Lord then concluded with moving an humble Address to His Majesty, assuring His Majesty that the House would cordially concur in giving effect to His Majesty's most gracious Message.—The motion was agreed to Nem. Con.

PLACE REVERSION BILL.

LORD LAUDERDALE rose, agreeable to notice, to move the second reading of this Bill; and as the ground of his reasoning upon it moved, that the speeches delivered in that House in His Majesty's name, on the 27th April and on 22d June, 1807, be read, which being read accordingly, his Lordship proceeded to comment on the spirit of economy which pervaded them, and the recommendation to Parliament to pay their early and serious attention to measures of this nature; and then moved that the Bill be read a second time.

LORD ARDEN persisted in his former objections to the Bill, chiefly as it went to encroach upon and controul the undoubted prerogative of the Crown.

EARL SPENCER gave the Bill his decided support.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he should support the motion for the second reading only on the understanding that it should be fully discused in the committee, and modified to a certain extent.

After which, the House divided on the question of the second reading.—Contents, 69—Non-Contents, 61. Majority for the second reading of the Bill, 8.—Adjourned till Thursday.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.

LIVERPOOL PETITION.

LORD DERBY said, that a Petition from the Merchants, &c. of Liverpool had been transmitted to him, to be presented against the Orders in Council. He was anxious to know when the Petition might be presented in due form, the more so, as it was drawn up in manner and matter to which he did not conceive there could be any objection.

LORD HAWKESBURY could assure the Noble Earl, that it was not the intention of His Majesty's Government to hurry the Bill through the House.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

LORD ERSKINE read his resolutions (the drift of them went to shew that the Orders in Council were not only a violation of the law of nations, but also of the municipal law, and of the common and statute law of the country), and he should then move that the order of the day for his motion be discharged, and that a new order be made for Tuesday next.—Ordered.

LORD LAUDERDALE wished that the motion of which he had given notice, might follow that of his Noble and Learned Friend.

Digitized by Google

With that view he should move, that the Order for Monday next be discharged, and that a new order be made out for Friday next.

THE COPENHAGEN EXPEDITION.

The Order of the Day was then read, and Lord Darnley rose to make his promised motion respecting the justice and morality of the attack on Copenhagen. This subject has already been so often discussed, that nothing new could well be offered upon it; and accordingly there was scarcely a new point struck out in the course of the debate. The Noble Lord concluded with moving an address to His Majesty, setting forth the injurious tendency of that measure, to prove the necessity of which the documents laid on the table were wholly imperfect and unsatisfactory.

Lord Elliot rose to oppose the Address. So far from any fair ground existing in support of such an Address, to him it appeared that there was abundant cause to command, instead of censuring the conduct of Ministers in that respect. The Noble Lord took a survey of all the circumstances which past marked the transaction, and concluded with reading a Resolution of approbation, which it was his intention to move, if the Address moved by the Noble Earl should be negatived.

Lord Holland spoke at great length in support of the Address.

Lord Boringdon expressed his intention to support the Resolution proposed by Lord Elliot.

Lord Holland shortly explained; after which the question was put, and the House divided on Lord Darnley's motion—Contents present 26, Proxies 25—51. Non-Contents present 56, Proxies 54—110. Majority 59.

A short debate took place on Lord Elliot's Resolution, upon which the House again divided—Contents present 64, Proxies 61—125. Non-Contents present 29, Proxies 28—57. Majority 86. Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4.

Counsel were heard in the Scotch Appeal, Rickan v. the Trustees of Stewart.

The Marquis of Buckingham and Lord Selsea, took the oaths and their seats.

The Scotch Distillery Bill was read a second time.

Lord Lauderdale gave notice, that on Monday he should move for a Copy, or Extracts, of any Correspondence with his Majesty's Allies, and particularly with Sweden, relative to the Orders in Council.—Adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 29.

LORD LAKE.

Lord Castlereagh moved the Order of the Day for the House to resolve into a Committee to take into consideration his Majesty's Message, requesting the House to make provision for the family of the late Lord Lake. The Speaker having left the Chair, Lord Castlereagh addressed the Committee. He stated that he now came forward with a Resolution, in obedience to the King's Message, and he trusted there would be little difficulty in persuading the Committee to agree to what he should propose, as such grants had always been the practice of Parliament to bestow, especially upon men distinguished for splendid military abilities.—These abilities having been crowned with success. Lord Castlereagh went on to describe the heroic atchievements of Lord Lake, in early life, in America; in Europe, at Lincelles; and finally, in Asia. After eulogising his merits, he stated, that with regard to the female part of Lord Lake's family, his Lordship had left them little or nothing, 1,500*l.* a-year. In consideration, however, of his Lordship's most eminent services having been displayed, in India, in 1803, it was intended to propose a pension of 2,000*l.* per annum to the present Lord Lake, and to the two next heirs male, and to make this pension payable, from the 11th of September, 1803. This would make the proper arrangements for the female part of the family. After that Resolution should be carried, he should follow it up by another, for an Address to his Majesty, enabling him to order a Monument to be erected, to perpetuate the memory and services of Lord Lake.

Mr. Whitbread objected to the Resolution. He observed, that if the Noble Lord seemed to have laboured the matter much, [illegible] was necessary now, how much more necessary was it at the time, when Lord Lake was alive and susceptible of enjoying the dignities conferred on him, and the liberality of Parliament at the same time. He was sorry to learn that Lord Lake's family stood in need of such assistance. He should not, therefore, object to the vote altogether, only he did not wish to go to such an extent.

Mr. W. Dundas supported the Motion.

Mr. M. A. Taylor argued strenuously in favour of the motion, and dwelt much on Lord Lake's gallant conduct at Lincelles, and his brilliant and important victories in India. Lord Lake had left but forty thousand pounds to support the dignity of the title, and to provide for a family of seven children. If some provision was not to be made for the families of meritorious officers in cases of this kind, they ought to be restricted from marrying, like Catholic Priests (a laugh). The daughters of Lord Lake would have but 1,500*l.* each under their father's will.

Lord Folkstone opposed the grant. He thought those who held places of high profit without saving, had no right to come to Parliament for relief. He was particularly adverse to the grant of a monument.

Mr. Whitbread said, there were radical objections in his mind to the erection of a monument to the memory of Lord Lake. He did not think Lord Lake's services entitled him to the distinction of pre-eminent services.

Sir F. Burdett entered his protest against the vote. In the present state of the public burthens, he did not think Parliament should be called upon to make such grants. The Crown possessed ample means of rewarding all military merit without coming to Parliament. He would not say any thing to detract from the merits of Lord Lake. But let these merits be ever so great, they were but a small part of the question. Consistently with a due regard to public economy, he felt himself compelled to oppose the motions, and to take the sense of the House on them.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, the Crown possesses no power of conferring adequate rewards and provisions without the aid of Parliament. The highest pension that could be granted on the Civil List, was 1,200*l.* a-year, of which only 800*l.* clear would be received, and this the King could grant only for the period of his own life. He supported the motion generally.

Sir F. Burdett had heard nothing that could induce him from his intention of dividing the House on the whole proposition. The Right Hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer must have known even by looking round his own family, that he alluded to other means of rewarding meritorious service than those the Civil List afforded. Where were the sinecures, the patent places, and reversions? If Ministers would come and state to the House that these things were abolished, there would be an obligation to grant ample provision to every meritorious officer: But while they existed, and were disposed of no body knew how, nor for what service, (though he believed, indeed, the Right Hon. Gentleman opposite knew it), he could not allow Parliament to vote away the Public money on every demand of this kind. He would act honestly, without regard to what any man, or any set of men may think; and he felt himself bound to persist in what he called taking the sense of the House, though the sense of the House was already well known.

Several Members spoke for and against the motions, after which the House divided.—For the motion in the House.—Ayes, 201; Noes, 26.—On the question for a Monument to Lord Lake's memory, another division took place—Ayes, 202; Noes, 15.

RUSSIAN MEDIATION.

Mr. Whitbread said, that the Commissioners who delivered his Majesty's Speech, gave a hope, that all the Papers, respecting the Russian Mediation, would be laid before the House; he saw with what difficulty they had obtained the few now on the table, which was a convincing proof that Ministers had acted improperly, and was fearful of that reprobation which their conduct so justly merited. We are now arrived at an important crisis, and certainly he must say, that opportunities had been most shamefully neglected when a Peace was attainable on honourable terms, through the Mediation of Russia. He said the war in which we are engaged is continued year after year without any hope of its being terminated, without knowing the precise object in contention; then he called to the recollection of the House the number of Petitions which are daily pouring in upon us from the manufacturing towns; and he hoped that they would at once open the eyes of Ministers as to the real situation of the country. It was evident that Ministers had neglected the means put in their power to obtain peace. The Honourable Member maintained it was not yet too late—it was desirable—and why not comply with the wishes of the people. It was no degradation to apply in direct terms to Bonaparte; then if he refused, he was certain it would unite the people at large, who would consider their privations as nothing. The Hon. Member then submitted the following Resolutions:—

Resolved, 1st. That it is the opinion of this House, that the conditions stipulated by his Majesty's Ministers for the acceptance of the Mediation of the Emperor of Russia were inexpedient and impolitic.

2dly, That it is the opinion of this House, that the conduct of his Majesty's Ministers on the refusal of the mediation offered by the Emperor of Austria, was inexpedient and impolitic, and not calculated to ascertain how far the restoration of the blessings of Peace might, or might not, have been attainable through the means of such mediation.

3dly, That this House feels it incumbent on itself to declare, that there is nothing in the present circumstance of the war which ought to preclude his Majesty from embracing every fair opportunity of acceding to our commencing a Negociation with the enemy, on a footing of equality, for the termination of hostilities, on terms of justice and honour.

Mr. Secretary Canning, in a most brilliant and able speech, expressed his readiness to enter at any time into Negociations for Peace, consistent with the honour and the dignity of the country; but he maintained, that until certain information was received that the French Government was prepared to enter into negociations on an equitable basis, it would be imprudent to attempt any. And said it was the intention of the British Government to enter into negociations for peace, but in the Official Notes which passed through the hands of Count Starhemberg, the Austrian Minister, an ambiguous style was conspicuous, evidently the effect of design. In one of the Notes the words "at war with England." were inserted, instead of at war against England. The former conveyed a different meaning from the sense required, and admitted of several constructions. A second Note was sent with a most singular omission in grammar. A request was made that the omission might be filled up, but the omission still existed, and it was evident that these errors were intentional. Ministers had determined not to enter upon negociation, unless it was upon a footing that was likely to insure a successful issue.

Mr. Whitbread replied, after which the House divided on each of the three propositions he had moved, which were all negatived. The following are the numbers which appeared on each division.

1st Division—Ayes 70——Noes 210.
2d ——————Ayes 67——Noes 211.
3d ——————Ayes 58——Noes 217.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 1.

Committees were chosen by ballot, to try and determine the merits of the Petitions complaining of undue Elections, and Returns for the Borough of Newcastle and Yarmouth.

A Message from the Lords informed the House their Lordships had agreed to the Ten Millions and a Half Exchequer Bills' Bill.

Mr. Perceval moved the Order of the Day for the House taking into farther consideration the Report of the Committee of Supply of Friday, granting the Army Estimates. A short discussion ensued, when the Resolutions were agreed to.

The Secretary at War obtained leave to bring in the Annual Mutiny Bill.

The adjourned debate on the Oude Papers was, on the motion of Lord Folkestone, postponed till Wednesday se'nnight.

Mr. Ponsonby deferred his motion for certain Papers, relative to Copenhagen, till to-morrow week.

Mr. Sharpe deferred his motion, for a Vote of Censure on Ministers, from to-morrow, until Friday, the 11th inst.

Mr. Wharton brought up the Report of the Committee on his Majesty's Message, relative to a Pension to the Heirs of Lord Lake. The Resolutions were agreed to, and a Bill was ordered.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 2.

The Chairman of the Great Yarmouth Election Committee reported, that the Sitting Members were duly elected, and that the Petitions against their returns were not frivolous or vexatious.

An Account was presented, shewing the Receipt and Expenditure of the Chest at Chatham, in 1807.

Lord Castlereagh withdrew his notice for an Address to the King, respecting the erection of a Monument to the memory of the late Lord Lake. His reasons for this were, first, that the proposition did not seem to meet the consent of the House; and, secondly, that the only instance in point was, the case of the late Lord Howe, to whose memory a monument had been erected by the authority of that House.

Mr. J. Buller obtained leave to bring in a Bill for regulating his Majesty's Marine Forces, while on shore.

Mr. Wharton brought up a Report on the Act of the 43d of the King, granting certain Drawback Duties on Sugar, near expiring. Leave was given to bring in a Bill continuing the said Act.

Mr. Huskisson presented several Papers, relating to the ship Etrusco. He was sorry a Copy of Sir Home Popham's Memorial to the King could not be produced, as the original was not in the office. Laid on the table.

The Scotch Distillery Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Pilots' Regulation Bill was read a second time, and committed for to-morrow.

Lord Castlereagh brought up a Bill for the better payment of the Army and their Quarters, and for punishing Mutiny and Desertion. Read a first time.

After a few observations by Mr. Windham, who gave notice that, in the further progress of the Bill, he should oppose it, in so far as it did away limited service, and rendered the Militia the only means of recruiting the Regiments of the Line.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 3.

On the motion of Mr. Perceval, the second reading of the Bill imposing a duty on Salt, was postponed till this day three months, in other words the Bill was given up, owing to certain representations that had been made to the Right Honourable Gentleman respecting it.

MR. GIFFARD.

Sir J. Newport rose, pursuant to his notice, in order to move for certain Papers respecting the restoration of Mr. Giffard to his office of Accountant-General of the Customs. He moved for a copy of the patent by which Mr. Giffard was lately appointed to the office of Surveyor of the Customs in the port of Dublin.

Sir A. Wellesley objected to the motion, as the Hon. Baronet had stated no ground for it.

Sir J. Newport replied that he did not wish to say much until the Papers should be laid before the House. He could, however, assert one thing, viz. that if the dismissal of Mr. G. was originally right by Lord Hardwick, it was wrong in the Duke of Richmond to restore him; not only to restore him, but to give him an additional office. Mr. Giffard had been extremely active in fomenting the differences between the Protestants and Catholics.

Mr. Croker observed, that the dismissal of Mr. Giffard from his office, if not an arbitrary and cruel act on the part of Lord Hardwick's Administration, was ill-judged, and an act contrary to justice. The Hon. Gentleman contended, that Mr. Giffard was not amenable to such a summary mode of punishment, he having acted on that occasion merely in his capacity as a Member of the Corporation of Dublin. He had been in possession of his office for twenty-three years. He was decidedly against the motion.

Mr. G. Ponsonby observed, that the Hon. Gentleman who spoke last, had asserted that Lord Hardwick had exercised his authority in an arbitrary manner. The Hon. Gentleman had, it would appear, committed a bull upon this point. He had spoken in defence of Mr. Giffard, and had attacked the conduct of Lord Hardwick, but naturally enough he had declared he should vote AGAINST the production of the Papers which were to elucidate the charge.

Mr. Fitzgerald, Dr. Lawrence, Mr. Grattan, Lord H. Petty, Mr. W. Smith, and Sir J. Newport, argued in favour of the motion; and Dr. Duigenan and Mr. Perceval against it, when the House divided.

For the motion, 57—Against it, 103—Majority against the motion, 46.

ROCHEFORT SQUADRON.

Mr. Calcraft brought forward his promised motion respecting the Squadron under the command of Sir R. Strachan having been under the necessity of quitting Basque Roads from a want of provisions, which had given the Rochefort Squadron an opportunity to escape. With regard to the point to which his motion bore, the fact was, that Sir R. Strachan had been compelled to leave Basque Roads for want of a sufficient supply of provisions: and the House would be astonished when he stated that the gallant Admiral had neither relief by ships to replace those on the blockade, or by transports with provisions, for a period of ten weeks. After this, Sir Richard quitted his station, and proceeded to cruize in the offing, when he met two British men of war, and the Mediator transport. From these he obtained a supply of provisions, but it did not appear to be sufficient to enable Sir Richard to follow the enemy; for he was compelled to draw supplies from the squadron off Ferrol.

Digitized by Google

The neglect of Government in this respect was unaccountable. He concluded by moving for the production of a copy of all letters that passed between Sir R. Strachan and Lord Gardner, and for a list of the ships composing the squadron of Sir R. Strachan, before Rochefort, in December, January, and February last.

Mr. W. Pole stated, that the situation of Sir R. Strachan's squadron, the day after the enemy escaped, was not ascertained at home until the 18th of January; but the Hon. Gentlemen had given later accounts, where he had got them he did not know. On that day, however, Sir Richard's ships had been supplied with ten weeks' bread, 13 or 14 weeks' provisions, and the Mediator transport, as she had been called, was a large man of war, fitted up as a provision ship. She sailed on the 6th of January, having been prevented by contrary winds, and on the 18th she delivered to the squadron a large supply of provisions and 40 live bullocks. It was true, Sir R. Strachan spoke the Ferrol squadron, but he took no provisions from it. He then said that before he had heard of the Hon. Gentleman's motion, it was his intention to submit to the House several Resolutions, and lay on the table all the information now required, which would enable the House to judge of the exertions of the Noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty.

Mr. Calcraft said, that when the Papers now sought for were laid before the House, he pledged himself that he would make out a most flagrant case of neglect against the Admiralty. The Motion was then agreed to.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Lord H. Petty rose, and moved, "That an Address be presented to his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to cause to be laid before that House the substance of any communication received from his Allies in Europe, relative to the Orders of the 11th of November.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer opposed the motion, Sir A. Piggott supported it, and after a few words from Mr. Canning, Dr. Lawrence, Mr. Robinson, Mr Lambe, Mr. Rose, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. A. Baring, and Lord H. Petty, the gallery was cleared, when the House divided—For the Motion 71; Against it 150.—Majority 59.

LIVERPOOL ELECTION.

General Gascoigne stated, that he held in his hand a petition from his constituents in Liverpool, signed by more than 3000 of the most respectable merchants and others, against the Orders in Council. The Orders in Council were severely felt already in Liverpool, by a total loss of the American trade. Last year, no less than 129,000 tons of shipping cleared out for America; the dock-dues alone amounted to 31,000*l.* together with 150,000*l.* annual disbursements. He concluded by moving leave to lay the petition on the table.

The Speaker said, it was contrary to the forms of the House, to receive a petition against a revenue bill.

Mr. Tierney reprobated the mode adopted by Ministers, to shut out the complaints of the people of England from that House.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer said, they were bound to respect the forms of the House, which prevented the prayer of the petition from being received.

In the further progress of the debate, Mr. Sheridan, Mr. Whitbread, and Lord H. Petty, spoke in favour of receiving the petition; and General Tarleton, Mr. Huskisson, and Mr. Rose, against it, when a division took place—Ayes 80; Noes 128.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4.

The Saint Saviour's Poor Bill was, on the motion of Mr. H. Thornton, read a third time and passed.

The Cotton Wool Export Prohibition Bill was reported, and ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

The Sugar Drawback Duties Continuation Bill, and the Sugar Bounty Bill, was severally read a second time, and committed for Monday.

Mr. Huskisson brought up a Bill empowering the Commissioners, in whom a sum of 600,000*l.* had been invested in the Government of America for the payment of British claimants, to withdraw the balance of that sum from the Bank, and invest it in the purchase of Exchequer Bills. Read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

Mr. Rose deferred till Monday his motion relating to Bounties granted for carrying on the foreign trade.

Mr. Windham, preparatory to the discussion on the Mutiny Bill, moved for the Copies of the Orders and Regulations respecting the Army, agreed to by his Majesty, pursuant to an Act of the last Parliament.—Ordered.

LIVERPOOL PETITION.

Mr. Tierney presented a Petition, signed by three respectable Gentlemen of Liverpool, the Delegates of the others in that town, against the Orders in Council. The petition stated, that their first petition had been rejected by the House on account of a point of form; and the present petition prayed the House that the petitioners might be heard by Counsel at the bar, when they would prove by evidence how injurious these Orders in Council had been, and were likely to prove to their interests.

Mr. Perceval objected to the Petition being received, as it was one and the same with that rejected last night.

Mr. Tierney said it was not a Petition against the Orders in Council Bill, but against the Orders themselves, and the Petitioners surely had a right to be heard.

The Gentlemen who spoke against the Petition were Mr. S. Bourne, Mr. Perceval, and the Solicitor-General; those who supported it were Mr. Tierney, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. W. Smith, Mr. Alderman Combe, Dr. Lawrence, and Mr. Eden.

The House divided—For receiving the Petition 55—Against it 111—Majority 56.

LAW OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. W. Adam submitted to the House the following Resolution:—

"That it appeared that one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State did read, in the course of the debate, garbled or mutilated extracts from letters to and from Foreign Ministers, without leave of his Majesty, which he afterwards refused to lay before the House, and that such conduct is highly subversive of the common usage of Parliament."

Mr. Canning said he should have no difficulty in convincing the House that the custom of reading extracts of letters in debate was of long standing. Mr. Pitt had been frequently in the habit of doing it. Lord Howick had done the like. The House would remember, that even the Learned Gentleman himself had been guilty of the same practice. Mr. Canning concluded by saying, that when any Member was criminated, it was agreeable to the forms of the House, and therefore he must withdraw.

The question was loudly called for, when the Speaker interposed, and said the Right Hon. Gentleman was perfectly correct in withdrawing during the discussion.

Mr. Windham contended that the Right Hon. Secretary had not vindicated himself; on the contrary, such a practice could not be tolerated.

Mr. Perceval said, during the time he had had the honour of a seat in that House, he never heard of a charge of less foundation. The House knew it was the constant custom to read extracts.

The Speaker put the question, and the gallery was cleared. The previous question was carried by a majority of 101, the Ayes being 168, the Noes 67.

The further consideration of the Orders in Council Bill was deferred till Monday, to which day the House adjourned.

WEST INDIES.

Barbadoes, Jan. 2.—The greater part of the expected London trade which sailed on the 15th November for the West Indies, has arrived here. On Wednesday the Meleager with twenty-nine sail arrived, and in the course of that day one or two others of the convoy also came in; and on the following day the Satellite, with nine or ten more, likewise arrived. This fleet has throughout the whole passage experienced very boisterous weather, and were frequently separated, and there still remain about twenty sail unaccounted for. The ship Marlborough, one of the above fleet, is ashore at Round Rock, off the S. E. end of the Island, and is supposed will be lost, The crew, passengers, and cargo, all safe.—The Meleagar has since proceeded with the Jamaica trade; and the Satellite has now signals flying for a convoy for Grenada, &c.

Jan. 5.—There is strong presumption that the enemy has thrown some farther reinforcements into Martinique, although upon the whole of no great magnitude. His Majesty's ship Camilla, it will be remembered, arrived here on the 24th ult. and reported having seen off Martinique, and observed to bring up in Fort Royal Bay, on the 18th, two French frigates which she fell in with in beating up from Tobago. These vessels Capt. Bowen was so near as to distinguish to be frigates of a large class, with yellow sides; and kept sight of them until ten that night, when they came to off Fort Royal. We have been thus particular in recapitulating the above account, to shew that these vessels can have no reference to those which, by accounts received here yesterday from St. Vincent, were seen standing into Fort Royal on the 24th, the day that the Camilla arrive there, it appears, saw on the above day three cruizers working into Fort Royal Bay, and taking them for our men of war, hauled close in under the land after them, when she discovered they were enemy's vessels, one a frigate, another a ship corvette, and the other a brig of war, and observed a sloop and a schooner come out from the land, and join them, when she hauled off; but before losing sight of them saw the whole five stand into the Bay. It is thus evident that the enemy's force in these seas has been increased, both military and naval, as there is every probability that these vessels had troops on board, which indeed it has been ascertained the two frigates really had, and in great numbers.

SCOTLAND.

At Lochglass, in the parish of Alness, on the 10th curt. a man of the name of Munro and his sister were found dead in a small cot, where they were carrying on illegal distillation. No marks of violence appearing on their bodies, their death has been attributed to the lightning which, on that tempestuous night, accompanied a very heavy fall of snow that completely covered the hut. From the nature of the business, however, in which they had been engaged, and which, from various considerations, we have cause to lament is too frequently pursued, it is more probable that their death was occasioned by the exclusion of the atmospheric air, and the exhalation of carbonic acid gas, from several casks of wash, or pot-ale, found in a state of fermentation in the cot.

The fire-damps issuing from coal-mines have, by recent experiments, been found to consist in 100 parts of 68 inflammable gas, 6½ oxigen, 25½ azote, and 5 carbonic acid, being nearly the same as the gas obtained from stagnant water, or that from the destructive distillation of pit-coal, and not, as has been supposed, any admixture of sulphurated hydrogen; whence it is evident, that the fire-damp is not the immediate product of the decomposed water by beds of pyrites, nor of water by coal, but probably results from coal distilled by heat of pyrites, excited by the occasional influx of water.

PROVINCIALS.

BIRMINGHAM, FEB. 29.—About seven o'clock in the evening, a meteor (commonly called a fire ball,) was observed in and about this town; when first seen, it appeared to be about 40 feet from the ground, in its course inclining to the earth, in a line from north to south; and it is supposed must have been soon after dissipated, but no explosion was heard. This meteor was of uncommon brilliancy; the shape very much resembled that of a comet, having a tail, the length of which was apparently about three feet, and breadth four inches, and the diameter of the ball about one foot.

MAD DOGS.—At Newbury, on Tuesday morning last, a greyhound almost tore off the nose of a child, about three years of age; soon after, he bit a man in the hand, almost through; and it is feared he has bitten many other persons. He was at length killed. Seven persons have who have been bitten about Newbury, passed through that town in a caravan about a week since, on their way to the salt water at Southampton.

The following receipt for the cure of the bite of a mad dog, has been applied with the happiest success, as well in the brute creation as in the human species:—

Take the yolks of three eggs and as much oil of olives as will fill three half egg shells—put them together into a fry-pan over a gentle fire, and keep stirring with a knife until they turn to a conserve or thick jelly:—To be taken after fasting six hours; and to fast six hours from meat and drink after taking it. The wound, if there be any, to be kept open with a wooden skewer, and the medicine applied to it twice a-day. The affected part should be rubbed as soon as possible, after being bitten, with the oil of olives. As soon as the dose has been administered the patient should be put into a warm bed, as it will cause a great perspiration.

A striking display of omnipotence of love, occurred at the High Church, Hull, a few days ago. A young woman having given her heart to a sailor, who was impressed and carried on board the tender by the interference of her friends, resolved nevertheless to marry the object of her choice: He was accordingly brought on shore, and escorted by the press-gang to the church, from whence, after the marriage ceremony, he was again conveyed to the tender.

The following singular circumstance took place at Sheffield some time ago:—A young woman was married on Thursday, brought to bed on Friday, the child died on the Saturday, was interred on the Sunday, the husband enlisted for a soldier on Monday, marched away on Tuesday.

MURDER!—A horrid murder was committed on Friday se'nnight, at Hallend, in the parish of Wootten Waven, on the body of John Booth, jun. The deceased was found in the stable, with five or six wounds on the head, and the skull fractured, lying near to the horses heels. A coroner's inquest was taken by Thomas Hunt, Esq. which sat the whole of Saturday and Monday, to ascertain the cause of his death, when they returned a verdict of Wilful Murder; and, dreadful to relate, on Tuesday his brother was committed to Warwick gaol, by the Coroner, on suspicion of being the perpetrator of the horrid act.

HERTFORD ASSIZES.

HERTFORD, MARCH 3.—Mr. Justice Heath arrived this morning, and read the King's Commission for holding the Assizes for this County; but as it was late before his Lordship arrived in town, only one cause was tried in the course of the day, which was wholly uninteresting.

FRIDAY, MARCH 4.

HORRID MURDER AT HODDESDON.

Thomas Simmons was indicted, for that he, at Broxbourn, in this county, on the 20th of October last, did make an assault on Sarah Hummerstone, and wilfully gave her a mortal wound in the neck with a knife, of which she instantly died.—This is the case of the inhuman wretch who murdered the two unfortunate women at Hoddesdon, and the Court was crowded at an early hour in the morning to hear the trial. It did not last long, as the facts lay in a very narrow compass. The prisoner, on being brought to the bar, looked around him with great composure. He is, contrary to the description given of him, a decent-looking rustic, about the middle age, and his features by no means accorded with his conduct.

Mr. Pooley, for the prosecution, addressed the Jury at some length, and stated the facts which would be proved in evidence. He commented with considerable force and ability on the horrible facts which would be adduced. They were of that nature that would make mankind blush for the frailty of human natere, and stamp to eternity the horrid act of the prisoner in the catalogue of the most abandoned and terrific offenders. He entreated the Jury to banish from their minds any vague idea that might be taken from report, and judge of the guilt of the prisoner by the evidence that would follow. Sarah Harris, servant of Mr. Boreham, said she had lived four years with him; Simmons, the prisoner, had lived there three years, and quitted it last Michaelmas: the prisoner wished to marry her, but her mistress disapproved of it: they had quarrelled before he quitted the service—on which occasion he beat her; and when he had done he said he did not care if he had killed her. He has often said he would make away with her, because she would not marry him. About half past eight in the evening of the 20th October, he came to the house—she was in the kitchen, and heard him coming along the yard; he was swearing violently. He came up to the window and struck at her through the lattice, and swore he would do for them all. She desired him not to make a noise as they had company: he said he did not care for the company, he would do for them all. Mrs. Hummerstone hearing the noise, opened the room door and came to the yard. She told him to go away. He gave her a blow on the head, which knocked off her bonnet; she ran into the house, and he immediately followed her. The witness immediately heard the shrieks of murder, but did not know from whom. All the family were in the room—the three young ladies, Mr. Borcham's daughter, Mrs. Warner, the married daughter, Mr. Boreham and his wife, and Mrs. Hummerstone. In a very short time the prisoner came to the wash-house to her; she shut the door, and cried out murder. The witness ran into the sitting room. She there saw some one lying under the window—she ran from thence down a passage—the prisoner followed her—she there met her master, with the poker in his hand—in running hastily, her master, who is a very old and feeble man, was knocked down. The prisoner caught her and threw her down, and drew a knife on her. He threw her across Mrs. Warner, who was lying dead, as she believed. He drew the knife across her throat, but she guarded it with her hand, which was cut. He made a second blow, when she wrested the knife out of his hand. He immediately ran away, and she saw no more of him. Thomas Copperwheat went in search of the murderer. He discovered Simmons concealed under some straw in a crib in the farm-yard; he had on him a smock-frock very bloody; the place where he was found, was about 100 yards from the house. Benjamin Rook, the Coroner, said, when the evidence of Harris was read to the prisoner, he said it was very true, he had murdered them, and no one else. He added, that he did not intend to have murdered Mrs. Hummerstone, but he went with an intention of murdering Mrs. Bosham, Mrs. Warner, and Harris, the maid servant. The Constable who carried him to prison, deposed to the same effect. The prisoner also told him, that when he had got Betsy down, he heard something fluttering over his shoulders, which made him get up and run away. The prisoner being called upon to know if he had any thing to say, answered, in a careless tone—No! Mr. Justice Heath told the Jury the case was so very clear that it must be unnecessary for him to address any observations to them; the prisoner, as they heard, had more than once voluntarily confessed his guilt. The Jury found him Guilty; and the Learned Judge immediately pronounced the sentence of the law—that he should be Hanged on Monday next, and his body anatomised. The prisoner heard the sentence of death with great indifference, and walked very coolly from the bar. The young girl whom he attempted to murder, was in great agitation, and was obliged to be supported while she was in Court.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

At a late hour on Friday night, three Gottenburgh Mails arrived. Their contents are not uninteresting.

It appears that the report which had reached us of a Declaration of War having been actually issued by Russia against Sweden, was not well founded. That event had not taken place, though it continued, and no doubt on good ground, to be expected. This delay is, in all probability, owing merely to the dilatory councils of Russia, and the difficulty which she always finds in putting her armies in motion. We may, perhaps, draw this consolatory conclusion from the circumstance, that no great degree of activity and rigour is likely to be displayed by a Power which takes the field so coolly. This, no doubt, strengthens the prospect of our obtaining for Sweden, at no distant period, pretty favourable terms of Peace.

The movements of BONAPARTE, however, display his usual promptitude and rapidity. We learn from the Foreign Papers, that a French army of 40,000 men was on its march, in two divisions, through Holstein, and BERNADOTTE had arrived at Copenhagen, to make the requisite arrangements. It is still farther stated, by some passengers, who have arrived by the same conveyance as the Mails, that the whole of this body of men had actually crossed the Little Belt to Funen. If this be true, the expectation which is mentioned in an article from Gottenburgh, that the French army would pass from Jutland to Norway, must have been unfounded. It is, indeed, very improbable.

It is stated, that the Russian troops in Italy, which were under orders to return home, have received commands from BONAPARTE to remain. This, which may have been occasioned by some very frivolous cause, has given occasion to many serious conjectures among the London Editors. Some of them imagine the Russians are retained in order to effect the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire; others think that they are retained for the subjugation of the British possessions in India. There are some additional intimations respecting Turkey and India, which may serve to amuse the credulous; but the considerate man will not rashly give his belief to the idea that any serious attack is at present meditated, either upon Turkey or India. The Princes of the Rhenish Confederacy have received orders to furnish their contingents, in order to replace the French troops which are intended for Dalmatia. This, in fact, is the reason, when the movements among the troops, to place them in their position for the summer, are made.

The Danes are said to have given great offence to Russia and Prussia, by injuries done to the trade and navigation of these Powers in the Baltic. We are not displeased that they have other ground of complaint on this subject beside England. The Danish offences, however, are probably the unauthorized outrages of individuals, pursuing the trade of plunder and piracy with too much ardour, and Denmark will promise amendment and reparation.

Along with the Gottenburgh Mails, dispatches for Government arrived on Friday by the Beaufoy, Capt. NORRIS. They are understood to contain the ratification of the Treaty between this Country and Sweden. We are extremely anxious for the time when this Treaty shall be laid before Parliament, that we may understand the terms upon which we are to be involved in the Swedish contest.

The preparations for the Expedition to the Baltic and Sweden are stated to be in great forwardness. Two hundred transports have droped down from Deptford to the Lower Hope, the place of rendezvous, and one hundred and fifty more, intended for cavalry, stores, &c. will be ready on Monday. The embarkation will take place with all possible dispatch; the troops are said to be already in motion. A fleet, we trust, will be in the Baltic before the arrival of the Expedition. Whether we are able to prevent the passage of a French army into Sweden or not, we are at least able to throw great difficulties in the way, and let nothing of this sort be omitted which it is possible to effect. We see, however, by intelligence already arrived, that BONAPARTE means to let no time unnecessarily escape before he make the experiment; and if we long delay, a French army will be in Sweden while our ships and troops are still in England. We understand that the Dutch Fleet in the Texel are all ready for sailing, and have lately indicated an intention to come out. Their presence at Copenhagen would be of the utmost importance. This intelligence was yesterday brought to Yarmouth by a sloop from off the Texel.

Government are at last convinced that the Rochefort Squadron have entered the Mediterranean. They have received intelligence that it passed the Gut of Gibraltar on the 26th of January, in a gale of wind and thick atmosphere. The following letters were yesterday exhibited at Lloyds:

"Gibraltar, Feb. 10.

"It is reported the Rochefort Squadron has passed into the Streights, but it was not seen from this place."

"Gibraltar, Feb. 11.

"Yesterday Sir R. Strachan passed to the Eastward, with several sail of the line, in chace of the French fleet, but he is a long way behind."

We are enabled to add the following circumstantial intelligence communicated by a correspondent at Gibraltar.

"Gibraltar, Feb. 10.

"Sir Richard Strachan's Squadron, of seven sail of the line and one frigate, passed this yesterday afternoon, in pursuit of the Rochefort Squadron, which were last seen off Carthagena.

"That part of the expedition which arrived here some time ago, is now getting under weigh, to proceed to Sicily; they amount to between three and four thousand men.

"By the last accounts from Lord Collingwood, he had gone up the Adriatic, in pursuit of a Russian Squadron of five sail of the line: so that there was no force off Toulon to oppose the junction of all the enemy's squadrons now in the Mediterranean. We are extremely apprehensive for the fate of Sicily, as the natives will immediately join any enemy whatever that lands there, with an intention of overturning their present despotic government.

"A large French army is expected in this neighbourhood in the spring. Nearly 100,000 French have already entered Spain, and 60,000 more are upon the frontiers of that country."

The following letter contains some very particular intelligence, which may be depended upon, respecting the French forces which have lately entered Spain:—

"St. Sebastian, Jan. 11.

"Return of the French Troops which have entered or are to enter Spain, through Irun, from the 19th of October, 1807, to the 18th of January, 1808:—

Armies.	Generals.	Men.	Horses.
First	JUNOT	29,879	3,653
Second	DUPONT	23,927	3,121
Third	MONCEY	17,983	3,330
	Total	71,789	10,104

"Marshal Moncey's army is to be 30,000 men strong, with the Reserve under General Mouton at St. Jean Pie de Port.

"The Emperor is daily expected at Bayonne, where Guards of Honour have been formed, composed of forty young men on horseback, 100 on foot, with showy uniforms, and fifty Basques in their national dress. Neither the object of the French army, nor the day of the Emperor's arrival are known; but we shall shortly hear something positive."

We see by this letter that NAPOLEON is, at least, expected in the South of France. It has been asserted, and pretty generally believed in London, that he intends a journey to Spain. This supposition has revived the idea of an immediate change in the Spanish Government. But for this, if it be really intended, the presence of NAPOLEON is not wanted. It would produce a scene from which he would consult both his interest and dignity by being absent. If a mighty attack is intended on Gibraltar, he may wish to be at no great distance from the scene of operations, that intelligence and directions may pass between him and the army with more expedition. But there is no likelihood that he will repair in person to conduct an object of second-rate importance, more especially an object, in respect to which there is so great a probability of his being baffled.

HIS MAJESTY rode out yesterday in Windsor Park accompanied by the Princesses AUGUSTA, SOPHIA, and AMELIA.

The QUEEN and the Princesses ELIZABETH and MARY, spent the morning in Frogmore Plantations.

The SWEDISH AMBASSADOR had a long interview yesterday with Mr. CANNING, after which a Messenger was sent off to Windsor.

The Duke of YORK also gave audience to several Military Officers, relative to the troops destined for embarkation for the North.

SOCIETY OF ANCIENT BRITONS.——Last Tuesday, being the Anniversary Festival of St. David, Sir Robert Salusbury, Bart. M. P. President, the Vice-Presidents and Stewards of the above Society, breakfasted at their house, in Gray's-inn-road, and proceeded from thence to St. James's-church, Piccadilly, where prayers were read in the ancient British language, by the Rev. Mr. Davies, in the absence of the Rev. Thomas Alban, their Chaplain, occasioned by a death in his family, and a most excellent sermon in English by the Right Rev. the Lord Bishop of Chester; from thence they proceeded to St. James's, Carleton House, and to the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand, to dinner, where they were joined by a most numerous concourse of the Nobility and Gentry, benefactors to that useful Institution, the Welsh Charity School.

From the statement of our forces officially made in the House of Commons, it appears that, exclusive of Volunteers, and of our troops in India, the military force of this country exceeds at present 300,000 effective men; a greater number, by nearly 40,000, than at any former period. Our navy, of course, is also very strongly manned; and the aggregate of both establishments is nearly half a million.

Monday General De Lancey's regiment, the 17th Light Dragoons, and whose emblem on the helmet is "Death or Glory" embarked at Portsmouth for India. They are divided between the Indiamen, each of which has 140 dismounted dragoons. The embarkation was superintended by General Porter, a deputation of the Court of Directors from Leadenhall-street, being present. Lieut.-Colonel Cotton commands this regiment.

The Earldom of Craufurd and Lindsay, with a rental of 42,000*l.* per annum, has devolved on Serjeant Lindsay, of the Royal Perthshire Militia, at present stationed at Dover. It is said, when this unexpected news was conveyed to Lady Craufurd, she was found toiling over a washing-tub; and in her precipitancy to assume the situation, which this sudden transition of fortune had placed her in, she threw it down, exclaiming, "It is now high time to leave off washing!!!"—The Earl and his Lady soon prepared to leave Dover, and passed through Canterbury a short time since, in a chaise and four, to take possession of the estates, &c.

GENERAL WHITELOCKE'S TRIAL has occupied the last week, and been throughout numerously attended, as the examination of the latter Witnesses (including the Naval Officers on the Expedition), has excited much interest. His Royal Highness the Duke of Cumberland was a constant attendant, and paid particular attention to the proceedings. On Friday, at the adjournment, the President, in a most soldier-like manner, addressed the Court, stating that Saturday was the day appointed for the funeral of their late friend, Lord Lake; he expatiated on his military services, and expressed a wish that the Members of the Court should mark their respect for him by wearing military mourning.—The effect of this address on the gallant veteran, and on the surrounding spectators, was highly impressive. Yesterday, on the opening of the Court, the President read a letter from the Judge Advocate, stating, that he was unable to attend, on account of a severe illness; in consequence of this the Court adjourned until Monday.

A system of outrage, very new in its arrangement, has lately been adopted in Ireland; A Wife Lottery is formed by a Club, now exceeding 200 persons, who, for a certain Subscription, are entitled to draw lots for a number of rich farmers' daughters; and to whomsoever the prize is drawn it matters not, but the party are bound to support the fortunate winner, and a body, sufficient to accomplish the purpose, is instantly ready to put him in possession of his prey. In effectuating a purpose so perfectly savage, no barbarity is too gross, if the unfortunate woman have strength of person, and resolution of mind, to struggle against long continued violence. This practise has now arisen to such a height, that many of the more opulent farmers are providing husbands for their daughters at the age of 11 and 12 years, in order to secure them from violation.

ELOPEMENTS.—On Tuesday evening a young Lady, in the Borough, High-street, of much respectability, and possessed of an ample fortune, eloped with a Naval Officer, who a few days ago arrived from Plymouth, on a visit to a near connection of the fugitive.

A dashing spinster of forty-five, eloped from the house of her father, a retired soap-boiler, in Tottenham Court-road, on Tuesday night, from the window of a first floor, with a recruiting serjeant, belonging to a regiment of light dragoons. The Lady possesses a fortune of 600*l.* per annum, and she was originally the playmate of her paramour, whose father was a shoe-maker in that road. No tidings have as yet been heard of the fugitives.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

THE COURT.

Wednesday HIS MAJESTY arrived at the Queen's Palace, and held a private Levee. The following had the honour of being presented to HIS MAJESTY:

Lieutenant-General Tarleton, upon his being appointed Governor of Berwick; Lord Selsey, upon coming to his title; Colonel Herbert, on his being appointed Lord Lieutenant of the county of Norfolk; Earl Mount Edgecombe, upon his being appointed Captain of the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners.

HIS MAJESTY held a Privy Council, to which Colonel Herbert was introduced, and sworn into his office of Lord Lieutenant of Norfolk.

HIS MAJESTY gave audiences to the Cabinet Ministers, and afterwards set off on his return to Windsor.

We are happy to have it in our power to contradict the report mentioned in several of the papers, that HIS MAJESTY'S sight is again so much affected as to render an operation necessary. So far from this rumour being true, the KING'S sight continues rather to mend than otherwise.

HYDE PARK.

The flattering appearance of the weather promises us this day a brilliant display of Fashion, and of Equipage, in the Park; the keen wintry wind being more conducive to the glow of health, than the patent bloom of the various Fabricateurs. des Cosmetiques, we may hope to meet our fair countrywomen under English Colours. Here will be lessons for the Moralist, the Philosopher, and the Man of Ton; the first may see how fast some are driving to destruction; the next may ruminate on Death and Pleasure, which put all upon a level, from the Dutchess revolving in the Ring in her gay Chariot, to the sprightly Sempstress or Milliner, dashes along in the Motley Crowd, anxious to see, and ambitious to be seen;—whilst the last may observe how many buttons of his waistcoat he may venture to open, without infringing on the regulations of the fashionable Barometer; and may, perhaps, be able to ask her flying Ladyship, "How she liked the last Opera?"—This will naturally bring on a half-debate on the Harmony, which prevails in the Musical World, on the contested claim of the Concert Singer, and on the shocking hardship of an un-musical Chancellor, or a Jury of Goths and Vandals, being admitted to decide on the merits of those, whose Notes are considered as equivalent to so much Sterling English Gold. Such are the promised Delights of the Day—"Mais nous verrons."

NEWSPAPERS.

A Newspaper is so true a mark of the caprice and levity of Englishmen, that it may be stiled their coat of arms. The Turkish Koran is not half so sacred to a rigid Mahometan—a parish dinner to an overseer—a turtle feast to an alderman—or an election to a freeholder, as a Gazette is to an English quid nunc. If this informs him of a naval armament, he toasts the Admirals in half pints a piece, wishes them success, gets drunk with loyalty, and goes with his head-full of seventy-fours, sixty-fours, frigates, transports, and fire-ships.—But a newspaper, whose contents are not sanctioned by authority, is necessarily so much the more the receptacle of invention;—thence we hear—it is said—a correspondent remarks—whereas, &c. all serve to please, surprise, and inform. We hear can alter a man's face, as the weather would a barometer. It is said can distort another like a fit of the spasm.—If can make some cry, while suppose makes others laugh; while a whereas is like an electrical shock, and though it often runs the extremity of the kingdom in unison with the rest, they altogether form a very agreeable mixture. But particular and domestic occurrences form a very essential part of this folio.—Thus a marriage hurts an old maid, mortifies a young one, while it consoles many a poor dejected husband, who is secretly pleased to find another fallen into his case. A death, if a wife, makes husbands envy the widower, while, perhaps, some of the women who censure his want of decent sorrow, marry him a month after!—In fine, every person is put in motion by a Newspaper. It is a bill of fare, containing all the luxuries, as well as necessaries of life.—Politics, for instance, are the roast beef of the times—essays the plumb pudding, and poetry the fritters, confections, custards, and all the et cetera of the table, usually denominated trifles. Yet the four winds are not liable to more mutability than the vehicles of these entertainments;—for instance, on Monday, it is whispered—On Tuesday it is rumoured—on Wednesday, it is conjectured—on Thursday, it is probable—on Friday it is positively asserted—and, on Saturday, it is premature. But notwithstanding this, some how or other all are eventually pleased; for, as the affections of all are divided among wit, anecdote, poetry, prices of stocks, the arrival of ships, &c.—A Newspaper is a repository where every one has his hobby-horse; without it, coffee-houses, &c. would be depopulated, and the country 'squire, the curate, the exciseman, and the barber, and many others, would lose those golden opportunities of appearing so very wise as they often do.

CITY.

A Common Hall was held on Tuesday at Guildhall, for the election of Bridge-Master for the remainder of the year, in the room of Mr. Joseph Wells, lately deceased. At the close of the poll on Friday the numbers were, for Mr. Yeoward 2259—Mr. Thodey, 1875—Majority 384.—Mr. Thodey has declined the contest, but the poll books will continue open till Tuesday next.

The Lord Mayor held a Court of Aldermen, on Tuesday, at which the price of bread was ordered to be raised half an assize or a penny in the peck loaf, to take place to-morrow, when the quartern loaf, wheaten, will be sold for 11*d.* halfpenny; and household 10*d.*—The Lord Bishop of Salisbury, and the Rev —— Andrews, were requested to preach the Spital Sermons at Christ Church, Newgate-street, on Monday and Tuesday in Easter Week.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Tuesday the dispatches for Madras and China by the following ships, were closed at the East India House, and delivered to their respective Pursers, viz.

Ceres, Captain W. Dunsford; Canton, Captain I. C. Lochner; Dorsetshire, Captain R. H. Brown; Alnwick Castle, Captain C. E. Prescott; David Scott; Captain J. Lock jun. and Exeter, Captain H. Meriton for Madras and China.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the under-mentioned Commanders took leave, previous to departing for their respective destinations, viz. Captain Kymer, of the Lord Castlereagh, and Captain Campbell of the Lord Keith, for St. Helena and Bengal; Captain Herbert of the Euphrates, for Madras and Bengal; and Captain Franklin, the Northumberland, for Madeira, Madras, and Bengal.

The following extra ships were taken up, and their stations viz. the Ladas, Captain George Welldon; Travers, Captain Collins; and Earl Spencer, Captain George Fleming, for Madras and Bengal; Lord Eldon, Captain J. W. Young; and Carmarthen, Captain James Ross, for Bombay.

Captain Wellden was sworn into the command of the ship Indus, consigned to Madras and Bengal.

The Court adjourned at six o'clock.

Friday a Court of Directors was held, when Captain Thomas Price, of the ship Alexander, took leave of the Court, previous to departing for Madeira and Bombay.—The Court adjourned at six o'clock till Wednesday next.

Letters received at the East India House yesterday morning, from St. Helena, dated 3d January, state, that the extra ships Glory, Northampton, Ann, Sarah, Christiana, Diana, Sir William Pulteney, and Union, outward-bound, arrived at Table Bay, the 7th of December last, under convoy of his Majesty's ship Monmouth.

The Adventurer Whaler, Captain Parker, arrived at St. Helena the 27th December.—No Indiamen at St. Helena.

THE THEATRES.

THE OPERA.

At this emporium of fashion, and of frivolity, the present week, has produced a new comic opera, whose title (under present circumstances), has given rise to some arch allusions; we are, however, unwillingly obliged to postpone it, until the next week, through want of room.

DRURY LANE.

For another long week "poor Old Drury" has presented us with nothing but "Kais, or Love in a Desert;" until at last, as poor Kais stood the chance of being left alone in the Desert, the Managers thought it expedient to try their "Chances," by the representation of the comedy of that name, under the alterations of the present day. There is no comedy which has undergone so many alterations perhaps as this one: Buckingham, Beaumont and Fletcher, Garrick, and latterly a modern literary prayer, have all, in their day, endeavoured to fit it to the taste of the times, but we are sorry to observe that it still contains the prurient puns, and quaint indelicacies, which disgraced the stage at the time it was originally written.

To be so often altered for representation, shews that this comedy possesses some magic charm, some perfection that must at all times give it a zest; and so indeed it does, for it actually has a plot, with rapid bustle, and striking situation, without either a warming pan or a china closet. The performance was throughout respectable, and Mrs. Jordan, was received with loud applause; she ought, however, to recollect that although Constantia is a hoyden, she is yet a simple one, and not quite so knowing as the Constantia of Tuesday night.

The comedy was followed by a new musical afterpiece, "In and out of Tune;" of this, the idea is originally taken from the novel of "Old Nick," in which the whole family of a London merchant (then retired in the country), are completely music mad, even to the degree of having the house bells hung in tune, and the servants speaking in recititative. The idea, therefore, is not original, but as it has never been dramatised before, we had reason to expect some entertainment from the pen of Mr. Lawler, the reputed author; if, however, we are to credit a report which was loudly bawled out in the House, that it has been overhauled by pirates, and is now imposed upon the public under neutral colours, we cannot but express our disapprobation of such proceedings, and feel fully warranted in saying that the most reprehensible parts of the piece must be those foisted in for the purpose of disguise. Some allusion to this circumstance has already been made, in a lately published novel, and we know that a gentleman in the pit, previous to the rising of the curtain, detailed to those around him, all the characters and incidents as they afterwards occurred!!! Much pains were taken to ensure its success by a numerous collection of friends; but this kind of applause is easily discovered, as it is in general loudest, where there is most occasion for censure. The performers did their best, but some of the characters seemed introduced merely for the purpose of singing their songs, talking broad Scotch, and manufacturing a few Irish bulls. There was one song of Johnstone's, abounding with indecent allusions, and which, was encored even from the boxes—perhaps, the double entendres in the comedy, had smoothed the way for their infringements on decency, which are but too frequent. As the piece was taken from "Old Nick," it had nearly been sent back to the same gentleman, but though it escaped this lot, it has convinced us of the error in the old proverb, which says that there cannot be two bites of a Cherry.

"Oh, shame! where is thy blush?"

COVENT GARDEN,

As usual in the sombre season of Lent, has recommenced her Sacred Oratorios with the first part of THE CREATION, and a miscellaneous selection; but the pressure of more urgent matter precludes our entering this week into musical criticism. During this week we have seen no other novelty, but have been highly pleased with the repetition of the new farce, in which the performers are now more at home, and do it every justice—It may appear invidious to particularise, but we cannot help noticing Liston in Caper, who not only acts, but also dresses the character extremely well; his affectation of grief, at opening the will, is highly characteristic, and the testy terror with which he listens to the "warbled complaints" of Miss Softly, it is impossible to excell. Fawcett, also, with a happy discrimination, gives a full display of his comic powers in extempore, without any caricature; this enables us to smile at the Poet, without destroying the interest which ought still to be felt, for the lover of the gay Widow Bellair.

THE DRAMATIC DETECTOR.

No. III.

What pert low dialogue has Farquhar writ?
How *Van wants grace, who never wanted wit;
The stage, how loosely does Astræa† tread,
Who fairly puts all characters to bed!

The Managers of Theatres are an order of men, who, from certain causes totally independant of their own desert, such as the extension of newspaper criticism, &c. have been for some time attracting more and more of the public attention. But by people in general, the word Manager is not fully understood. It has two meanings; and denotes, in its first sense, the Manager properly so called, who is employed by the Proprietors, at a certain salary, as a sort of steward, and who sometimes acts as Mr. Lewis lately did at Covent Garden, sometimes merely settles the stage business, as Mr. Younger did some years ago at Drury Lane. In its second, and more enlarged sense, it signifies a Proprietor of the Theatre; and the faults of this second class are perpetually imputed to the former, who have as little power of preventing or curing them as the least considerable actor in the theatre.

There are certainly faults, and those of a most flagrant description, which are committed in our theatres, and which demand the public reprobation; but we regret that the public reprobation is not directed to the real offenders: we are sorry to see Acting Managers perpetually stigmatized for what Proprietors have done. We shall always endeavour to distinguish carefully between the province of the Proprietor, and the province of the mere Manager: and we will now take a survey of the principal faults committed by the Proprietors. Those faults are of three descriptions, inasmuch as they are committed towards three different classes of persons, the authors, the actors, and the public. And though many of the faults committed towards the authors and the actors, affect also the remaining body of the public; yet as they most particularly operate upon those two sets of people, it is, perhaps, the easiest and clearest way to discuss separately the injustice done to each: and first of the public in the widest sense of that word.

The Proprietors of the London Theatres exhibit plays by patent from the Crown: and the Crown grants this patent for the benefit of the public. But is it exercised in the spirit with which it is granted? Are the Proprietors of these patents, merely, as they ought to be, receivers of an income due to them for public services? No: they are, too frequently, persons, who, for the purposes of private emolument, sacrifice all the great objects which they are deputed to promote, and disgrace the reputation of their country and their art, by the very power which is given them for extending and exalting it. Theatres are but courts of a petty description. Both alike are at first established for the sake of the multitude: both have their ministers, and both have their intrigues. In each alike the plunder of the public is the support of the public servants: in each are carried on all the important and useful sciences of ingratitude and falshood, oppression and rapacity. Both, in short, were contrived for the just advantage of the many; both end in the corrupt emolument of a few. Let no one conclude, that courts and theatres are national evils, for that would be to argue against good from its abuse; but let all who have any influence upon the minds of Englishmen, exert their utmost diligence in scouring from time to time the filth which gathers on the country's ornaments. When we now take up our brush, it is not to batter the beautiful cornice, but to sweep away the cobwebs that defile it.

The first and greatest offences are those which relate to public decency, either on the stage, or in the front of the house. The Proprietors sanction, in the old plays, the continuance of a thousand indecencies, which if they should now be produced, would bring down, upon the production in which they should appear, the merited execration of the whole body of the audience. John Bull, as the British public, is very familiarly called, however, he may want fine taste, certainly does not want honest feeling; and we regret that the obscenities of the old plays have continued so long to be tolerated by him. At a revival, the spectators have indeed sometimes expressed their disapprobation of indecency: and Dryden's coarse interpolations were almost fatal to the reproduction of The Tempest last year. But the plays which are performed every now and then, preserve their dirt with their merits, for the habit of seeing them, reconciles the people to their indelicacy; and intellectual like bodily prostitution, becomes familiar by repetition. But is it to be endured, that the Proprietors of a theatre shall force the disgusting images of vice upon the public eye till their nakedness is no longer observed, and corrupt those moral feelings which they are commissioned to guard? Ought not rather all those who have wives, daughters, or sisters, to rise up in the theatre, and by a general exclamation to sound their abhorrence of the vices that are obtruded, and their indignation against the Patentees who obtrude them? We should hail, with the greatest delight, the triumph of this right feeling; we acknowledge ourselves to be of that very small sect who consider it as a very ungentlemanly, and, to make use of a coarse but strong expression, a blackguard habit, to hiss in a theatre; but there are some attacks which render all arms lawful. When indecency of morals is to be repelled, no nicety of manners can be important; and if some independent man, capable of feeling for female delicacy, would set the example of executing the odious custom, who could refuse to support him,

> That had a heart to love, and in that heart
> Courage to make his love known?

In our next number we shall speak of some indecencies that are tolerated by the Proprietors in the front of the house.

LORD SOMERVILLE'S SPRING SHOW OF CATTLE.

On Monday commenced the Exhibition of Cattle by Breeders, candidates for prizes so nobly offered by Lord Somerville, as the means of promoting national improvement. It was certainly the best meeting we ever witnessed.

The Exhibition was renewed on Tuesday, and at five o'clock, a numerous Company had the honour by invitation to dine with Lord Somerville, at the Free Mason's Tavern: among the company were the Duke of Clarence, Duke of Bedford, the Marquisses of Tweedale and Huntley, the Earls of Winchelsea and Egremont, Lord Harewood, &c. &c. &c. After dinner the adjudication of the prizes by the Rev. Henry Bate Dudley, Thomas Barker, Richard Maddox, William Watson and John Bannister, were read, viz.

To the Duke of Bedford, for his Devon Oxen, the first prize.

To Mr. Martin Webber, for his pair of Devon Oxen, the second prize.

To the Duke of Bedford for the best pair of five Southdown ewe hogs—The Prize.

The Earl of Bridgewater, for the best pen of five Southdown Wethers—The Prize.

To Mr. Dodd for his Suffolk pig—who received a Cup from the hands of his Lordship.

Mr. Edward Platt, shewed the Carcase of an enormously fat three-shear Leicester wether; and Mr. Wm. Boultbie, a 7 Months Leicester pig, fed on oatmeal, whose live weight was 21st. 3lb. A too share plough was shewn, which had been used and found admirably to succed in stiff clay soil on Lord Somervilles' new farm in Cobham; Mr. Lester shewed his revolving potatoe washer, and one of his large chaff-cutters.

Mr. John Jones, destributed particulars of the three threshing mills which he has erected in different parts of the kingdom.

Messrs. Budge and Parsons shewed various agricultural seeds.

Messrs. Marshall and Wall exhibited some further specimens of manufactured yards from the wool of Lord Somerville and Mr. Tolet.

Mr. Whitworth shewed specimens of mash line made of long coarse wool, a branch of manufacture likely to lessen the drug of course wool, and the scarcity of hemp at the same time.

The Judges recommended Mr. Terret to his Lordship's notice for his additional premium, for his oxen, fed on grass, hay, and turnips, and regularly worked, and his Lordsship accordingly delivered him a cup.

The Judges complimented the owner of the ewe-hogs. Earl Bridgewater, in particular, on their improved condition in frame and wool.

Mr. Robson's pen of ewe-hogs were stated to have come more than four hundred miles from the Cheviot-hills, to be exhibited.

The Judges' report respecting the shepherds was as follows, viz. That Charles Payne, shepherd to Mr. Ellman, having raised 799 lambs from 608 ewes, and lost only 21, was entitled to the first prize of 6l. That Cornelius Gallop, shepherd to Mr. Vallance, having raised 410 lambs from 309 ewes, was entitled to the second prize of 4l.

His Lordship, after stating that Messrs. Smith and Harrington had of late fed many fine oxen with distillery wash instead of giving the same to pigs, he presented Mr. Harrington with a cup for his valuable experiment, and endeavoured to enforce the propriety of using molasses or treacle dissolved in water, as an addition to hay, and as a substitute for oil cake in the feeding of oxen, which would benefit our Colonies, at the same time that it would introduce a new and most nutritious food for cattle, of which he intended himself to make trial, and shew the oxen so fed at his show next year, of which the printed proposals were distributed to the company, as were also the Duke of Bedford's for his sheep-shearing in June next.

The spring wheat-seed delivered out last year by his Lordship, to Earl Winchelsea and others, was stated to have produced 12 fold of good grain, though it certainly was not a proper spring wheat

LAW REPORTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY, MARCH 5.

OPERA DISPUTE.

The Lord Chancellor gave his promised judgment in this case, which was as follows:—His Lordship observed, that he had gone over the proceedings on the principal points, and he had minutely weighed the arguments, of course, he thought, his present judgment would be decisive. There were two main points on which he had been called on to interfere; one of which was, to appoint a Manager in the room of Mr. Taylor; and the other, to nominate a person to receive the rents and profits of the Theatre, and make the necessary disbursements. In the appointment of a Manager the Court could not interfere, the deed of 1809 being altogether so contradictory in its provisions, that a Manager of his Lordship's appointment could not interfere, by the virtue of the deed, and consequently, it would lead to the immediate shutting up of the Theatre. With respect to the second point, that of nominating a receiver of the rents and profits of the Theatre, his Lordship oberved, that if the parties could point out to him how a person so appointed could, with safety to himself, undertake to receive and make disbursements of the monies which necessarily would fall to his lot, he would willingly hear them; but it were impossible that any person could interfere whilst the deed of 1803 existed; and therefore his Lordship observed, that he could not hear any more of the business.

COURT OF KINGS BENCH, MARCH 4.

CRIM. CON.

GREGSON v. THEAKER.

The Attorney General opened the case, which was an action for Criminal Conversation with the wife of the Plaintiff, an Attorney of eminence, residing in Angel-court, Throckmorton-street, committed by the Defendant, who was coachman to the Plaintiff. The Learned Counsel did not expatiate at much length upon the nature of the offence; but dwelt chiefly upon the situation in which the Defendant was placed as servant to the Plaintiff, to whom he owed every duty of respect, and whose domestic peace he should have been the last to invade. Mrs. G. had been married to the Plaintiff for many years, and he had lived with her in habits of extreme affection, which was interrupted only by the discovery of her infidelity in the last autumn. They had had one child which died, but Mr. Gregson's confidence in his wife was unbounded. The witnesses proved the marriage, and the fact of adultery was proved clearly by two witnesses.

A. Mrs. Meade, who is a milkwoman at Layton, in Essex, where the Plaintiff has a country-house, saw the Defendant and Mrs. Gregson riding out with the carriage last summer. Mrs. Gregson was riding on the box with him. They were very familiar together, and he kissed her, and afterwards in taking her down from the coach box, he put his hand upon her leg and laid hold of her uncle.

Mrs. Dowler was the wife of a porter, who took care of one of the houses of Mr. Gregson, in Angel-court, where Mrs. G. slept when she came to town. In January 1807, a bed was put up for the witness to sleep there, in the garret; and on the 2d of January, the coachman (the defendant) and Mrs. G. went up stairs together, and came down in about a quarter of an hour. The bed had been made in the morning, and nobody had been in the house between that time and their going up together; upon examining it, she found the bed, although it had been smoothed down, had evidently been lain upon; at another time her mistress sent her up stairs to make Mrs. Gregson's mother's bed, saying that she would sleep in town. The coachman and Mrs. G. were down below, but when the witness got up stairs, she leaned over the bannisters, and heard them come up stairs and go into the dining-room in the dark; there was a sofa in the room, and she listened and heard no conversation, but could distinctly hear the parties breathe hard. After this had ceased, which was in a short time, she returned up stairs to the room immediately over, but came down again upon hearing a ringing at the bell, and met the coachman and Mrs. G. running out of the room, and observed that the clothes of the latter were disordered. In October last, knowing that Mrs. G. and the coachman were in the dining-room, and the shutters were shut and the candles lighted, she and her husband went and listened, and heard a sort of romping, from which they both concluded that a criminal intercourse had taken place at that time. Upon her cross-examination by Mr. Topping, the Defendant's Counsel, she said she had seen a Gentleman, a near neighbour of her master, at Layton, who is a widower, and a most intimate friend of Mr. Gregson, who, as long ago as February 1807, had called at Angel-court, when Mrs. Gregson was alone. That moment he came in she pulled down the blind of the window near the fire, where she was sitting, and the Gentleman sat close by her. The witness quitted the room, but listened at the door, and heard a noise of the moving of the chairs, and from what she overheard, she had no doubt of a criminal intercourse taking place at that time. She then only thought it an odd circumstance, but now she thought it must have been a criminal intercourse. When the witness was asked as to her mistress's infidelity with Gentlemen of her master's acquaintance? she said she could not say Gentlemen, but she did recollect one in particular.

Mr. Topping, for the Defendant, said it was impossible the Plaintiff could demand damages for the loss of the affection of his wife, for it was clear she must have solicited the Defendant, and had been common to others. The slightest damages, if any, were all that he could be entitled to.

Lord Ellenborough, in summing up the case, commented with great force upon the conduct of the unknown friend of Mr. Gregson, who was, perhaps, more to blame than the Defendant in seducing the affections of the wife of the Plaintiff. Affections indeed, such a woman could have none, her mind was possessed only by inordinate desires and unruly lusts, which made her lavish of her embraces to any one. The wantonness of the wife might therefore be some palliation for the offence of the servant, but it could not justify his continuance in defiling the bed of his master, and whatever guilt attached to the woman, the man who violated at once his fidelity to his master, and the honour of his mistress, must be visited with some punishment, though not equal to that which he ought to suffer, if he found her innocent and undefiled, instead of wanton and shameless, courting the gaze of the passengers as she rode on the coach-box, and kissing openly in the noon day. Were she not almost entirely the seducer, nothing short of the full damages should be given. The Jury instantly returned a verdict for the Plaintiff—Damages 200*l*.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

PLYMOUTH, MARCH 3.—Arrived the American ship Atlantic, Gover, laden with brandy and wine, from Charente, bound to Teneriffe, detained by the Growler gun-brig. By this vessel intelligence is received, that the embargo on American and Bremen vessels is taken off in all the French ports; but that a Bremen vessel, laden with wine, had sailed from Bourdeaux, and a few days afterwards returned thither, owing to contrary winds, when the master and crew were examined, and it came out, that the vessel had, while at sea, been boarded by an English privateer; the ship and cargo were therefore condemned.

PORTSMOUTH, MARCH 4.—Six of the gun-brigs here are ordered to take on board two long eighteen pounders each, and are to be employed in the Baltic. The fire-vessels and all the small craft are fitting for that station with the utmost dispatch, and a large fleet is expected to accompany them, under the command of Admiral Gambier, who is to hoist his flag on board the Victory, the late Lord Nelson's ship.

On Friday Government received dispatches from Lord Collingwood, by the Earl Spencer cutter. Lord Collingwood had proceeded for the Adriatic in pursuit of some Russian ships—a circumstance which left Toulon unguarded by any British force. Let us hope that we shall soon hear of a favourable result to these movements.

We are sorry to announce, on the authority of our Falmouth Correspondent, the capture of the Duke of Montrose packet, Captain Dynely, which had sailed from that port with Mails from Jamaica, by the French schooner La Confiance, of 7 guns and 90 men. The packet maintained an action three hours; during which Captain Dynely, Mr. Burn the Mate, and four seamen, were killed, and two wounded. She was carried into Guadaloupe.

One English man of war, of 74 guns, and two of 64, with several smaller vessels, are frozen in the ice at Gottenburgh.

On Friday, his Majesty's ship Lion dropped down to St. Helens, to convoy the East India fleet, which will sail with the first fair wind—it was then southerly and light.

ACCIDENTS.

A fire happened early on Saturday morning, in the Conservatory, at Cuffnells, in Hampshire, which entirely destroyed that part of the building, but no one was hurt, and the fire, by most extraordinary exertions of the neighbours of all descriptions, was fortunately got under, before the house, or any part of the furniture received the slightest injury, although the library opens into the conservatory.

FIRE AT BILLY HOUSE.—On Thursday morning a most dreadful fire broke out in the Manor House of Lilly, near Linton, the seat of John Sowerby, Esq. which entirely consumed the same, with the greater part of the furniture. Mr. Sowerby the younger, with Mr. Keane, a friend of his, had but just come down for a few days sporting, and had been sitting in the library by a wood fire, from whence they retired to bed about twelve, leaving only a few embers in the grate.—The fire was discovered by two men servants, who on opening the library door, the volume of fire and smoke burst out, and cut off the retreat of one, while the other escaped through the passage. The former in his terror and despair, by his cries, and by discharging a pistol he had taken with him, first alarmed the two Gentlemen who were fast asleep. Mr. Sowerby's room was fortunately just over the leads of the portico, upon which he let himself down, and was saved by the servant, who had escaped by means of a ladder, together with the other man servant. Mr. Keane, on rushing to his door, was almost suffocated by the flame and smoke rolling towards his chamber, and, as the stair-case was on fire, he had barely time to force open the window-shutter, and, without any alternative, to leap out: neither received any injury. Three maid servants, who had escaped from the attics on the parapet, were saved by ladders likewise; and as the family were luckily in town, there were no other persons in the house. As the house was old and dry, and all the rooms wainscoated, the rapidity of the flames was so great that the whole was consumed in less than three hours, and the Gentlemen, who slept on the first floor, had scarcely saved themselves before the floors of their chambers fell in.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

THE MILITARY PLANS OF MR. WINDHAM AND LORD CASTLEREAGH.

On a variety of accounts is this a subject of the highest importance. Our military establishment is one of the great drains of the resources of the country, one of the mighty gulphs into which the earnings of the people are thrown. The security of the nation depends upon it, in conjunction with our navy. As it has been managed lately it has proved the scourge of the population, while the utmost efforts of the Government, and the most prodigal expenditure have hardly sufficed to provide the army with its requisite numbers.

The constitution of our army engages the serious regret of all thinking men in the country, and excites the ridicule of the other nations of Europe. When personal bravery suffices for the accomplishment of any object, our superiority is not doubtful, as both officers and men unite in a nobler manner the virtues of enterprize and firmness, than those of any other nation in the world. But on occasions when these virtues are not sufficient, and unfortunately for us these are by far the most numerous occasions in War, we have deep reason to lament, that the enterprize and courage of our troops are most frequently of little avail.

We may all remember that the cry for a reform of the army was loud and vehement at the time when the late Ministers obtained the reins of Government. The experiments which had been made on the Militia, and the Army of Reserve Act, had exhausted the patience of the country, and Mr. Pitt's Parish Bill served to cover the military schemes of the Government with ridicule. The Administration which was formed under the auspices of Mr. Fox, and of Lord Grenville, took up the subject with alacrity, but we believe we shall be supported by the experience of all our Readers, when we say, that they disappointed the expectations, first of the thinking men of the nation, and next of the great proportion of the men of every description.

It ought to have been matter of much more astonishment than it really was, that whereas every part of the military system stood in the utmost need of reform, the only part which was included in what was pompously, and somewhat ludicrously stiled, the military plans of Mr. Windham, was the business of recruiting. A reform in the mode of recruiting was the sole alteration which he proposed to introduce into the corrupted system of our military establishment. This was the subject of so much debating which we had in both Houses of Parliament during the administration of him and his colleagues. This was the mighty scheme, which, according to the one party, was to produce so much good, and, according to the other party, was to produce so much evil; and by this trifling, ineffectual alteration, and the noise which was raised about it, was the credulous nation led away from the thought of the radical improvements which it appeared to demand; and the subject has henceforth been sunk in oblivion.

The change which Mr. Windham proposed to introduce, respected chiefly two particulars—First, he abolished entirely the ballot, and proposed to recruit solely by voluntary enlistment. Secondly, he adopted the plan of enlisting for a limited number of years, relinquishing the received mode of enlistment for life. The present Ministry have departed from his plan, in both these respects. They had hardly ascended into office, when they reverted to the ballot, as an instrument so entirely to their heart's desire, that they could not feel themselves comfortable without it. By a clause which has been just now introduced into the Mutiny Bill, they have resumed the plan of enlistment for life, only having reserved the option of enlistment for a limited period with an inferior bounty.

Laying aside, for a moment, all regard of the superiority or inferiority of the one of these modes to the other, there are a few reflections of a very important nature, which force themselves upon every considerate mind.

Upon such men as compose the mass of armies of all countries, frequent changes have the most pernicious effects. They unhinge and distract their minds. They destroy that idea of the fixed and unalterable obligation of military rules, on which military obedience rests. They destroy that magic of opinion, without which corporal punishment exasperates rather than reforms. In the course of two short years, not to speak of our Army of Reserve Act, of our Additional Force Act, and other ephemeral arrangements, our soldiers have seen the ballot in full operation, and all enlistment for life; after this, they saw the ballot abolished and enlistment for a term of years established; they next behold the ballot resumed, and enlistment for life chosen as the system of Government. When a change was once introduced, there was, from its very introduction, a most important political reason for adhering to it; and a wanton subversion could proceed from nothing but great weakness, or great knavery. A change, it is clear, might be so decidedly and so exorbitantly pernicious, that it ought to be got rid of at all events. But were it a doubtful point between the plan adopted, and any other, either old or new, in military affairs, at least, the existing institution should be preferred. Ignorant must they be of human nature on whom these views make not the deepest impression.

The character of Parliament is deeply involved in these transactions. Since the rupture of the Treaty of Amiens, Parliament has appeared to be seriously engaged in studying the amendment of our military system. The importance of the subject is unspeakable. What has been the result of the mature deliberations of our National Council for years, during the most momentous period of our history, on the improvement of our army? Under the Administrations of Mr. Addington and Mr. Pitt, they sanctioned, without a scruple, the old system of the ballot, and of enlistment for life; When the Administration of Mr. Fox and Lord Grenville proposed the abolition of the ot and enlistment for life, they voted that abolition: en Mr. Perceval's Administration proposed on the er hand, that they should vote this abolition to be ng, they voted it, on both points, to be wrong ac-lingly. On one of the most important subjects that r came before a Senate, Parliament has, in the course hree years, three times altered its vote at the will of e Administrations. It has come to decisions flatly tradictory, according as it was directed by the persons essively in power, at the moment when it was telling hat on its decision respecting these very points, de-led the salvation of the country, or, perhaps, of the lized world itself! Whatever theory we may form with rd to the cause of this levity and mutability, it will be ty difficult to frame a supposition that will create much idence in this mode of managing our affairs, at the ent trying and awful conjuncture.

hese considerations, momentous as they are, no doubt l in importance to the magnitude of the objects con-ing which such various and contradictory decisions e been unscrupulously passed. The ballot more deeply ts the population and prosperity of the country, than thing else, the taxation excepted, in our political lition. At the time when the late Administration abo-d it, the country seemed to feel a relief. This one appeared to atone for many of the breaches, and many he omissions of their duty of which they were shame-guilty. The misery and discontent which its renewed tion has produced will not soon be redeemed.

o species of burthen can be imposed upon a population e inconsistent with all the principles of justice, of cy, and of humanity, than the ballot. It is not a ne-ary, it is a gratuitous evil; for the men might be ob-ed by better expedients. It is a burthen which falls the most outrageous and disgraceful inequality. It is rthen which is not only calculated to produce the most uciating misery, but to undermine virtue, and to l immorality and vice in every corner of the land.

he principle of universal service, which by a ridiculous on, is made the foundation of the law, involves most gross injustice and inequality, and impolicy. ording to this principle, you would condemn to the tion of a private soldier, the man who is earning 1000*l.* ar, and the man who is earning 20*l.* Where would be equality of this proceeding? You would take, you say, personal service of the one, and the personal service e other. But the personal service of the one is worth hundred times the personal service of the other. The uality of the impost would, therefore, be shameful. would the calamity to the individual be the sole mis-f of this proceeding. The loss to the nation would be eakable. To devote the lives of the men, whose ta- and exertions were of the highest national utility, to unction of a common soldier, would be the most gross e that ever was conceived, of the most precious trea- of the community. No prodigality, no waste of any r part of the national resources, could at all equal in uctive consequences this fatal misapplication. So tho-hly viscious is the principle of personal service.

the rule of universal personal service the burthen of nequality would fall upon the classes above the lowest. class would be relieved unfairly at the expence of the er classes. Now this is a species of mis-management, hich history furnishes very few examples. The higher es hardly ever find it very difficult to prevent any e proportion of the public burthens from falling upon . An expedient accordingly is found in respect to the t, which entirely changes this feature of the case, and ws, as usual, the burthen of the inequality on the r side. The injustice, however, is not removed; it is according to our practice, the lower orders who are e the victims of it. Our rule is, to allow personal ser- to be commuted for a sum of money; and all the ils which this creates and leaves, are allowed to against the people.

the ballot, the people are divided into two classes; those who are able to pay the fine, and those who are not.

Those who are able to pay it are of all different degrees of income, from 20,000*l.* or perhaps 50,000*l.* a year to 50*l.* To levy the same pecuniary sums for any purpose of the State, upon all those individuals indiscriminately, is such a hideous violation of that sacred principle of Government which commands the burthens of the community to be borne by its members in exact proportion to their ability, that it shocks every principle of common sense and of humanity. To the man of 20,000*l.* or 10,000*l.* a year, the payment of 20*l.* fine for the ballot, is a matter of absolute indifference. It never occasions him a thought. It never abridges him a single gratification. Contemplate its operation in cases of a different description. On many a family it is the severest calamity. It plunges them into difficulties from which years suffice not to extricate them. How many does it throw into that species of despondency, which puts an end to virtue and exertion? and of an industrious and meritorious family, produces a band of idlers and drunkards! This is not an imaginary consequence. Examine the annals of your work-houses. Trace to their source the causes which fill them. You will find that the inauspicious ballot has much to answer for! It is the parent of misery and vice to a lamentable extent.

Another class of persons whom it affects is the class of those, who, being unable to pay the fine, are compelled to furnish their personal services. This very circumstance constitutes the most shocking and painful inequality. What possible comparison can exist between the payment of a sum of money by the man who can afford it, and the absolute slavery of the person of another, who is dragged from his home, from his friends, from his beloved occupations; and, by the fear of the lash, and of death, made to wander over the face of the earth, and condemned to a mode of life which he may abhor! A man may be so attached to the scenes in which he is engaged, and the friends by whom he is surrounded, that millions, if he had them, he would willingly resign, rather than be torn from the objects of his affection. How cruel the circumstance, when he observes his neighbour exempted, because he possesses 20*l.* and hims lf s acrificed because he wants it! Is any thing so likely to create in the poor that envy, that hatred, of the advantages of the rich, which lays the foundation of the worst convulsions in society; and which, if it ever becomes general in any community, is quickly attended by the most deplorable consequences? Even among the individuals on whom the hard necessity of personal service falls, the inequality is immense and flagitious. One man may be the support of an aged father and mother, and a family of helpless brothers and sisters; or he may himself be the father of a happy family, who are plunged into misery, and brought up as vagabonds by his absence. Another man, whose means of earning are small, whose local or personal attachments are feeble, may feel scarcely any reluctance, or sustain any injury by following the mandate of the ballot. To many a young man, and these are the most valuable of their kind, the stroke of the ballot would be the extinction of the fondest hopes, the premium of the highest utility. How often does it happen in this highly civilised, free, and opulent nation, that men from the very lowest situations in life, ascend to stations of the utmost dignity and importance, to their own great emolument, and that of their country. Had they, in the entrance of life, been dragged by the ballot into the ranks of the army, they would have lived and died as common soldiers. The experience of almost every man will supply him with examples; we may cite two of present notoriety—Mr. Alderman Shaw and Mr. George Rose, whose career the calamity of the ballot, in early life, would have probably rendered very different. Let us cite another instance of infinitely more dignity and importance. Sir Richard Arkwright was originally a poor mechanic. He invented those spinning machines, which have given the manufactures of his country such a decided advantage over those of the whole world. Had this man, in the morning of life, been struck by the blasting hand of power, and been made, by iron necessity, a common soldier, where is the chance that his incalculable value would not have been lost?

These are a few, and but a few of the miseries and mischiefs attending the ballot; our limits will barely permit us to present a scanty specimen. The comparison of enlistment for life, and enlistment for a limited period, we regard as a matter of much less, indeed, of trifling importance. It is absurd to say, that enlistment for a limited period does not afford as good and steady an army as enlistment for life; because we have the experience of France, and all the military nations on the continent. On the other hand, as enlistment for life is a voluntary thing, no hardship is imposed by it. The only good effect to be expected from enlistment for a limited period, is a facility in recruiting; but, in the present circumstances of this country, that, without other causes to be provided, will have little effect. It is good so far as it goes; but it goes so little a way, that we are not very angry at the contumacy of the Ministers, who, to spite their predecessors, have entrenched upon it.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XI.

THE MORNING PAPERS.

There is something in the state of our Newspaper press, which highly deserves the attention of the philosophical observer. The influence of Newspapers is by no means trifling. The ignorance, and the mental indolence of the greater part of mankind, render them passive materials in the hands of those who daily fashion them. And it unfortunately happens that many of the Newspaper fashioners have motives for shaping their readers deplorably wrong.

The Daily Morning Papers take the lead. The influence under which those papers are placed from party motives is notorious. There is scarcely one of them which is not ranged on one side or the other of the two parties which always divide the Parliament and the Kingdom; and which does not make it a fixed rule to panegyrise whatever the party to which it is attached may perform, whether its measures are favourable or adverse to the interests of the country; and which holds it not, on the other hand, an equally sacred duty, to condemn and abuse whatever is proposed or spoken by the opposite Party, be its nature or tendency what it may.

The effects of this uniform and strong bias are in the highest degree pernicious. It habituates the public to exaggerations and unfairness—to the selfish passions of party, and shuts out the clear and disinterested view of national good. But there is another species of influence to which the Morning Papers are subject, which escapes common observation, though its consequences are deep and important. The persons who can afford to purchase a daily paper, are, of course, persons in affluence. It is the study, therefore, of the Morning Papers to flatter the prejudices of this class. The effects and nature of this propensity eminently deserve some explanation.

The extraordinary competition amongst Newspapers, to which the passion for this country for that species of reading has given rise, has had an effect contrary to that which usually attends competition. It has not improved the commodity; it has greatly spoilt it. The object of the Newspaper-maker being to sell his commodity, all that he studies, is, what will bring him customers; what will induce a greater number of persons to buy his paper. Now it is found, by a very full experience, that our countrymen buy Newspapers, not on account of what makes them wiser and better, but on account of what pleases them; not on account of what corrects their mistakes, and removes their prejudices, but that which assures them they have no mistakes and no prejudices. It becomes the business, therefore, of the newswriter not to study truth; but that which his readers consider to be the truth. Whatever he understands to be their opinion, that he applauds, on that he descants, that he exerts all the powers of his ingenuity to set in a plausible light. This course he systematically pursues; and whatever may be the absurdity and prejudices of his readers, all his efforts tend to strengthen and confirm them.

The intellectual exercise, reading, is thus perverted to an end directly the reverse of that to which it naturally leads. It is a fixed, invariable nature, well ascertained, that every class of men are liable to a set of prejudices and mistakes, peculiar to themselves, and to their circumstances. The inhabitants of the country are subject to one class of prejudices, the inhabitants of the town are subject to another. It is even remarked, that particular professions have a tendency to engender particular prejudices. Thus lawyers are considered as subject to one set of misapprehensions, and clergymen, for example, to another. The poor, it is well known, have many prejudices peculiar to themselves, and the rich, it is equally well known, are subject to prejudices of a different description. Now the great antidote to these prejudices, among all descriptions of persons, is reading. This habituates their minds to general views which comprehend all classes of men. This engenders reflections which loosen the bands that tie them, as it were, into distinct and separate parcels. The competition of the newspapers, fatally, and lamentably, counteracts this happy energy.

The rich and the affluent, as we have already said, are the class whom it is the interest of the Morning Papers to please. Their prejudices and mistakes, therefore, are the objects of perpetual panegyric in these papers; and the influence of their misapprehensions is thus prodigiously extended. In public transactions, for example, the prejudices of the rich and affluent, all tend to the encouragement of aristocratical measures. Towards the rapid growth, accordingly, of aristocratical power, in this country, there cannot be a doubt, that our Daily Papers have largely and unfortunately contributed.

This unhappy effect of competition among Newspapers in deteriorating their quality, meets with a curious parallel and illustration in the case of dissenting preaching. It has been remarked, that the effect of the interested zeal of the teachers of religion, whose emoluments depend upon pleasing their hearers, is not to render the doctrine more rational and improving, quite the contrary; it is to render it absurd and useless. With the great proportion of such teachers, it is the main enquiry what opinions will be most palatable to those whom they address. They study their prejudices. These they flatter, by representing them as principles of the greatest certainty and importance. They blow up the fanatical and superstitious fires of their hearers; and pervert the salutary influence of preaching, as the Newspapers that of reading, to the confirmation rather than the removal of error, to the corruption rather than the improvement of the people. . . .

We had intended to present our Readers, in this Number, with a short character of the four principal Morning Papers; but the general reflections which we have here presented, appeared to us of great importance, and have precluded the execution of this design, which we must, therefore, postpone till another opportunity.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, GERMAN, HAMBURGH, &c. &c. DISH AND DANISH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, FEB. 11.—In virtue of a decree issued from the Palace of the Thuilleries, on the 7th inst. 60,000 conscripts will be taken from the 80.000 called into service by authority of the Senatus Consultum of the 21st of last January; the remaining 20,000 will form the reserve of 1809.

FEB. 16.—On the 12th inst. the Danish East India ship the Spitzburg, arrived at Paimbœuf. On the 20th of January it fell in with a French squadron of five ships of the line and some frigates, off the Cape de Verd Islands. We doubt not, that this is the squadron which sailed from Rochefort under the command of Rear-Admiral Allmand. It had previously been reported that the Rochefort squadron had arrived at Toulon.

FEB. 18.—The Journal of the Empire contains the following article from Madrid, of the 1st of February:—"Since the liberation of the Prince of Asturias, a commission has been named for the purpose of investigating the charges relative to the authors of the conspiracy entered into against his Majesty. This commission has now laid their report before the King; and in consequence of it the Duke of Infantado, and certain other Lords, have been banished for a certain number of years, and a Bishop has received orders to retire to a convent assigned to him.

MARCH 1.—It is certain that the Neapolitan troops have taken possession of Reggio on the Strait of Messina. The cannon taken there will serve to plant on the batteries along the coast, and for prosecuting the siege of the fortress of Scylla, which has already been strongly bombarded. This rock, which lies opposite to Charybdis, is the only point which the Sicilians and the English now possess in Italy. In the memorable earthquake of 1783, the half of this fortress, with 100 men, were thrown into the sea.

The Official Journal contains an article, dated Constantinople, Jan. 28, which states, that General Gardane, Ambassador from the Emperor Napoleon to Persia, arrived on the 3d of November, at Koi, the first town on the Persian territory. In the same place he met the Persian Ambassador, on his way to France, whose retinue consists of more than one hundred persons, and who carries with him elegant and curious presents of swords, to the value of several millions.

An Imperial Decree of the 17th of February, contains regulations to the following effect:—"An embargo shall be laid on all Algerine ships in the harbours of our Empire, and in those of our kingdom of Italy; all Algerine subjects shall be arrested, and secured in prison; all goods and merchandize belonging to the Dey of Algiers, or his subjects, which shall be found in our Empire, or in the kingdom of Italy, shall be sequestered. These measures shall continue to be taken as long as the Dey of Algiers retains our Genoese subjects as slaves in his prisons."

GERMANY.

VIENNA, FEB. 18.—The Archduke Ferdinand and General Bellegarde are to command the corps of 70,000 men, which is assembling on our frontiers on the side of Turkey. The Turks have laboured hard, during the whole of this winter, in improving their fortresses in Bosnia, Bulgaria, and Wallachia. In general, they are making preparations, as if they dreaded against summer an united attack from all the Powers of the Continent.

CASSEL, FEB. 16.—A Deputation of the Jews in the kingdom of Westphalia has assembled here, consisting partly of Rabbis, partly by Elders. On the 8th the Deputation were introduced by M. Israel Jacobson, Counsellor of Finances, to the Minister of State, M. Simeon, and afterwards to King Jerome, M. Jacobson addressed his Majesty in a short speech, and the following is part of the reply which was made:—

"I am satisfied with your speech. That article in the Constitution of my kingdom, which establishes the equality of all religions, is in perfect unison with the feelings of my heart. The law ought to interrupt no man in the exercise of his worship. Each subject is as much at liberty to observe the rules of his faith, as the King is to follow his religion. The duties of the Citizen are the only objects which the laws of the Government can regulate."

BANKS OF THE ELBE.—The French Authorities on the Weser, respect ships which arrive there under the Dutch flags with legal cargoes, and certificates of origin, but permit none to sail again, either loaded or unloaded. Any Dutch ships, therefore, that extend their voyage beyond the left Bank of the Aulde, cannot return. Ships sailing under the Kniphausen, Oldenburgh, Pappenburgh, Mecklenburgh, or Portuguese flags, are detained by the same authorities, and placed under sequestration. It is expected at Bremen, that in a short time French Custom House Officers will be placed at the gates and barriers of the town. All merchandize arriving by land must then be provided with certificates of origin, a formality which has not yet been required at any other place.

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, FEB. 13.—We have received certain intelligence from Finland of the Russians having advanced upon the Swedish territory; the war may therefore be regarded as begun. All the Swedish regiments have received orders to proceed, by forced marches, to the frontiers. The General in Chief, Count Von Klingsfor, left this on the 10th for Finland. The Swedes have marched nearly all their forces against the Russians, and have left scarce any troops in the provinces opposite to Denmark, probably because they expect the English to protect them against any attack on that side.

ITALY.

NAPLES, JAN. 26.—On the 11th inst. a division of gun-boats, manded by Lieut Pascoe de Cosa, convoying 38 transports, was atta ked at the anchorage of Oligastro, by two enemy's brigs, the action commenced at night fall, and lasted four hours; one of the enemy's ships was completely disabled, and the other considerably damaged; on our side, we lost the gun-boat No. 26, on board of which one sailor was killed and two wounded, but the Lieutenant had the courage to repel the English, and the ability to conduct the convoy under his protection safe to the port of Salerno.

FEB. 12.—In the night between the 26th and 27th of January, a company of 600 men, partly Englishmen and partly banditti, who were landed at Canatelle and Villa San Giovanni, attacked a post, which was defended only by a company of Voltigeurs of the 62d Regiment, and by 20 Chasseurs of the 9th Regiment. Capt. Livron, commander of this post, put the enemy to flight, and pursued them to the sea side. Part of the enemy endeavoured to reach their vessels by swimming, and the remainder have been taken prisoners. On the 30th, four gun-boats and two of the enemy's transports were attacked at Porticello by a company of Voltigeurs of the 1st Regiment, and few grenadiers of the 62d Regiment; these brave men, in spite of all the enemy's fire, leaped into the sea, and by this stratagem got on board of the ships, under a shower of grape shot, and have taken possession of them. Some English ships of war at Messina, excited by the report of their guns, immediately put to sea, to assist the gun-boats. One brig of 22 guns, approaching too near Porticello, was stranded; she has fallen into our hands, after bravely defending herself during two days, in which conflict the Captain was killed, and the Lieutenant wounded.

FEB. 18.—The siege of Scylla is prosecuted with all expedition. There is every reason to believe that the English and the banditti will, in a few days, be driven out of the last strong hold they possess in Calabria. It was the division of Regnier which took Reggio. A great quantity of heavy artillery was found in the fortress. Besides the 900 men who composed the garrison, we have made prisoners of 200 men, who were found on board the English brig which was stranded on the coast.—The Naval Captain Claston, and 67 other officers of rank, are among the prisoners. This expedition has already put into our hands 1200 prisoners, and 42 pieces of cannon. The Neapolitan troops exhibited proofs of their usual courage.

SPAIN.

VALENTIA, JAN. 24.—Together with the strict measures taken by France and her Allies against the communication with England, the needful precautions are taken to prevent ships, belonging to the Continental Powers, from falling into the hands of the British. The Intendant of the Army, Don Francisco Xavier de Asperos, has made the following communication to the Company of Merchants in this sea-port town:—

"Whereas his Highness the Prince Grand-Admiral, has informed me, that the Emperor of the French and King of Italy has resolved, that no Danish, Dutch, Spanish, or other ships of his allies, shall be permitted to sail from any French Port, that they may not run the risk of being captured by the English; now the King, animated by a similar precaution, has thought proper to resolve that the same measures shall be adopted in all Ports of his Kingdom, and that no French, Danish, Dutch, or other vessels, belonging to the countries of his allies, shall be permitted to sail, and this solely with a view, that they may not be exposed to capture by the English."

PORTUGAL.

LISBON, FEB. 6.—The Emperor Napoleon, our present Sovereign, has issued a decree relative to Portugal, from his Royal Palace at Milan, dated December 20. It is now, for the first time, made public, and the following are the articles of which it consists:—

NAPOLEON, EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH, KING OF ITALY, &c. &c.

We have decreed, and do decree as follows:

Art. I. There shall be levied in our kingdom of Portugal, a war contribution of 100 millions of franks, to be paid by all kinds of property and domains belonging to individuals.

II. The Commander of our army shall apportion the contribution on the respective provinces according to the means of each.

III. All the property belonging to the Queen of Portugal, and to the Prince Regent, and to all the Princes who have pensions, shall be sequestrated. All the property of the Grandees of the kingdom, who followed the Prince Regent in his flight, shall also be sequestrated, unless they return to Portugal before the 15th of January next.

In consequence of this Decree, General Junot has issued an important State Paper of great length, but of which the following is the substance:—

"The Kingdom of Portugal shall pay an extraordinary War Contribution of 40 millions of crusadoes. The two millions already paid since the entry of the French, shall be allowed upon the present contributions. Six millions of crusadoes shall be the proportion to be paid to the Merchants, Bankers, and Capitalists. In all the churches of the kingdom, the gold and silver plate necessary for the performance of Divine Service shall be let remain; the surplus shall be carried to the mint, and shall go in diminution of the present contribution. All the Convents and Holy Brotherhood, the Prelates, Archbishops, and Bishops of the kingdom, who are possessed of property, the Commanders of the three Military Orders, and that of Malta; finally, all proprietors of houses and lands shall be rated to the war contribution, in proportion to the extent of their property."

STATE PAPERS.

PORTUGAL.

THE GOVERNOR OF PARIS, FIRST AID-DE-CAMP OF HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR AND KING, GENERAL IN CHIEF, &c. &c.

INHABITANTS OF PORTUGAL,

Your interests have engaged the attention of his Majesty the Emperor and King, our master; all irresolution ought to disappear; the destinies of Portugal are brightening, and her future happiness is secured, because Napoleon the Great has taken her under his omnipotent protection.

The Prince of Brazil, by leaving Portugal, renounced all his rights and Sovereignty, over this Kingdom. The House of Braganza has ceased to reign in Portugal; the Emperor Napoleon wills, that this fine country shall be governed entirely in his name, by the General in Chief of his army.

The task which this mark of the benevolence and confidence of my master imposes on me, is of difficult execution, but I hope to perform it in a proper manner, supported as I am by the labour of the most intelligent men of this kingdom, and the kind disposition of its inhabitants.

I have formed a Council of Government to enlighten me with regard to the good which I must do, and perennial Administrations shall be appointed, in order to point out to me the means of improving the Administration, and establishing order and economy in the management of the public wealth. I shall order roads to be made, and canals formed, to facilitate communication, and to cause agriculture and national industry to flourish. Two branches indispensably required for the prosperity of a country, which it will be easy to restore to a people, enlightened, persevering, and intrepid. The Portuguese troops, commanded by the most deserving of their Chiefs, will soon form but one family with the soldiers of Marengo, Austerlitz, Jena, and Friedland; and no rivalry will exist between them, but that of valour and discipline. The public revenue, well managed, will secure to every person employed in its administration, the reward of his labours; and public instruction, that only source of the civilization of nations, shall be diffused through the different provinces, and Algarve and Upper Beira will also produce their Camoens. The religion of your forefathers, the same which we all profess, shall be protected by the same hand which restored it to the vast French empire, free from the superstition which disgraced it; justice shall be equally administered, freed from all delays and arbitrary proceedings which degrade it.

Public tranquillity shall no more be disturbed by daring highway robbers, the offspring of idleness; and should any incorrigible miscreants be found, an active police shall rid the country of them. No hideous beggars shall henceforth offend the eyes of the industrious inhabitants of this superb capital, nor of the interior of the country; workhouses shall be erected for that purpose, where the maimed poor shall find an asylum, and the idle be employed in labour necessary for his own maintenance and preservation.

Inhabitants of the kingdom of Portugal, be peaceful and without fear; repel the instigations of those who wish to lead you to rebellion, and who do not care how much blood is shed provided it be the blood of the Continent; confide implicitly in our cautions for your welfare: you will reap all its fruits. Should it be necessary, in the first moment, to make some sacrifices, they will be solely required to place the Government in a proper condition to meliorate your fate. They are indispensably necessary for the sustenance of a large army, required for the execution of the vast projects of the Great Napoleon. His watchful eye is fixed on you, and your future happiness is certain. He will love you as much as his French subjects; endeavour to deserve his favour by a respectful conduct and submission to his will.

Given in the Palace, Head-quarters, in Lisbon, the 1st of Feb. 1808. JUNOT.

THE POPE'S PROTEST AGAINST THE DEMANDS OF BONAPARTE.

NOTICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE CARDINAL CASSONI.

"February 2, 1808.

"His Holiness Pius VII. being unable to conform to all the demands made on him by the French Government, and to the extent required of him, as it is contrary to his sacred duties, and the dictates of his conscience; and being thus compelled to submit to the disastrous consequences which have been threatened; and to the military occupation of his capital, in case he should not submit to such demands:

"Yielding, therefore, in all humility of heart, to the inscrutable determinations of the Most High, he places his cause in the hands of the Almighty; and being unwilling to fail in the essential obligations of gauranteeing the rights of his Sovereignty, he has commanded us to protest, and formally protests in his own name, as well as in that of his successors, against any occupation whatever of his dominions, being desirous that the rights of the Holy Chair should remain, now and henceforward, uninjured and untouched. As the Vicar on earth of that God of Peace who taught by his divine example humility and patience, he has no doubt, but his most beloved subjects, who have given him so many repeated proofs of obedience and attachment, will make it their peculiar study to preserve peace and tranquillity, private as well as public, which his Holiness exhorts, and expressly commands; and that, far from committing any excesses, they will rather respect the individuals of a nation, from whom, during his journey, and stay in Paris, he received so many flattering testimonies of devotion and regard."

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MARCH 7.

Mr. Irwin, from the Customs, presented an account of the number of ships that came into, or were brought into British ports, pursuant to the operation of the Orders in Council.—Ordered to lie on the table.

DANISH PRIZES.

Lord Sidmouth, alluding to the various captures that had been made on the Danish commerce previous to any declaration of war, of ships already in our ports, unsuspicious of any hostile design on our part, as well as ships brought in pursuant to the Orders in Council, wished to be informed by his Majesty's Government how the proceeds arising from these captures, which he was informed amounted to two millions, were to be applied; and how Ministers intended to conduct themselves towards the owners of those ships, whose cargoes were the property of persons who were at the time in habits of friendly and commercial intercourse with this country? He was further anxious to be informed by his Majesty's Ministers, whether it was their intention to treat the crews of those ships as prisoners of war?

Lord Hawkesbury said, that the cargoes and owners of the Danish ships were to be treated in the same manner as those of other nations placed in similar circumstances. With respect to the crews they were considered as prisoners of war. A cartel had been proposed by his Majesty's Government, which, however, had not been acceded to.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Lord Lauderdale moved for a Copy of any Communications which had taken place with his Majesty's Allies, relative to the Orders in Council.

Lord Hawkesbury stated, that communications had been made, under the most favourable auspices, for giving complete effect to the Orders in Council, but that the proposed arrangements were not sufficiently matured to be as yet laid before Parliament.

After some remarks from Lords Auckland, Howick, and Lauderdale, the motion was withdrawn.

Lord Lauderdale moved for a Copy of the Answer of the British Minister in America, to the Note of Mr. Maddison of the 29th of March, 1807, respecting the Coasting Trade.

Lord Hawkesbury assured the Noble Lord, that no such document was in existence.

The question was then put on Lord Lauderdale's motion, and negatived without a division.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 8.

Lord Lake's Annuity Bill, and the Scotch Creditors Bill, were received from the Commons, and read a first time.

AMERICA.

Lord Grenville made a few observations on the importance of ascertaining how far the fact stood with regard to the period when the American Treaty, signed by the respective Ministers here, came into the hands of the President. The Noble Secretary of State had, on a former evening, inadvertently, he had no doubt, stated, that the Treaty had arrived prior to the rising of Congress. This was not correct; and he was confident the Noble Secretary had, upon enquiry, detected the inaccuracy of his former statement.

Lord Hawkesbury said, that the Treaty had certainly not reached the seat of the American Government until after the prorogation of Congress; but an official copy of it had been received by Mr. Erskine, immediately previous to that event, and had by him been communicated to the American Secretary of State, in order to its being laid before the President. The general expectation was, that the receipt of that Copy would have had the effect of inducing Mr. Jefferson to exercise the authority vested in him, of keeping the Senate sitting, or of fixing an early day for its re-assembling. The Senate, under a similar impression, immediately previous to the termination of the Session sent a Message to the President to know whether he had any communication to make to them, and his Answer was in the negative. In his conversation with individuals he stated as his reasons for not laying any information before the Senate at that time, that he disapproved of certain parts of the Treaty; and that he intended to renew the negociation with respect to these points, but particularly with regard to the question of impressment of seamen from American merchant vessels.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Lord Erskine condemned the Orders in Council, as a violation of the Constitution, by the assumption of a dispensing Power in the Crown; as an infraction of our municipal code, by authorising the detention and capture of foreign vessels, contrary to Magna Charta, and various statutes of Richard II. and Edward III.; and as a violation of public law, by depriving neutrals of the rights of innocent commerce, under the false pretence of their acquiescence in the French decree of the 21st of November 1806.

Lord Eldon contended, that the Orders in Council were strictly within the acknowledged Law of Nations. The statutes quoted by Lord Erskine were solely enacted, as appeared from their preambles, to prevent the Crown from establishing a monopoly of foreign commodities, by an arbitrary regulation of the ports where they should be disposed of. His Lordship concluded with moving the previous question.

Lord Grenville supported the original motion, and Lord Hawkesbury the previous question, which, after a short reply by Lord Erskine, was carried, on a division, by a majority of 121 to 64, proxies included.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 9.

Heard Counsel in the Appeal Rickan v. the Trustees of Steward.

Bland's Divorce Bill was read a first time.

The Sugar Bounty and Drawback Bill were received from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Scotch Distillery Bill was read a second time.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10.

The Scotch Creditors Bill, and Lord Lake's Annuity Bill, went through a Committee.

The annual account of the Imports and Exports was presented, and also a return to an Order of the House, for an account of Foreign Vessels arrived in the week ending the 27th of February.

Lord Stanhope gave notice of his intention to propose, in the course of the Session, some measure for ensuring to the public a correct report of the decisions in Courts of Justice.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Lord Lauderdale moved for a Copy of a Petition from Messrs. Bainbridge and Co. to the Privy Council, dated the 13th of January, relative to an American vessel which had arrived from Antwerp. This vessel had been denied admittance into the French port, in consequence of having touched at a port in this country. The fact was of importance, as it proved that considerably subsequent to the issuing of our Orders in Council, not only the British Decree, but that also published at Milan, had not been acted upon with regard to America; if they had the vessel alluded to would have been confiscated.

Lord Bathurst related a subsequent case, which fully proved the severity with which the French Decree had been put into execution, and declined giving his assent to the motion.

After some further conversations from Lord Lauderdale respecting a fresh Order in Council, issued Feb. 14, 1808, and its inconsistence with the former Orders, the Noble Lord concluded with moving for the production of it, which motion was, however, also negatived.

Lord Hawkesbury delivered a Message from his Majesty, relative to the Subsidiary Treaty with Sweden.

Lord Auckland said, from a paper just presented, he remarked with pleasure, that our Exports of British commodities for the last year amounted to about 40 millions. He was anxious to have a return, distinguishing the Exports of the three last months of that year, and similar returns for the same periods of three preceding years. He should also wish to have a return for the Port of London, to as late a date as it could be made out.—Lord Auckland's various motions were put and agreed to.

REVERSIONARY GRANTS BILL.

Lord Arden opposed the Bill, on the ground of its tending to trench upon the prerogative, and of its having come from the other House under circumstances which interfered with the freedom of debate in their Lordships' House.

Lord Redesdale argued against the Bill, conceiving it to be the commencement of a system of innovation, of which no man could see the consequences. He illustrated the danger of submitting to the other House, by a reference to the times of Charles I. and the commencement of the French Revolution.

Lord Hawkesbury briefly re-stated the considerations which he argued on a preceding evening for adopting the measure with some modification.

A division then took place, when the numbers, including proxies, were for Lord Arden's motion 84; against it 84. This parity of numbers had the effect, according to their Lordships' rule of proceeding in such cases, of negativing the motion; and on our re-admission their Lordships were in a Committee.

Lord Hawkesbury proposed to limit the duration of the Bill to the 1st of June, 1810.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.

Lord Lake's Annuity Bill, and the Scotch Creditors Bill, were read a third time and passed.

The American Commissioners' Bill, and the Marine Mutiny Bill, were received from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Sugar Bounty and Drawback Bills went through a Committee. In the course of proceeding Lord Suffolk took occasion to state his apprehensions of injurious consequences to our agricultural interests, and should, pursuant to an idea which seemed to be generally entertained, permission be given for using sugar in the distilleries.

Lord Lauderdale, with the view of being duly prepared for discussing the Bill for enforcing the Orders in Council, now speedily expected to come up from the other House, was anxious to be informed, whether or not French Colonial produce which had been landed in America, and become neutral property, could be freely conveyed to a port in Sweden?

Lord Bathurst stated, that under the Orders in Council, the enemy's Colonial produce could not be conveyed in neutral vessels to the ports of our allies.

Lord Lauderdale read over the series of resolutions which he meant to move on Monday, respecting the commercial policy of the Orders in Council; but finding that the Message respecting the Swedish subsidy would take precedence of all other business on that day, he gave notice that he should not bring on his motion until Wednesday.

Lord Moira moved the second reading of the Debtor and Creditor Bill. He entered into a detail of the grievances which the Debtor suffered at present when arrested in Mesnes process; and when taken in execution; and pointed out the advantage which would result both to Debtor and Creditor, from adopting the principle of a Cessio Bonorum, which had formed part of the Roman law from the time of Julius Cæsar, and which was adopted into the legal code of most of the modern European nations.

Lord Ellenborough opposed the Bill, alleging that the process of arrest in five cases out of six produced payment of the debt, without even the step of putting in bail being resorted to. He quoted various passages from Lord Hale's Works on the dangers of innovation.

Lord Holland supported the Bill, which, after a few words from Lord Moira, in reply to Lord Ellenborough, was rejected on a division, by Nine to Five.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MARCH 7.

The Speaker acquainted the House that he had received a Letter from Sir S. Achmuty, dated the 4th inst. conveying the grateful acknowledgements of that Officer, and of Brigadier-General Lumley, and the Officers under their respective commands, for the honour conferred on them by the Vote of Thanks of the House of the 16th of April last, on the subject of the attack on Monte Video.

Mr. Simeon brought up the Report of the Grampound Committee, which declared the Election for that Borough to be null and void. Writs were ordered for the election of two Burgesses.

Mr. Wilberforce brought up the Report of the Newcastle-under-Line Committee, which stated that the Sitting Members were duly elected, and that the Petition that had been presented against them was not frivolous or vexatious.

Mr. Parnell presented a Petition from the Freeholders in Queen's County in Ireland, praying for a Commutation of Tythes. He should move, that the Petition do lie on the table; giving notice, that if Ministers did not take it up betwixt that and an early day after the Easter Recess, he should then move, that the Petition be referred to a Committee.

Mr. Horner brought forward his promised motion, on the subject of the Fees paid by merchants for Licences to carry on the Foreign Trade. His object was to refer the amount of these Fees, and the propriety of their imposition, to the consideration of the Finance Committee. He concluded by moving, that the Papers presented on the 10th and 11th of February last, relating to the Fees paid on Licences granted for carrying on the Foreign Trade, be referred to the consideration of the Finance Committee.

Mr. Ross said, the Privy Council had been for several weeks busily employed in investigating the subject. He suggested to the Hon. Gentleman the propriety of withdrawing his motion for a day or two, until a Report, connected with the Fees on these Licences, from the Privy Council, should be laid upon the table.

After a short conversation Mr. Horner acquiesced.

On the Motion of Sir Francis Burdett, an Account was ordered to be laid before the House of the total sum issued under warrants from His Majesty, out of the Registry of the Court of Admiralty, or of the Droits of the Crown, from January 1792 to the latest period to which the same could be made out; and also of the Balances remaining in the Registry of the Court of Admiralty out of the said Droits.

Mr. Secretary Canning presented Copies of the Correspondence between Mr. Secretary Fox, and Mr. Secretary Windham, and the Earls of Rosslyn and St. Vincent, and Lieut.-General Simcoe, in August and September 1806. Ordered to be printed. —Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 8.

Lord Lake's Annuity Bill was read and passed.

A Bill was read a first time, rendering perpetual several Acts relating to the Exportation of Tobacco-pipe Clay to the British Colonies in the West Indies.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.

Sir C. Pole moved for leave to bring in a Bill for better regulating Greenwich Hospital, and the Royal Naval Asylum. He said that this Bill was founded on the last Report of the Board of Naval Enquiry, and he meant to propose that in future all the Officers employed in Greenwich Hospital should be those who had lost their limbs in the naval service, and were thereby rendered incapable of pursuing their profession. He intended a similar Bill for the regulation of the Officers in the Royal Naval Asylum in future. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill accordingly.

Mr. Ross objected to the introduction of this Bill, till such time as the regulations which were now preparing for it, by order of his Majesty, could be laid on the table, as those regulations would supersede the necessity of parliamentary interference. Independent of this objection it would be seen that the Commissioners could not, in justice to the Institution, appoint naval characters to the different offices of Surveyor and Auditor, both of these required professional men.

Mr. Whitbread supported the motion, being firmly convinced that a number of seafaring persons could be found fully qualified to fill the different offices in Greenwich Hospital and the Royal Naval Asylum.

Mr. Pastoner would advise his Hon. Friend to separate the object, and bring in two distinct Bills.

Sir C. Pole said he could never lose sight of a measure so beneficial to those who had been disabled in fighting the battles of their country, but in this case he would yield to the suggestion of his Hon. Friend.

The House divided—Ayes 52—Noes 78—Majority against the introduction of the Bill 26.

Sir C. Pole then moved for a copy of the last Charter granted to Greenwich Hospital, which was ordered to be laid before the House.

MUTINY BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the whole, on the Mutiny Bill.

Lord Castlereagh felt perfectly convinced of the necessity of doing away part of the clause respecting unlimited service. Military men were averse to the system introduced by the Right Hon. Gentleman (Mr. Windham). In the Colonies, where no less than 90,000 men were employed, the expence of sending soldiers backwards and forwards, according to the new system, was more than 450,000*l.* additional. The Noble Lord had no objection to limited service at home, but it was productive of a serious evil abroad. The measure was radically bad, and he trusted the House would see the propriety of expunging that part of the Bill.

Mr. Windham read his own military resolutions, and those of Lord Castlereagh at the end of the last Parliament. The resolutions of Mr. Windham proved, that in the first year after the plan was put in force, its first quarter's produce was 11,000 men, its second 13,000, its third 21,000, and its fourth 24,000. He then animadverted with considerable severity on the injustice and iniquity of the proposed innovation, which was levelled at the utter ruin of the military plans of the last Administration, which were to be overwhelmed at one stroke. The famous Additional Force Act had produced 12,000 men, but the desertions were one in five. He concluded a very long speech by declaring his decided negative to the clause.

Mr. Windham and Lord Castlereagh severally explained; when the House divided—Ayes 169—Noes 100.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 9.

Mr. Mellish brought up the Report of the East London Water Works Bill, which was agreed to, and the Bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Calcraft moved for a return of the effective strength of the Volunteers of Great Britain to the 5th of February last.

The Sugar Drawback Duties Bill, and the Sugar Bounty Bill, were read a third time and passed.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

The House, in a Committee of Supply, on the motion of Mr. Huskisson, voted the following sums:—

73,500 to pay off 5 per Cent. Annuities.

144,600 for the relief of French and other Emigrants. This sum exceeded the vote of last year made under this head, by 3,000*l.* The reason of the increase was, that the vote of 1806, for St. Domingo Emigrants, afforded a surplus which covered in some degree, the expence that was to be provided for anew this year.

7,548 For the Charges of the Alien Office.

4,696 To make good the Deficiencies of the Vote of last year, for defraying the Expence of Printing and Stationary for the House of Commons.

2,337 To make good the Deficiency of the Vote for French and other Emigrants in 1807.

12,000 For the Expence of the Public Office, in Bow-street.

The Report to be received to-morrow.

FUNDING OF EXCHEQUER BILLS.

Mr. Perceval rose to submit a proposition for funding 4,000,000*l.* of Exchequer Bills. It certainly would be a desirable thing to remove these Bills from the market; and it was meant that it should be done by a public subscription, without any regard to the dates of these Bills. He proposed and moved a Resolution, that these 4,000,000*l.* of Exchequer Bills be funded in the 4 and 5 per Cents. after a few words from Mr. N. Vansittart and Mr. Huskisson, it was agreed to, and the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

On the Motion of Lord Folkestone, the Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the Marquis of Wellesley was read.

OUDE PAPERS.

Lord Folkstone said, the charge he meant to submit against the Marquis Wellesley, was his cruel and harsh treatment of the Nabob of Oude, once a great, a powerful, and an independent Prince in India, but now shorn of his rank and freedom. When that Nabob ascended the musnud, (the throne)

a lac and one half of rupees, were due by the territory of Oude to the East India Company, and Lord Wellesley, on his setting out to India, conceived the plan of ruining this Potentate. At that time there was a Treaty in existence, which had been but recently entered into by the Nabob of Oude and the East India Company, which abrogated and did away all former Treaties, and clearly settled and defined the terms of the future relationship and intercourse of the contracting parties. That Treaty stipulated, that the Nabob should in future be deprived of all external political consequence, and yet that he should retain the entire management of his own affairs, and the usual authority vested in him over his dominions. The Company, by that Treaty, engaged to defend the Nabob's territory, and if a force for that purpose should be necessary beyond 13,000 men, the numbers beyond these were to be paid by the Nabob. Of this positive stipulation Lord Wellesley made a very improper use; he used it as a means of oppressing the Nabob, insisting, that imminent dangers impended over the Nabob's possessions, and urging the necessity for the introduction of British troops into Oude, in order to the protection of its Sovereign, the Nabob's own troops being very disorderly and mutinous, which induced the Nabob to wish a reduction of their numbers. The Nabob did so, and reduced all his battalions but those under the command of an officer named Almas. This the Marquis construed into a design against the Company, and was one of the causes of his immediately sending British troops into Oude. There was another charge against the Noble Marquis, which was, that of compelling the Nabob to cede the one half of his territory. Lord Folkstone then referred to the letters between Colonel Scott, the British Resident at Lucknow, the capital of Oude, and Lord Wellesley. Lord W. after this, in order to compel the Nabob to comply with his urgent demands, harassed him with a claim for an arrear due to the Company, from the time the British forces had formerly defended his territory. This sum was due at the time the Treaty was made, and in it was a clause securing its payment; therefore, Lord F. contended, that if Lord Wellesley meant to insist on payment of that arrear, he ought to have specifically intimated such a demand to the Nabob. Distressed beyond all bearing by these measures, the Nabob, at length, consented to cede one half of his territory to the Company, and to disband his troops. After commenting on the harshness of Lord Wellesley, Lord Folkstone concluded by moving the first of a string of Resolutions, censuring and condemning the conduct of the Marquis Wellesley in regard to the Nabob of Oude.

Mr. W. Keene supported the motion.

Sir J. Anstruther said, no man could have any well-founded complaint against the Noble Marquis on the score of injustice, and the native Chiefs of India, only, had to complain of the nature and principles of the British Government, which protected the lower order from tyranny and oppression. It was well known to the Directors, that the Civil and Military Government of Oude was in such a state, as to require an immediate reformation. The whole State was in confusion, and the Nabob without authority over his subjects. In that situation it became absolutely necessary for the Governor General to interfere. Surely, if he acted by the instructions of the Secret Committee, he could not now be impeached for obeying their orders. The Hon. Gentleman then entered into the history of the Noble Marquis's Indian policy, and concluded by moving the previous question, and submitting another motion to the following effect: viz. "That it appears to this House, that the conduct pursued by the Marquis of Wellesley in India was highly meritorious, and beneficial to the British interest, and the inhabitants in general."

Mr. H. Smith observed, that as the House was fatigued with the length of the debate, and with those of the preceding evenings, he should therefore move that this debate be adjourned.

The debate on the Oude Papers was adjourned till Tuesday next.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10.

MESSAGE FROM THE KING.

Mr. Canning brought down a Message from the King, stating that his Majesty had thought it proper to inform the House of Commons, that the King of Sweden having resisted all the threats of France, his dominions were now exposed to imminent danger and peril. That his Majesty had entered into a Treaty with the King of Sweden, of a subsidiary nature; and his Majesty relied upon his faithful Commons taking the measures necessary to enable his Majesty to fulfil his engagement.—Ordered to be referred to the consideration of the Committee of Supply.

The Reports of the Committees of Supply, and Ways and Means, of yesterday, were brought up. The former granted sums for various miscellaneous services, and the latter was for funding four millions of Exchequer Bills. The resolutions were agreed to, and a Bill was ordered to be brought in on the latter.

The American Commissioners' Bill, and the Royal Marine Mutiny Bill, were read a third time and passed.

AMERICAN MERCHANTS.

Mr. Alderman Combe presented a Petition from certain Merchants in the City of London, carrying on trade with the United States of America, against the late Orders in Council, praying to be heard by Counsel at the Bar, against the said Orders. The Hon. Member moved that the petition do lie on the table.

Sir W. Curtis stated, that he did not mean to object to the petition lying on the table, but the House ought to be put in possession of a few facts, that had given rise to the petition. For some days advertisements had appeared in the public Newspapers calling a Meeting of American Merchants on this day, at the London Tavern. He was not present at that Meeting, but he had heard that a discussion took place and an amendment was carried, that no petition should be presented. Three out of four parts of the Meeting were in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Alderman Shaw stated, that he had attended the Meeting, and the Majority against the petition was two to one.

Mr. Baring, the Chairman of the Meeting, defended the petition, and said, that if certain gentlemen, who had been present, had kept away, the result of the discussion would have been different from what it had been.

Mr. Perceval had no objection to the petition, and the House was highly obliged to Mr. Alderman Curtis for the information he had given.—The petition was ordered to lie on the table.

General Gascoigne presented a petition from certain Merchants in Liverpool against the Orders in Council, praying to be heard by Counsel at the Bar. The General moved, that the petitioners, by their Counsel, be heard at the Bar on Monday.

Lord Castlereagh said, there could be no objection to the passing of the Orders in Council Bill, as it contained a clause, allowing the House to alter and amend it in the present Session. Should that not be done, the petitioners could address his Majesty not to act upon the Orders in Council.

Mr. Ponsonby said, what would his Majesty think of them, if they were to pass that Bill, and in a few days address him not to carry the law, which that Bill embraced, into effect? Why not procrastinate the third reading till the evidence the petitioners had to offer came fairly before the House.—A division took place; for the motion 66, against it 99; majority 33.

Sir Wm. Scott and some other Members spoke to a point of order.

The principle of Adjournment having been thus rejected,

Sir Wm. Scott spoke on the legality of the Orders in Council as strictly consonant with the law of nations.

After Dr. Lawrence, Mr. Stephens and Mr. Ponsonby had spoken, Lord H. Petty proposed an adjournment of the debate until Friday.

Mr. Windam supported the motion for adjournment.

On a division there appeared, For the adjournment 71; Against it 145; majority 74.

After some further divisions and discussions, it was at length agreed that the debate should be adjourned until this day.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.

The Speaker went up to the House of Peers, and, upon his return, stated he had heard the Royal Assent, by Commission, given to the Ten Millions and a Half Exchequer Bills' Bill, to the Bill for better Regulating the Office of Treasurer of the Navy; and the Bill for abolishing the Office of Surveyor of the Petty Customs in the Port of London.

Mr. Johnson presented accounts from the London Dock Company, of the progress of the works, and also of the receipts and disbursements of the Company, from the 30th of November, 1806, to the 30th of November, 1807. Ordered to lie on the table.

The Mutiny Bill was reported, and the amendments were read and agreed to.

Lord Folkstone wished to inform the House, that an Hon. Baronet, Member for Westminster, meant to move a clause on the third reading of the Mutiny Bill, to prevent the dismissal of Officers from the Army without a trial by Court Martial. The Bill was ordered to be read a third time on Monday.

Sir T. Turton postponed, from the 21st of March, until the 18th of April, his motion on the Carnatic Question. It was his wish to allow a month to elapse between the discussion of the Oude Question, and that of the Carnatic.

On the motion of Mr. Huskisson, an Address was agreed to, entreating his Majesty to order to be laid before the House an Account of all Sums issued by his Majesty's directions, pursuant to the Resolutions of the House, not made good by Parliament.

Mr. Alderman Combe deferred, till Monday, his motion for fixing a day for the House taking into consideration the Petition of the Merchants of London, carrying on the American trade.

Mr. Dundas moved, that a Committee be appointed to take into consideration the present situation of the affairs of the East India Company; and to report their observations thereon from time to time to the House. The Committee to consist of 21 Members, five of whom to be a Quorum, with power to sit, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House, and to remove from place to place. The motion was agreed to.

Colonel Stanley presented a Petition from a number of Manufacturers in Manchester, praying to be heard by Counsel and evidence at the Bar, against the Orders in Council issued in November last. Ordered to be taken into consideration on Thursday next, and then to be heard by Counsel and evidence.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. Percival moved the Order of the Day for the House resuming the adjourned debate on the third reading of the Orders in Council Bill.

Mr. Rose defended the principle of the Bill, as a measure of the utmost importance to the mercantile interest of the country. Neutrals had no right to complain of the Orders in Council, for they became unavoidable, in consequence of Bonaparte's decree, declaring the British Isles in a state of blockade. He concluded with observing, that the present Administration had no hostile idea against America.

Mr. F. Morris said, the Orders in Council were contrary to the common law of the land, in direct violation to the 28th of Edward III. and contrary to the law of nations; since it was there laid down, that the consent of the neutral ought to be previously obtained, before his right could be infringed.

Mr. Grattan abstained from taking any share in the debate, in the hopes of hearing any thing in the shape of argument from the other side, in favour of a measure which forboded the ruin of British commerce. He was astonished at the mode in which this Bill was originally forced on the House; and he was equally surprised when the evidence which the Merchants of Liverpool and London had to offer against the Orders was rejected.

Mr. Canning, in a very eloquent speech, supported the principle of the Bill, which was an experiment rendered necessary by the unprecedented situation of the country.

The House divided for the third reading of the Bill.

Ayes, 168—Noes, 68—Majority 100. Adjourned.

TREATY WITH SWEDEN.

CONVENTION BETWEEN HIS MAJESTY AND THE KING OF SWEDEN,

Signed at Stockholm, on the 8th of February, 1808.

The consequences of the Treaty of Tilsit between Russia and France unfolding themselves more and more in such a manner as to threaten Sweden with a speedy Invasion, for the purpose of forcing her to accede to the French system; and his Swedish Majesty finding himself therefore under the necessity of bringing forward, to resist its effects, a greater force than he has at his ordinary disposal, his Britannic Majesty, animated with the constant desire of contributing to the defence and security of his Ally, and of supporting him by every means in a war undertaken for the mutual interests of both States, has determined to give to his Swedish Majesty an immediate aid in money, as being the most prompt and efficacious, to be paid from time to time at fixed periods: and their Majesties having judged it expedient, that a formal Convention with regard to their reciprocal intentions in this respect, should be concluded, they have, for this purpose, named and authorized their respective Plenipotentiaries; that is to say—In the name and on the part of his Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Edward Thornton, Esq. his Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to his Majesty the King of Sweden; and in the name and on the part of his Majesty the King of Sweden, the Baron d'Ehrenheim, President of his Chancery, and Commander of his Order of the Polar Star, who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, have agreed upon the following articles:

Article I. His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, engages that there shall be paid to his Majesty the King of Sweden, the sum of twelve hundred thousand pounds sterling, in equal instalments of 100,000*l.* sterling each per month, beginning with the month of January of the present year inclusively, and to continue successively in the course of each month, the first of which instalments shall be paid on the ratification of the present convention by his Swedish Majesty.

II. His Majesty the King of Sweden, engages on his part to employ the said sum in putting into motion and keeping on a respectable establishment, all his land forces, and such part as shall be necessary of his fleets, and particularly his flotilla, in order to oppose the most effectual resistance to the common enemies.

III. Their said Majesties moreover engage to conclude no peace or truce, or convention of neutrality with the enemy, but in concert and by mutual agreement.

IV. The present Convention shall be ratified by the two High Contracting Parties, and its ratifications shall be exchanged at London within the space of six weeks after the signature of the said Convention, or sooner if it can be done.

In faith whereof, we the undersigned Plenipotentiaries of their said Majesties, have signed the present Convention, and have caused the seal of our arms to be affixed thereto.

Done at Stockholm, the 8th of February, in the year of Redemption, 1808.

EDW. THORNTON, F. EHRENHEIM.

SEPARATE ARTICLE.

The two High Contracing Parties have agreed to concert, as soon as possible, the measures to be taken, and the auxiliary succours to be stipulated for, in the case of a war actually taking place between Sweden and the Powers her neighbours; and the stipulations which may thence result shall be considered as separate and additional Articles to this Convention, and shall have the same force as if they were word for word inserted therein.

In faith of which, we the undersigned Plenipotentiaries of their said Majesties, have signed the Separate Article, and have caused the seal of our arms to be affixed thereto.

Done at Stockholm, the 8th of February, in the year of Redemption, 1808.

HAYTI.—A PLOT DISCOVERED.

Port-au-Prince, Jan. 10, 1808.

We have had another affair here, which bears a strong resemblance to that projected formerly by Yayou, against the life of our President. On the 7th December, a General, named M'Glonar, who commanded at Jarmel, and who was confederated with Yayou, put himself at the head of his troops, for the avowed purpose of producing an insurrection against this place. The plot being discovered by Petion, he dispatched two of his officers (Bonnet and De Troy) to wait the arrival of the traitors. These officers permitted M'Glonar to enter the town, but remained in full possession of the forts. Whilst he was engaged in endeavouring to gain over the troops from their allegiance, De Troy rode in, and secured M'Glonar. Five pistol shots were discharged at De Troy without effect, and the rest of the party fled. M'Glonar was sent to prison, who, a few hours after his confinement, swallowed poison, with which he had previously supplied himself, and was found dead. Another of his companions, who was taken in his flight, blew out his brains before his pistol could be wrested from his hand.

PROVINCIALS.

CAMBRIDGE, MARCH 4.—The subjects for the dissertations for the Bishop of London's medals in Christ College, are this year proposed by his Lordship, and are as follow:—

For the English—Foolish and unlearned questions avoid, knowing that they do gender strifes, &c. &c.

METHOD OF DISCOVERING CANINE MADNESS.—When a person has been bitten by a dog, apprehended to be mad, it commonly happens that the dog is killed before any one is assured of his condition.—M. Pettitt, an eminent surgeon, of France, has discovered an expedient for putting an end to this uneasiness: He rubs the throat, teeth, and gums, of the dead dog with a piece of meat that has been dressed, (taking care that there has been no blood to stain it), and then offers it to a living dog; if he refuses it with crying and howling, the dead dog was certainly mad; but, if it is well-received, and eaten, there is nothing to fear.

On Wednesday morning last, one of the colliers at Govan Colliery, while boling a daugh composed of soft shale, in which were imbedded iron stone balls, found a live toad in a cavity in the under side of one of the balls, which the body of the toad completely filled. The ball lay immediately above an under stratum of coal, and fifty-six fathoms from the surface.

Last week, a cat in Greenock brought forth the most wonderful and perfect monster of her own species that is to be met with: It has one head, four ears, eight feet, and two tails; it is one body from the navel up, as if it were breast to breast, and from the navel back forms two distinct kittens; what is remarkable, the one is male, and the other female. It had suckled for some days, and, from all appearance, would have lived to maturity; but, most unfortunately for the admirers of natural curiosities, was deprived of its life from superstitious motives. It is now in the possession of Mr. William Gameron, surgeon there.

Thursday se'nnight a young lady from London, of the name of Capper, who had been on a visit at Birmingham, arrived at Worcester by the mail coach, at the usual hour, and, after taking some refreshment, proceeded towards Bristol. After having travelled several miles on the road to Tewkesbury, one of the horses became so restive and unmanageable, that the guard went from the dickey to the coach box, to assist in governing and pulling them up, in this effort the reigns broke; when the guard got down for the purpose of stopping their horses, who had now set off at full speed: in this attempt he was likewise unfortunate; and the leaders having extricated themselves from the carriage, the wheel-horses turned into Ripple-lane.—The coachman then jumped from the box, in the hope of being able to arrest their career; but failing in his purpose he was stunned and thrown down, and, upon recovering himself, melancholy to relate, he found the young lady (who, with a child of the coachman's, were the only passengers), lifeless near the same spot. It can only at present be conjectured that, alarmed at her danger, she must have been killed in attempting to throw herself from the coach. When the horses stoped, the child was found unhurt in the coach.

Execution.—Simmons, the murderer, was executed on Monday, pursuant to his sentence, at half past eleven o'clock in the forepoon, between Hereford and Ware. He behaved with that air of indifference which marked his conduct during his trial. He shook hands with three persons who accompanied him to the scaffold, and whispered a few words to the goaler before he was turned off.

ESSEX ASSIZES, MARCH 10.

Robert Mattison, John Hopkins, and George William Dundas, were indicted for the murder of John Ogleby, on the 7th of February last, at Danbury, in this county. The above three prisoners were the principal and seconds in a duel. They were all very young men and Officers in the 71st regiment of foot. It appeared, that the deceased had quarrelled with one of the prisoners, when he was in a state of intoxication, and had behaved with the greatest indignity. The consequence was, a challange, and the deceased was shot through the body.

After hearing the evidence, the Lord Chief Baron observed, that there was no proof of identity, and therefore the prisoners must be acquitted; and it was lucky for them the evidence did not reach, as if it did, one at least, if not all, would probably have suffered an ignominious death. The Jury found them—Not Guilty.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

It would appear that some relaxtion is introduced in the interdiction of intercourse between this country and Holland. We have had frequent communications with that country, through the neutrals, during the course of last week; but the circumstances have not been fully explained. We know not whether the commercial necessities of the Dutch have produced some mitigation in their favour of the decrees of exclusion; whether means of eluding them have been devised; or whether the occurrence is purely accidental, and is not likely to happen again.

We have by these communications obtained Dutch Journals down to so late a date as the 8th instant. We have, likewise, received Paris and Hamburgh Papers of a recent date. They present us with accounts of some transactions in Calabria, in which we are interested. Preparations, we are informed, are making for the attack of Fort Scylla, which is still in the possession of the English, and they boast of having obtained advantages over a detachment, partly from this Fort, and partly from the Sicilian coast. But we cannot learn distinctly what was the object which this detachment was intended to gain; and the Neapolitan statement appears involved in confusion and obscurity. It is also affirmed, that the Fortress of Reggio has been subdued; that the garrison, amounting to 900 men, have been made prisoners, as well as 200 men who were on board an English brig, stranded on the coast. The name of the Captain of this brig is stated to be Claston; but there is no such name in the List of Captains in the British Navy. However, the French editors make such havoc of English names, that this may be some real name, mangled in the spelling.

A considerable body of Austrian troops is directed to march towards the Turkish frontier. Those persons, however, are much deceived, who interpret this into an indication of the dovelopement of a concerted design between Austria, Russia, and France, for the immediate partition of the Ottoman empire. It may, with sufficient certainty, be interpreted into an indication of a jealousy on the part of Austria respecting the designs of Russia and France on the Turkish dominions, and a determination to make strong efforts for obtaining her share of the spoil, when the day of distribution arrives. It ought always to be held in remembrance by the Government of this Country, that few arrangements on the Continent can be of greater moment to us than that the share of Austria in the partition of Turkey should be large. This, with a radical improvement of her Government, might give her weight and influence to trim the balance between Russia and France, and afford the rest of Europe some degree of tranquillity from the designs of both.

Two Decrees of JUNOT have been received. In the one, it is denounced, in the usual style, that the House of Braganza has ceased to reign. In the other is declared, the plan of Government according to which Portugal is, for the present, to be administered. No King is spoken of. JUNOT, with the title of Governor in Chief, is to rule in the name of BONAPARTE, aided by a Council of Government, a Secretary of State, and other Officers. The provinces are each to have two local Magistrates, the one a Civil Magistrate, the other Military; the latter to have no function not purely military, excepting the charge of preserving tranquillity and order. We find, too, that pretty many contributions have been imposed upon the Portuguese. In return, BONAPARTE tells them that he will teach them to improve their agriculture and their industry.

The designs of France, in regard to Spain, continue still involved in considerable mystery. The garrison towns on the Spanish coast are, it seems, to be taken possession of by French troops. We have received intelligence, that 10,000 had marched into Barcelona, and that an equal number were on their march to Cadiz. A great force of French soldiers is now in Spain and Portugal; and whether the overthrow of the Spanish Government, the siege of Gibraltar, or both, is the object, is now the subject of conjecture. What particular turn the caprice or projects of BONAPARTE may give to those affairs, it is plainly impossible to determine.

A curious document has found its way into the English papers, which purports to be a Protest of the Pope against certain demands of Bonaparte. It is entirely unaccompanied, however, by any information respecting those demands; which lays some foundation for suspecting its authenticity. A report had, indeed reached us, that the Holy Father had resigned his authority, both spiritual and temporal, in favour of Cardinal FESCH. But this is not altogether concordant with the tenor of the Protest, which indicates not only the retention of the spiritual authority, but a strenuous opposition to any infringement of the temporal.

A copy of the Treaty which has been concluded between this country and Sweden, has been laid upon the table of both Houses of Parliament. It contains, properly speaking, but one deputation, which is, that great Britain shall pay to Sweden a subsidy of 1,200,000*l.* by monthly instalments. This, it is stated, is to enable Sweden to put her army in motion, and to keep it up. There is a separate article annexed; but this merely expresses the agreement of the two contracting parties to concert further measures of co-operation in the event of Sweden being attacked by her enemies.

We have inserted a statement of the officers and troops which, it is said, are to be employed in the Swedish expedition. The embarkation of the troops is not yet begun; but the bustle of preparation is great, and part of the expedition, it is expected, will soon be ready.

Sir John Stuart, the hero of Maida, will sail immediately, to take the command of all the British troops in the Mediterranean.

Among the Officers to be employed on the Swedish Expedition, are mentioned the names of Lords Rossyln, Moira, Hutchinson, and Paget; General Cotton, Major-General John Hope, Brigadiers Dyott, Houston, and Dorrien. Generals Lord Banbury, Finch, and Thornton, go with the Guards.

The force on this expedition will exceed that of the Danish, among which will be the following:—

Lord Catheart's Regiment of the Life Guards.	9th Foot.
The Horse Guards, Blue.	31st Do. (2d Battalion).
1st & 2d Dragoon Guards.	42d, or Royal Highlanders, (2d Battalion).
Scots Greys.	71st Highlanders.
14th, 15th, and 16th Light Dragoons.	73d Ditto.
A very large Force of Foot and Horse Artillery.	74th Ditto.
5th Foot	87th, or Irish Heroes, (2d Bat).
	92d, Gordon Highlanders, (2d Battalion).

We are sorry to hear that the Egyptian opthalmia prevails much at the Cape of Good Hope. It was brought to that settlement by the 1st Battalion of General Whitelocke's regiment, who had 300 men down with it when our accounts came away; however, by the excellent regulations of Brigadier-General Lord Blayney, and by the police established by Lord Caledon, the contagion was kept down in the settlement.

The story of the 1000 boats, which were said to have proceeded from the ports of Holland with troops on board, took its rise from the decree lately issued by King Louis, that no fishing-boat should put to sea without a soldier on board, to take care that no communication should be carried on with the British cruizers. One of these boats, with one soldier on board, was brought into Yarmouth a day or two ago.

The private letters received from Holland, continue to speak of the deplorable situation to which that country has been reduced by the tyrannous policy of Bonaparte, and of the enormous price of every description of colonial produce. The single article of coffee, for instance, which has a heavy sale in the English markets at 90s. per cwt. is now sold in Holland, and almost every other part of the dominions under the controul of France, at no less than 16*l.* sterling.

It is said to be in the contemplation of Government, with a view to render the Volunteer Force of the Empire as efficient as possible, to call out the entire of it in four divisions, during four months of the ensuing summer, each division of corps to be encamped in their respective counties for a month. For instance, a fourth part of the Volunteers of Middlesex to be placed on permanent duty, and be encamped during the month of May, another fourth in June, the third in July, and the remainder in August.—Government, in particular cases, to provide clothing, pay, and provisions.

A vessel arrived at Dover, on Sunday, from the Continent, the Master of which reports, that the various crews of the English smuggling boats, which were in the neighbourhood of Antwerp, have been sent to that city, in order to assist in fitting the ships of war at that place; and that their boats have been seized, and sent to Middleburgh.

ninth sloop of war, for desertion, the latter from his post as centinel; when every circumstance being heard, and duly investigated, the Court adjudged the seamen to receive 200 lashes each, and the marine 300, alongside such ships and at such time as the Commander in Chief may think proper.

The ringing of the bells throughout the metropolis yesterday excited universal curiosity, as no one could find in what it originated. On enquiry, we learn that it was an Irish Gentleman who got the Ten Thousand Pounds Prize in the Lottery on Tuesday, and who was dererminded, he said, to let his friends in Dublin hear of his good fortune.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

HIS MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

Wednesday His Majesty came to town, and held a Levee, which was attended by most of the Ministers, the Sardinian, Sicilian, Portuguese, Swedish, and American Ambassadors, and the following Noblemen and Gentlemen, who were presented:—

Count Ugglas; Barons D'Geer and Adelswert; Captain Vinger and Mr. Barnestam; and Chevalier de Souza Couttinho, by the Swedish Ambassador.—Count Reheuhausen, by the Portuguese Ambassador.—The Hon. John and George Ashburnham, by their father, Viscount St. Asaph.—Mr. James Bathurst, upon his return from Sweden.—Master William Henry Buckley, upon his being appointed a Page of Honour to the King, in the room of Master Stanhope, promoted to an Ensigney in the Guards.—Major-General Paget, by Lord Paget, upon his being appointed to the command of the 80th Regiment.—Major-Gen. Lord Forbes, upon his being appointed Second in Command of the Forces in the Mediterranean.—Captain Buller, of the Royal Navy, upon his return from the Mediterranean.—Major-Gen. Sir John Stuart, upon his being appointed Commander of the Forces in the Mediterranean.

The King held a Privy Council, at which the Earl of Mount Edgecumbe was introduced and sworn in Member, and took his seat accordingly.

His Majesty held a Council for receiving the Recorder of London's report of the convicts under sentence of death in Newgate, when we understand His Majesty was graciously pleased to respite them all during his Royal pleasure.

Her Majesty's Drawing-Room has been postponed to the 17th instant, on account of the Princess Amelia being, at present, ill of the measles.

CITY.

The Lord Mayor on Tuesday ordered the price of Bread to be continued the same as last week.

FINANCE OF THE YEAR.

Tuesday, in consequence of a special message, the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank, with a number of Bankers and others, had an interview with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in Downing-street, when he informed them that it was the intention of Government to propose to Parliament to fund 4,000,000*l.* of the outstanding Exchequer Bills, and that this should be done by public subscription, without regard to the dates of the Bills. It was necessary for him to state, that no loan would be wanted before the month of May, and that then no more than eight millions would be wanted for England. The Bank of Ireland wished to renew their charter, for which, of course, they would contribute a sum, and he thought the whole, or the greater part of the necessary sum—at any rate he could assure them, that one million would be the extent of the sum required to be raised in England for Ireland. He concluded by stating, that he wished to fund the 4,000,000*l.* of Exchequer Bills in the 4 and 5 per cent. stock, they would deliberate on the amount of such stock to be taken for 100*l.* of Exchequer. The Gentlemen retired, and on their return a question was asked, whether any alteration was to be made with respect to the Sinking Fund? It was answered, that no change whatever would be made in it. The Gentlemen then gave in the following proposals of terms, viz.

In lieu of every 100*l.* Exchequer Bills, to receive
5*l.* per cent. estimated at 97*l.* 10*s.*
80*l.* of 4 per cents. estimated at 80*l.* 15*s.* ex. div.
Or, 2d. For every 100*l.* Exchequer, to receive
39*l.* of 5 per cents. estimated at 37*l.* 10*s.*

Which would be a bonus of from 2½ to 2¾ per cent. It is understood that ten days will be allowed for the Holders of Exchequer Bills to write them in, specifying their dates and numbers, with a provision that if the sum written in should exceed four millions, each person will be ratably reduced.

AMERICAN MERCHANTS.

A Meeting of the Merchants, Manufacturers, and others, resident in the Metropolis, and interested in the Commerce between Great Britain and the United States of America, took place at the London Tavern, in Bishopsgate-street, for the purpose of considering of and concurring in a Petition against the late Orders in Council.

A discussion, on the propriety of the measure, immediately took place, in which Mr. Sansom, the Chairman of the American Committee, took a principal part. He was heard with that attention, to which his good sense and acknowledged patriotism and abilities always entitle him; and he concluded by moving, that all the words of the Petition be left out, and that the following be substituted, viz.

"That it is the opinion of this Meeting, that during the present known political discussions between the two countries, it is inexpedient and unnecessary to present any petition to the Legislature, upon the subject of the Orders in Council."

Upon this amendment many opinions were ably delivered.—In support of the Petition Mr. Sharpe, Mr. Glennie, Mr. Bentley, Mr. Murray, Mr. Baring, the Chairman, and several other Gentlemen distinguished themselves. And in favour of the amendment Mr. Ingles, Mr. Gordon (Member for Worcester), Mr. Marryat (Member for Horsham), Mr. William Lushington, Mr. Alderman Shawe, Mr. Mellish (Member for Middlesex), and several other Gentlemen, spoke with great effect. The arguments on both sides were, however, little more than a repetition of those so frequently used of late in both Houses of Parliament.

On the question being put, Mr. Sansom's amendment was carried by a majority of full two to one. The Petition consequently was lost.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT GARDEN.

On Thursday evening, Mr. Cooke, who, for some months, has been absent from London, made his first appearance for this season, as Sir Pertinax Macsycophant, in Macklin's comedy of The Man of the World. We shall not here enter into a detailed statement of the causes which may have occasioned his confinement in the country—suffice it to say, that the law, which proceeds upon regular principles, and is therefore very hostile to genius which almost always proceeds irregularly, has for a long time detained Mr. Cooke from his professional duties. He was received with the loudest and longest applause, and it was evident that rustication had spread no dull mould upon his mind. Among the very few perfect performances which are now to be found upon the stage, must unquestionably be ranked the Sir Pertinax of Mr. Cooke. All the fawning meanness which prejudice ascribes to the characters of the Scotch, and all the real talent which candour admires in their minds, all the insolence of the purse-proud parvenu, and all the policy of an accomplished courtier, were as admirably pourtrayed by Mr. Cooke on this as on any former occasion. After having said that this performance may be classed among the few perfect pieces of acting, we, of course, have it not in our power to diversify our criticism by pointing out any defects; and however the new system of writing may increase its profits by severity, we always feel ourselves most happy, when we can speak in terms of unqualified praise.

That happiness, however, will not attend us in discussing the merits of Mrs. Henry Johnston, who played Lady Rodolpha Lumbercourt. She was received with tumults of applause by the majority of the audience; and though some few murmurers ventured to swim against the stream of general favour, they were the

"—— Rari nantes in gurgite vasto."

Perhaps the people have no right to meddle in the private affairs of those who are employed only to amuse them in public; but we cannot approve of the conduct of the Proprietors in re-engaging Mrs. H. Johnston, because we think her exceedingly deficient both in the genius and the science of her profession.—The motive of these gentlemen can have been no other than a consideration of the attraction which was likely to be acquired for their theatre, by the unlucky reports of which Mrs. Johnston has been the subject. Now it may be very well worth the while of a milliner or a pastry-cook, to engage a girl who does not understand the rolling either of ribbands or of paste, if her beauty be likely to bring custom to the shop; but surely the Proprietors of a London theatre ought not to obtrude a bad actress on the public, merely because she happens to have a fortunate face and an unfortunate character.

Mrs. Henry Johnston does not act Lady Rodolpha at all like an Earl's daughter. She swings her arms, and sharpens her voice, in a style much more nearly approaching to the manner of a dairy-maid talking as she carries her pails, than to that of a well-bred woman. Now a lady who plays thus may be very like what some women of fashion are in real life; but will never be at all like what women of fashion ought to be upon the stage.

THE DRAMATIC DETECTOR.
No. IV.

"Est cum mimis, est cum meretricibus."—HORACE.

"A man goes to the play, and finds himself among women of the Town."

Having spoken in our last Number of the indecencies which the proprietors of theatres tolerate upon the stage, we shall now say a word or two of the indecencies which they tolerate in the front of the house.

These indecencies are now becoming every day more and more notorious and disgusting. All the refuse of this great town, the lowest of men, and the most abandoned of women, are admitted to the theatres to interrupt the performances, and annoy the eyes and ears of the respectable part of the audience. From the bottom to the top of the theatre, with the single exception of the lower circle of front and side boxes, drunken boys, half naked women, and the blustering bullies who attend them, riot in all the security of understood connivance. Formerly those females whom the play-bills of the opera house so demurely denoted by the phrase "a description more easily understood than expressed," even want to confine themselves to the upper tiers, which were called the green boxes: there they remained, distinguishing themselves from modest women in place, as they were already distinguished in character. Then vice, to have been seen, must have been sought—now it obtrudes itself alike on the attention of those who like, and on the view of those who abhor it.

The Proprietors, we are fully aware, would, according to their present system, be considerably injured in their profits by any additional purity in their manners. But we shall never be tired of reminding them, that the Patent, which they have received from the Crown, is but an emanation from the people, by whom all power is originally vested in the Crown itself, and for whose benefit alone the Crown has a right to exercise or to impart the power it has so received. Shall the Proprietors of a theatre then urge, in their defence, that they would lose so many sets of three shillings as would amount to a heavy deduction from their profits? Their profits, like those of all other public officers, ought to be no more than a reasonable compensation for their labour; except that they have a right to reap an additional emolument, arising from the capital employed, and forming the profits of their stock. But shall it be permitted to any man to make a profit by open debauchery, and unreservedly speculate in public vice? Are the servants of the people deserving of their hire, when they employ their influence for the people's injury, or are the holders of property, which is all only the creature of society, entitled to use that property for purposes by which society must suffer? Let us not, then, be told of the patent that the Proprietors hold from the Crown, or of the private capital which they have embarked upon that patent: they have duties to perform, both as public patentees and private merchants, and the people have a right to demand, that those duties shall be performed. If the Proprietors find, that without affording conveniences for every description of people, their theatres cannot be conducted with profit upon the present terms, let them boldly make a further advance, as they did a few years ago, to the price of admission, and pay themselves for the preservation of public morality by contribution from the public purse. But the fact is, that no such advance is at all necessary. A theatre, when properly conducted, is a most profitable concern; and if good authors and good actors were fairly encouraged there would seldom be a dearth of respectable spectators. Under the present system of government, at both houses, and more particularly at Covent-Garden, where authors have not fair play, it is quite out of the question to expect large audiences, without the encouragement of a thousand indecorums. But a fault behind the scenes is not to be urged as a plea for the continuance of a fault before the curtain.

The fact is, that the Proprietors of the London Theatres, that is to say, those who by the preponderance of their property in the theatre take the lead in all the councils of these concerns, are totally careless as to the mode in which they make their money. Some persons there are in the world, of not over-nice morality, who are determined to get money at any rate, but who would rather get it honestly than not. But the London Proprietors disdain even the "Recte si poteris," and without turning to right or left, pursue the "quocunque modo rem."—Hence it is, that the theatres have been converted into public brothels: where every boy from the country, who knows no houses of assignation that are more private, may repair with a certainty of gratifying his passions and ruining his constitution; where the vices of Britain are held up to the gaze of foreigners in close alliance with Britain's beauty: where four tiers of seats, independently of the pit and galleries, have not been considered sufficient for the reception of profligacy, without furnishing in addition a large lobby, which, at each theatre, bears the same analogy to the boxes, that an open market bears to a butcher's shop. It was not enough that there should be mire where hogs might wallow, but it was thought necessary to force this filth on every eye, and convert those abodes, which ought to have been the temples of public taste and morals, into styes of the lowest and most disgusting debauchery. So that now a thinking man, instead of repairing to these theatres, as the repositories of national taste and the mirrors of national virtue, visits them as an intellectual hospital, where he may dissect the sores of the mind, and analyse the corruptions of the heart.

In the course of last season, during a representation of Shakespeare's Coriolanus, a disturbance of more than ordinary grossness was occasioned by a woman of the town among the upper boxes; and when one of the audience, in a manly tone, remonstrated against the encouragement of these nuisances, Mr. Kemble stepped forward and promised to take some measures for the repression of every such grievance. But as no measures have yet been adopted to that effect, we can do no more than impartially record our regret, that in so many instances which nearly concern the public good, Mr. Kemble, whose share in the Theatre is comparatively small, continues to be restrained in his beneficial schemes by the evil advisers who surround Mr. Harris and his Son, the principal Proprietors of Covent-Garden Theatre. At Drury-lane, where so many people are Proprietors, or authorised Counsellors to the Property, it is impossible to say who has the power of redressing these ills; but some one or more persons certainly have such a power, and it is high time that this power should be exercised.

THE PROMENADES.

In the ever varying course of that old fellow Time, we have had the Iron—the Golden—the Brazen Ages, but this may be called the Anticipating Age. Some people endeavour to kill Time, some strive to do him up, by running against him, whilst others not only murder him, at the present moment, but even have a kind of post obit attack upon him by Anticipation.—Anticipation is, therefore, the Order of the Day; and we (as it is too old and unfashionable to attend to what happened last Sunday) can only, as a Morning Paper, anticipate what may happen, during the Morning rambles, this Evening on the Promenades.

Under such an auspicious Sun, as now flatters us with his good company, a Peripatetic Philosopher may vary his studies ad infinitum; should he direct his devious course to the Hampstead Road, he may there see the jolly three-pounder, in a smart trot up the Hill to the two o'clock Ordinary, and there too he might follow him, were it not perhaps more convenient to count the trees in the park; should the ring attract his attention, he will be surprised to see the fair dames inside their equipages, and no longer on the Dickey! A Lawyer might lament this change, the Philosopher will rejoice in it.

In his route from Hyde Park to St. James's, he may contemplate the various groupes hurrying to enjoyment—the spruce Sunday 'prentice, in boots and spurs, for a dash in the gardens, to talk of my horse;—Mrs. Fussock, and her fair fat family, who walk seven miles from Shadwell, for a little exercise, in the Park—with the whole train of blue satin indescribables, easier understood than expressed. In his ramble up Constitution-hill, the philosopher may see—yes, he may see a bailiff or a dun, those deadly foes to Anticipation;—in that case, his gay Sunday ramble must cease, and he must make way for those with lighter hearts, and heavier purses, who are now dashing on to the grand promenade.

LAW REPORTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY, LINCOLN'S INN HALL,

FRIDAY, MARCH 11.

OPERA HOUSE DISPUTES.

The motion, calling upon Messrs. Const, Lowton and Palmer, the Trustees of the Opera-House to take upon themselves the management of the Theatrical Fund, agreeably to the deed of 1792, and also calling upon the Chancellor to appoint Mr. Jewell the receiver of such funds in the first instance, so that the money may not in future pass through the hands of Mr. Taylor, was again put off, in order to give the Trustees time to consider the full extent of their liability, and the best way of reconciling the present ruinous disputes between the parties.—The case stands over till Monday.

ROLL'S COURT, CHANCERY-LANE,

MONDAY, MARCH 7.

BEFORE SIR W. GRANT, MASTER OF THE ROLLS.

VISCOUNT MAHON, v. HIS FATHER, EARL STANHOPE.

This was a Bill filed by Viscount Mahon against his father, Lord Stanhope, to prevent dilapidations and waste on those estates to which his Lordship was tenant in tail. It appeared, by a deed of settlement made on the marriage of the Noble Earl in 1774, with Lady Hester Pitt, and renewed on the Earl's second marriage in 1781, that the estates in Kent, Bucks, Devon, and Derby were to be enjoyed by his Lordship during life, without impeachment of waste, and that he was not empowered to sell or dispose of the same, without consent of trustees then named and appointed, their heirs, executors, &c.

Messrs. Richards, Romilly, and others, were heard for the Viscount, and Messrs. Martin and Scott for the noble defendant. The latter contended that no evidence could be produced to shew that the Noble Lords had acted improperly in the management of his estates; on the contrary, he had expended large sums of money on their improvement. Lord Stanhope was heard for two hours and a half in his own defence. His Lordship entered upon a very elaborate review of the suit moved against him by his Son. He began by saying that his life had been four times attempted, and once by poison. His Son, however, was too young to be a party in such conspiracy, but if he had not attacked his life he had his character. His Lordship said, that three years before his Son came of age, he required from him an allowance of 500*l.* a-year, and choosing to refuse that supply, his son left him and went abroad, and did not return till he came of age, when he filed the Bill in question; which he would insist was injurious, vexatious, and false, and he expected at the hands of the Court a remedy and redress for the calumnies promulgated by the allegations. In short, he trusted his Honour would put his seal of reprobation upon the suit, if not for himself, to save other fathers from the oppression of their sons. His Lordship combated the arguments of Counsel in support of the Bill, and insisted upon their being wholly irrelevant and inapplicable, and that so far from having deteriorated the estates, he had improved them, by spending 30,000*l.* of his own money. His Lordship dwelt for some hours upon the allegations in the Bill, and said if his son had acted right, he could have left him 20,000*l.* a-year by the estates, more than he will now have.—But by filing the present Bill he had not only lost his esteem, but the personal property he should leave, not a shilling of which he would now have. His Lordship concluded by saying, that it would remain for his Honour's judgment to prove, whether the Court of Chancery was what it constitutionally was intended to be, namely, a Court to distribute justice according to equitable rights; or whether it was to be perverted into an office for filing libels, and placing calumny against honourable characters upon record, and for giving facility to the circulation of those calumnies throughout the land.

His Honour stated, that he did not think Lord Stanhope had committed waste in cutting down the ornamental trees; but if the parties chose, the matter might be refered to the Master. The Court could not allow his Lordship to sell the Derbyshire estate, until it was convinced that it was in furtherance of the trust. The 21,900*l.* out on mortgage might be called in, and invested in real estates; but this also must be referred to the Master. As Mr. Dashwood is not in a situation to act as Trustee, Lord Stanhope had nominated Lords Thanet and Cowper; but the Court not being in the practice of appointing Trustees in the first instance, this must likewise be referred to the Master.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The arrival of a French squadron at Toulon is mentioned in letters from Genoa of the 15th. It is to have sailed again between the 6th and 10th of February, with the other ships ready for sea in Toulon. It is also rumoured that before the arrival of this squadron, a squadron sailed from thence on the 18th of January. This we disbelieve—and though, according to the accounts received by Government, there is no doubt of the Rochefort squadron having entered the Mediterranean, there is not the least reason to believe that any other French ship of the line has put out from any other port.

GREENOCK, MARCH 9.—The Herald, M'Kissock, arrived here last evening, from Kingston, Jamaica, 42 days passage; sailed in company with the Croydon, who had a packet for Falmouth, under convoy of the Sandwich ship of war; parted company with the Croydon two days after sailing. The Herald brings accounts of the arrival at Jamaica of the fleet of the 11th November, from Cork, among which were the Fame, Kenyon; Ann, Thompson; Mars, Campbell; Columbus, Reid; and Mary, Alexander, of this port: also, of the arrival of the fleet from Portsmouth of 15th November, under convoy of the Meleager. The packet may be hourly looked for.

POLICE.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.—A curious examination took place on Thursday, at this Office, which afforded high amusement to the bearers. A stage-struck hero, of the tribe of Israel, charged young Saunders, of the Amphitheatre, in Tottenham-street, Tottenham-court-road, with an assault on his person. It appeared by the evidence, that the complainant, a professional Gentleman at one of the Private Theatres, had, for a length of time, imbibed high notions of his dramatic talents, and obtained a recommendation from the Manager of a Private Corps, as being equal to either Kemble or Cooke in recitation and acting, and very little inferior to Laurent or Grimaldi, as a clown. With this versatility of talent, the hero solicited an engagement with Mr. Saunders, and after having given him a trial, his services were rejected. Intent on coming out, he renewed his solicitations to do any thing that might be required; and on Sunday Morning last, at a rehearsal, he was mounted on a fiery dragon, and drawn up to the cielling of the house, where he was kept suspended some time as St. George, to the amusement of the company. On being let down again, the defendant beckoned the hero to follow, and whilst passing over a trap door, he was plunged into the infernal regions, amongst ghosts and hobgoblins. The assault consisted in throwing some water over the complainant whilst on the dragon, and the defendant found bail.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

A melancholy accident happened on Sunday afternoon, on the Thames, below Wandsworth. Three young men who had gone up the river in a sailing-boat, were returning in the evening, when by unskilful management the boat was upset. Two of the persons, of the names of White and Rogers, the former a linen-draper's shopman, and the latter an apprentice to a druggist, were unfortunately drowned. The third person saved himself by swimming, and he was taken up by some bargemen, when in an exhausted state. The bodies of the persons drowned were not found.

On Friday last, as Mr. Simonson, traveller to a linen-house in the city, was riding from Nettlebed, Oxon, to Abingdon, he was stopped in the bye-road, near Leeson Bridge, by a single footpad, who presented a pistol, and demanded his money. Mr. S. unwillingly surrendered his watch and 5*l.* He was then ordered to gallop off, but in turning his horse, he drew a pistol from his holster, which he fired, wounded the robber in the shoulder, and took him into custody. It turned out that the robber's pistol, whose name is Beam, was not loaded, and even without a flint.

DIED.

On Sunday last, at Dorchester House, in Park-lane, in the 62d year of his age, the Right Hon. George, Earl of Dorchester, Viscount and Baron Milton, of Milton Abbey in the county of Dorset, Baron Milton, of Shrone Hill, in Ireland, and Lord Lieutenant of the County of Dorset. His Lordship having died without issue, the title is become extinct, and he is succeeded in his estates by his sister, the Right Hon. Lady Caroline Damer.

On Monday last, suddenly, at Lymington, Sir Giles Rooke, Knt. one of the Judges of the Court of Common Pleas.

Friday, at Bath, William Siddons, Esq. the very worthy and affectionate husband of the justly celebrated Mrs. Siddons. Though long an invalid, his dissolution may be said to have been sudden, as he had passed the preceding evening with a circle of friends in his usual social and pleasant manner.

THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

Our King, Constitution, and Laws.

No. 12. SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1808. PRICE 8d.

PART I.

THE TRIAL OF LIEUT.-GENERAL WHITELOCKE,

TAKEN IN SHORT-HAND AT A CONSIDERABLE EXPENCE, AND SUPERBLY PRINTED IN 40 COLUMNS, IS THIS DAY, SUNDAY, MARCH 20, 1808,

DELIVERED GRATIS

TO THE PURCHASERS OF THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

The great mass of Evidence that was given on the Trial of LIEUT.-GENERAL WHITELOCKE, renders it impossible, in the compass of 40 Columns, to comprize more than one-half of the very interesting Proceedings at Chelsea, without giving mere garbled Extracts of the Evidence; the Proprietors of The National Register, therefore, waving all considerations of Expence, have resolved to present gratuitously to the Public on SUNDAY NEXT, March 27, 1808, the continuation of the Trial in 40 additional Columns, being the SECOND PART, which will contain the Defence of Lieut.-General Whitelocke at length, and the Remarks of the Court, if allowed to be made public; together with the Opening Charge, and Final Reply of the Judge Advocate, and such of the Papers produced on the Trial, as are necessary to the general elucidation of the whole.

The Proprietors of The National Register have expended a very large Sum of Money, in presenting gratuitously to the Public this important Trial, in order that the NATIONAL REGISTER, at the close of the year, may be found to be the most important Register of the Times, that ever issued from any Press whatever; and they trust that a liberal Public, will step forward with such additional Patronage, as to support their endeavours to promote the dissemination of general and useful knowledge.

It may be necessary to inform the Public, that the Proprietors have not intended the Distribution of the above to the Trade; and they are confident that not a single paper has been issued from their Office, without being accompanied by the first Part of the Trial; should therefore any accident arise in the delivery of this Trial, application must be made to the Person who serves the Paper, and to whom immediate Orders will be given for the National Register to prevent the possibility of disappointment.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER TWELVE.

THE INCOME, OR PROPERTY TAX.

We trust that an era is now come in the history of this country. Since the last Number of THE NATIONAL REGISTER was published, a Petition to the House of Commons against it has been presented, by Sir Henry Mildmay, in which the petitioners declare, that their very childrens' clothes have been sold by the tax-gatherers, in order to pay it.

This is the first instance, as far as we know, of a public, [illegible] of the misery which this tax is creating. The extent and depth of the misery is matter of inference to every one who looks into the circumstances of the great mass of them who suffer by it. Its operation is bitter, and however well-founded, confined to private circles. We say [illegible] to Parliament against this destruc- [illegible]

[illegible] the circumstances of these petitioners [illegible] be turned into contempt, by the patrons, and enjoyers of the taxes, and their retainers; a tribe, alas! by far too numerous, and too powerful in this country. They will be described as an intemperate class of men belonging to the Dock-yard at Portsmouth: a question with which we have luckily nothing to do. It is not the character of the complainers, but the reality of the cause for complaint, in which the country is interested. In fact it is part of the hardship and cruelty of this case that it is one in which the modest, and most unworthy sufferer cannot be the first to utter his complaint. He strives to conceal his necessities. He struggles to save appearances. He wishes to conceal even from his friends the weight of his poverty. His family secretly cut off, one after another, their enjoyments, and spend their days and nights in anxiety. Their articles of property and even of furniture gradually disappear: and what, in its ultimate consequences, is, perhaps, the most deplorable of all, the education of his young ones must be abandoned, because what should pay for sending them to school he is obliged to give the tax-gatherer. This last circumstance is of a magnitude to command the attention even of the most unfeeling. It is the children of such families, as this we have just now described, who grow up to execute some of the most important offices of the community; who fill, in a great measure, what is called the middling rank of society. If they are reared without that education which prepares them to fill that station, a blank is left in society which nothing can supply. The country receives a blow in its most vital part. A race of nobles may be lost and replaced in little time, and with little difficulty. But a middling rank once lost, and the condition of a country is overthrown. Wherever a middling rank is large and flourishing, there the country is opulent and productive. Wherever a middling rank is wanting, the country is wretched; and happiness and prosperity in different countries will be found in the exact proportion, which the middling rank in each bears to the other two. In Turkey there is no middling rank: in Austria and Russia it is very small. It was and is considerably larger in France. In Switzerland and Holland it was formerly large. In Great Britain it has hitherto been largest of all. Exactly in the same order may national prosperity and happiness be traced. This is the class which the Property Tax, in conjunction with others, is hastening to destroy. It is, too, one of the misfortunes of the case, that it is hastening to effectuate this melancholy catastrophe by a hidden and silent process. By the concealment and patience of the individuals, the calamity may be in a great measure accomplished, (the approximation is already deplorable!) before those who have chief influence to avert it, can be rendered sensible of the evil.

The conduct of Mr. Fox, in regard to this tax, is instructive and memorable. We need not mention the remarkable circumstances of its introduction. When it was repealed by Mr. Addington, now Lord Sidmouth, the language used by Mr. Fox ought to be held in everlasting remembrance. "He congratulated the country on deli"verance from one of the heaviest calamities, from an "impost the most unjust, the most impolitic, the most op- "pressive, the most vexatious, the most inconsistent with "every rational principle of taxation that ever was inflicted "upon a suffering and injured people." These were his words, taken down upon the spot by a hearer of the debate. Yet this same Mr. Fox, as soon as he himself was in power, with an effrontery peculiarly his own, stood up to vindicate the most violent enhancement of this impost. His argument in its favour was worthy of the last days of Mr. Fox. It added insult to oppression. "There "now," he said, "were no taxes to be had which were not "bad. Every tax which had been imposed for a dozen "years past, he had regarded as exceptionable." Good God! did Mr. Fox believe this representation to be true; did he regard the country as in so deplorable a condition that it had for ev lve years been accumulating tax upon tax, after every just and proper source of taxation had been exhausted; did he behold it in this unparalleled state of suffering, and yet make not one effort to relieve it from the accursed load! Was it brought to that state of ruin in which no tax remained but that which Mr. Fox had only three years before described as "the most unjust, the "most impolitic, the most oppressive, the most vexatious, "the most inconsistent with every rational principle of "taxation that ever was inflicted upon a suffering and injured nation;" And did Mr. Fox proceed mercilessly to impose this tax, while one farthing of the people's money was misapplied, while his colleagues in office were drawing tens of thousands annually for doing nothing? He did! and let the nation never forget him, and those who along with him, could declaim upon the oppressions of the people, while they were not gaining by them, but as soon as they were, would render their little finger thicker than their predecessors loins.

The injustice and inequality of this tax, has been frequently animadverted upon, and is fully understood. It is so contrived that the great weight of it falls upon the middling and inferior orders, while the high and opulent are unfairly relieved. The man of 100*l.* a year is as heavily taxed as the man of 10,000*l.* though the suffering to the one and to the other bears no proportion. The helpless woman, who has an annuity which will expire next year, is obliged to pay the same proportion of it, as the landed gentleman of his rent which continues for ever.—The fruits of a man's earnings are as heavily taxed as the rent of a landed estate, though the landed estate remains to support the family of its owner; the fruits of a man's earnings perish not only with his life, but with his health. This inequality is enormous. The man's earnings can hardly ever be worth more than ten years purchase, very often cannot be worth half so much. The rent of land may be fairly estimated at thirty years purchase; that is, it is at least, three and very often six times more valuable than personal earnings. A property, therefore, which is three times, or six times more valuable than personal earnings, is yet taxed at the same sum. Personal earnings, therefore, are taxed three times or six times higher than the rent of land. Every view strikes us with the oppression and injustice of this mode of taxation. The rent of land is strictly income; it is the produce of a capital which, after the tax, remains unimpaired. The earnings of the man who has no other fund, are capital and income all in one. It is out of these earnings alone, that his capital can be created, that any provision for his old age or family can be made. This sacred fund becomes the prey of the property tax, while the landed or monied capital of the rich man stands exempt. Is it a light circumstance, too, that a man's earnings are the fruit of pains, privation, and solicitude; the rent of land, or the interest of money, comes without trouble? This inequality would be of importance, were it not eclipsed by the more enormous inequalities of which this impost is guilty. Who can bear to compare the sale of the clothes of a man's children, the curtailing each of a pound of bread a day, or the inability to send them to school (not to speak of the infinite gradations of suffering), with the giving a grand entertainment or two less in the year; the dismissing two or three useless horses, or a score of dogs?

Here starts up that sapient politician Lord Henry Petty, and informs us that a rising scale of taxation, proportioned to the rise of incomes, must by no means be thought of, because it would destroy subordination, and rank! This argument goes to say, that in order to preserve rank and subordination, the higher orders must be spared, till the middling and the lower are actually trodden down upon the ground. To please Lord Henry, every thing must be taken from the middling and lower orders, leaving the higher, as much as possible, exempt; a process by which, by and bye, the higher orders would be all in all, and aristocracy would rule uncontrouled. We ask for such a scale of taxation as would leave the different ranks in this country in that happy order which they have long preserved; feeling distinctly, that taxation was for some time proceeded in a manner calculated to destroy this order, and to sink the middling and industrious classes below that degree to which the country owes all its prosperity. Lord Henry Petty tells us, that our wish can by no means be gratified, lest subordination and rank should be affected. We, therefore, understand Lord Henry. He desires, by the baneful influence of taxation (a slow, but a sure process), to bring the people of this country under thraldom to a pampered, fat, and overgrown aristocracy. Every friend to humanity would rather see it in the hands of an absolute monarch!

To the small and declining number of those who retain any value for freedom, there is something in this tax revolting beyond expression. Not only are their circumstances subjected to an odious inquisition, and exposure, to which it is a wonderful phenomenon that a spirited nation could ever have been brought to submit, but the property of every man is actually laid at mercy, being liable to be charged at the arbitrary discretion of a few Commissioners. In theory, this constitutes a state of the most perfect slavery. No man enjoys any thing but at the will of his assessors. We have the derisive privilege of appealing from one set of Commissioners to another exactly like them, who, if our appeal does not please them (and this it seldom does) have the very serious privilege of charging the complainer double. This is a contrivance which prevents them from being much troubled with appeals! The poor sufferers must quietly pocket their injuries for fear of worse consequences. When this tax was first introduced, when the Government was yet timid respecting it, and the People jealous, pains were taken to inculcate delicacy and tenderness on the part of the Commissioners, and they were observed. It is the nature, however, of these qualities to wear off. A greater and a greater degree of license and severity has every year been assumed. An actual tyranny is now exercised, of which it is the nature to increase; and Englishmen have but one alternative before them, either an effectual alteration of this pernicious law, or an utter extinction of that security in the enjoyment of the fruits of their industry which has constituted the pride and the prosperity of our hitherto enviable country.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XII.

THE MORNING PAPERS.

We stated in the last Number of THE NATIONAL REGISTER our intention of offering some remarks on the four principal Morning Papers. In considering the influence of the Newspaper press on the public mind, these deserve the more particular attention, that it is from them all the other papers, both in town and country, are, in a great measure, made up. What the Morning Papers, therefore, are, the Newspaper press is in a considerable degree. They give the tone, and the discordancies are, in fact, very inconsiderable.

THE MORNING POST.

It is of no consequence with which of them we begin. We take this, not because it is the best, not because it has the most extensive sale, for in that we understand it is surpassed; but because it is the most impudent, and blows the loudest trumpet in its own behalf.

We do not mean to trace the history of this print, from the time of its republican zeal, in the days of the Friends of the People, through its mawkish advances to Addington, its prompt espousal of the cause of Mr. Pitt, and its hesitation about the Grenvilles and Foxes, till we arrive at its present hearty and loquacious efforts in favour of the present Ministers. It is its present character with which we are concerned, and to that we shall confine ourselves.

It is more barefacedly Ministerial than any of the Morning Papers, and almost equals The Courier in the grossness of its adulation. All the transactions of the present Ministry it has applauded. The attack on Copenhagen, the Orders in Council, the rejection of the Russian and Austrian offers of mediation, Lord Lake's Pension, have all been acts, every one of which was alone sufficient to save the country. The Ministers themselves are precisely the wisest and ablest men in the nation. There is not one of them that is not fit for every thing, but each is fittest for that exact place which he holds. The Duke of Portland is a very pillar, an Atlas of State, and he is at the head of them. Lord Hawkesbury was long ago declared, by a good judge (Mr. Pitt), to have an hereditary aptitude for office. He was declared by the same wonderful statesman to be more profoundly acquainted with and fitted for the duties of the Secretary for the Foreign Department than any other man in the nation, one only (meaning Mr. Fox) excepted. But admirably fitted as he might be for the duties of the Foreign Department, wonderful it is, and happy for the nation, that he is still more admirably fitted for the duties of the Home Department, in that accordingly he is placed: and what surpasses admiration is, that, even after Mr. Fox is in his grave, we have found a man still better qualified for the office of Secretary for the Foreign Department, notwithstanding the eulogium of Mr. Pitt, than Lord Hawkesbury, that is, Mr. Canning, a man who unites in his own person all human excellencies, the perfection of oratory, the depth of wisdom, and Herculean vigour. As for Mr. Perceval, he is the most astonishing specimen of a heaven-born Minister that was ever exhibited, for he has contrived in his blue-bag among his briefs to find the profound, liberal, ingenious, and comprehensive doctrines of political economy, and every speech that he makes, and every measure that he devises gives proof how thoroughly he is acquainted with them. Of the Duke of York The Morning Post has nothing particular to say. He is equally the favourite of all Administrations and of all Newspapers.

Among the general principles which The Morning Post espouses is this: that to enable those admirable Ministers to do any good, money, abundance of money, is absolutely necessary. Therefore let the people never grudge to pay taxes. Whoever complains of the taxes is a villain, a friend of Bonaparte, and an enemy of his country. Sinecure places are absolutely necessary, not perhaps to reward merit, which is its own reward, but to secure plenty of friends to the King and the Constitution in these dangerous times. See what a defender of the prerogative Lord Redesdale is! How invaluable are such men as this! And where should we find them if there were no sinecures? The pressure of taxation, the progress of poverty, the growth of pauperism, might arrest attention, might create alarms, and produce inquiries, were it not for the salutary voice of such men, who stifle complaints, who brow-beat the complainers, and have a large pack of retainers always ready to open upon them.

THE MORNING CHRONICLE

Differs in some essential respects from the paper above mentioned. It has not changed its party, and along with its party got new principles. It has only changed its principles in all possible ways to accommodate them to its party. In the times of the violence of Mr. Fox, when he was arraigning all the institutions of his own country, and panegyrizing the most violent and foolish acts of the French reformers, The Morning Chronicle was no less loud of the French, and no less violent against our own institutions than Mr. Fox. When the progress of reflection and of events had cooled the language of Mr. Fox, and he appeared to the sound and enlightened friends of their country and liberty, to assail only those of our institution which actually wanted reform, and to recommend only those innovations which were really salutary, and which time and the change of circumstances rendered necessary, The Morning Chronicle abounded with articles of the most sterling merit, with pointed and masterly exposures of the false doctrines, and weak or wicked actions of public men, and with well-conceived and well-written expositions and defences of the just, liberal, and philanthropic principles of political philosophy. But mark the time when its party ascended to power, and when bidding farewell to all their former principles, and holding all their former professions in contempt, they abstained from every attempt to remove the abuses of the country, and added to its burthens with a remorseless audacity that had been never equalled: then The Morning Chronicle became inspired with the spirit of its patrons. It became the advocate of the corruption which it had before stigmatized, and that with a degree of effrontery which was uncommon even in a morning paper. It eulogized the very rage and fury of taxation. If any one but whispered the language of complaint, it had ready the epithets of which it used to complain so bitterly itself; and the term Jacobin, after it was consigned to oblivion among all honest men, was basely and impudently flung at others by The Morning Chronicle. Now at last, when its party is again expelled from power, it is condemned to play the opposition drudge, and that in the tamest stile that has ever been witnessed. Its recent conduct absolutely prohibits the high appeal to principles. It would only expose it to laughter. It is confined to the subordinate task of carping minutely at the detail of Ministerial transactions, and trying as often as possible to clap a compliment upon its patrons. Since it lost, too, the gentleman who recently conducted it, the talent makes no compensation for the principle; from being eminently the best written paper, it has become almost, or altogether the very worst.

THE MORNING HERALD.

It has long been the aim of this paper to be considered as the organ of the Prince of Wales. Every thing, therefore, connected with Carleton House is the subject of panegyric in it. Relying on a large supply of Advertisements, and a fixed circulation, which the Advertisements contribute to keep up, little pains is used in the conduct of this paper. It seldom enters very deeply into political topics, and its tendency is to side with the Court, as far as the politics of Carleton House will permit, be the ministers who they may; thus, it was heartily ministerial while Fox and Grenville were the Ministers, but no sooner were they out, than it found they were distressed for very good reason; and it has a short word of praise for every thing which Mr. Canning and his colleagues chuse to do.

THE TIMES

is, in some respects, the most respectable of all the Morning Papers. We believe it has the highest sale, which it has obtained by the most uncommon exertions, during this war, to obtain priority in foreign intelligence. These, however, though with the public circumstances of huge importance, are with us matters of very trifling moment. We value more its distinction in being less the slave of party than any other Morning Paper. We doubt, however, whether for this distinction it merits very ample praise. We suspect its character is better described by the imputation of perpetual trimming than that of independence. The Times, in fact, resolves to be in favour of every Ministry; and this is a cunning calculation enough. Considering the force of influence now at work in this country, it would be a strange occurrence, indeed, if any Ministry had not, for the time being, a decided majority, among the readers of daily papers, in their favour. The Times, therefore, always chuses to be on the side of the greater number. But this can only be done by particular management. If it were to unite itself very closely with any one Ministry, it would be under the necessity of adhering to them after they were out. By standing, however, a little aloof, it can please the great body of their friends while they are in, and join their enemies as soon as they are out. Notwithstanding this, notwithstanding The Times has railed with the present Ministers against the advisers of Peace, notwithstanding it has panegyrised the attack on Copenhagen, and the Orders in Council, it deserves the highest praise for being the only Morning Paper which, at this moment, complains of the burthens laid upon the people. It has arraigned the Pension to Lord Lake, and the Rejection, by the Lords, of the Bill for preventing Grants in Reversion; and on these points has touched the true string of patriotism. It is conducted with care rather than with ability. Its superiority in intelligence is confined to foreign papers; for, in private, and court history, it is often outstripped by others.

GENERAL REFLECTIONS.

It is very evident, to the attentive and competent reader, that the writers in all these papers are ignorant; and several of them uneducated men. They every day commit the most gross mistakes, even in elementary knowledge. They discover none but the common-place ideas of conversation, which they acquire a kind of practical habit, in turning to catch the fancy of the public.

Those papers are all of them antagonists of Peace. The party of The Morning Chronicle finding it convenient to be for Peace, though they did not make it when they might, that paper is obliged, occasionally, to use the language of the party, but it is evidently not hearty in the cause. It is unfortunate for the country that the daily papers have an interest in war. The war increases their sale. People are so greedy, in a time of public anxiety, for news, that very many persons must have a daily paper then, who would be contented with one of less frequent publication, in a time of tranquillity and peace. It is accordingly found that the demand for daily papers always increases prodigiously in a time of war, and decreases in a time of peace. The cries, therefore, of the daily papers, against Peace, ought to be suspected.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, GERMAN, AND HAMBURGH PAPERS.

THE ROCHEFORT, CARTHAGENA, AND TOULON SQUADRONS.

PARIS, FEB. 21.—Letters from Lyons, of the 11th and 13th announce that the Rochefort squadron which left that port in the month of January last, after a short cruise in the Atlantic, passed the Straights of Gibraltar, and is safely arrived at Toulon, where it has united itself to the squadron in that port. The Rochfort squadron consists of from five to six sail of the line, some frigates, and light vessels. The Spanish squadron from Carthagena has also put to sea, and has joined (if we may believe the e letters) the Toulon and Rochefort squadrons. Several other ships have also left the different ports of Spain, so that the combined fleet will be very considerable. Five sail of the line have been built, equiped, and armed, within a short time, at Toulon. It is generally reported at Lyons, and in all the ports of the Mediterrancan, that the combined fleets intend to drive away the English ships cruising off Sicily and at the entrance of the Adriatic, and afterwards to attack the fleet of Admiral Collingwood, stationed in the Archipelago and off the Dardanelles, before this fleet can receive reinforcements from England. The most recent letters from the South of France announce that the combined squadrons of Toulon, Rochefort, and Carthagena, reinforced by other ships, sailed from Toulon on the 7th and 8th of this mouth, and stood towards Sicily.

MARCH 5.—The operation of the Decree respecting the Conscription of 1809 commenced yesterday, and is carried into effect, in conformity to an order for that purpose. Among the exceptions are the following:—

The Pupils in Painting and Sculpture who have received high prizes, the Protestant Clergy, Persons inscribed for the Navy, Officers of Health in active employment, Pupils in the Oriental Languages, the Veterinary Art, and the Military Schools.

ITALY.

ENTRANCE OF THE FRENCH TROOPS INTO ROME.

ROME, FEB. 2.—Yesterday a corps of French troops, under the command of General Miolles, took possession of the Castle of St. Angelo. The best understanding prevails between these troops and the inhabitants. The troops of his Holiness do duty as before.

FEB. 3.—Yesterday morning early, General Miolles entered this city, at the head of between five and six thousand men. The guard-house at the gates, the principal guard at the Piazzi Colona, and the others, were immediately taken possession of by the French troops, as was also the Castle of St. Angelo; all this was done in the utmost good order, and without any disturbance, and the same tranquillity still continues, which the inhabitants are strictly enjoined to maintain by a Proclamation from his Holiness. To-day all the gates, except three, have again been occupied by the Papal troops.

GERMANY.

BANKS OF THE ELBE, MARCH 11.—The French army, with the [illegible] French Government, has entered Holstein to [illegible] and the other Danish Islands instant, that 1800 French preceded by two Hamburgh and to serve them as guides.

The citizens of Altona are allowed a mark a day for the keep of every man, at the expence, it is said, of the Hanse towns. On the 7th, early in the morning, the cavalry, bearing the name of the Duke of Ahremberg, assembled, consisting of all nations, but very fine young men, continued their march, and have since been continually followed by French and Spanish corps of artillery, cavalry, and infantry. The French have also marched into Holstein, from the side of Lubeck; and by this time the greater part of Holstein, not excepting Rendsberg, the King of Denmark's residence, is full of French and Spanish troops. In three days the whole Spanish army, under the command of the Marquis of Romagna, will have left Hamburgh and its environs, to proceed through Holstein over the Belts to Zealand. At Apenrade, and all the ports of Holstein and Schleswic, all great and small craft are under orders to take in French and Spanish troops; and at Copenhagen, all the gun-boats and merchantmen, with one ship of the line, four large Danish East Indiamen, fitted out as frigates, and carrying 36 guns each, besides a number of Danish brigs, cutters, and pilot-boats, manned by French and Danish sailors, are to carry over the troops. The French will, it is said, attack Sweden in form in five different places, and the troops destined for the expedition are under the command of Bernadotte, and will, it is said, amount to nearly 70,000 men. The appearance of a most respectable British fleet in the Sound and Baltic, becomes therefore absolutely necessary to save the Crown of his Swedish Majesty, and prevent his throne from falling into the hands of the combined French and Russians. It is the general opinion here, that if the British fleet does not arrive speedily, Sweden is lost. The French and Spanish armies, assisted, it is said, by the Danes, are to be all at Copenhagen, Cronenberg, Elsineur, and other parts of Zealand, on or before the 25th or 26th inst.

VIENNA, FEB. 20.—The English Minister, Adair, is still in this city; but it is nevertheless determined that he shall quit it immediately. We have to-day received intelligence from Trieste, that on the 15th inst. an order was publicly affixed at the Exchange there, to break off all communication with England: this order caused an immediate advance of 20 per cent. on the price of Colonial produce. We are equally threatened with a similar advance here.

BANKS OF THE DANUBE, FEB. 22.—We are assured that several regiments, which formed part of the Russian army in Moldavia, have begun their march for the Caspian Sea. A Russian army is to be assembled there, which will embark in order to proceed to India. Czerni-George has given strict orders to his advanced posts to pay all possible respect to the French troops in Bosnia and Albania.

HOLLAND.

HAVRE, FEB. 14.—The sea in the late Hurricane has done great damage to the Dyke l'Heure, which it has broke through in several places, and laid under water more than 200 acres of ground. Towards the end of the storm, a large vessel, dismasted, was perceived in the bay; she had lost her mizen-mast and bowsprit. The privateer the Duke of Dantzic, of Boulogne, immediately sailed after her, came up with, and boarded her. She proved to be an English ship of more than 400 tons burthen, named the William, of London, bound to the Cape of Good Hope, with a cargo valued at more than 7,000 livres. With the assistance of some other vessels she was brought into this port.

STATE PAPER.

AUSTRIAN DECLARATION.

During the war which was concluded by the peace of Tilsit, his Imperial, Royal and Apostolic Majesty has continually endeavoured to impress the belligerent powers with the motives which ought to induce them to concur, in endeavouring to procure a general peace. The Court of Vienna from that time, declared its sentiments to the Cabinet of St. James's, and the Imperial Envoy at London, Prince Stahremberg, received formal and pressing instructions. But as the British Ministry in answer to these written communications declared, that its answer must depend on its allies, the salutary propositions of Austria could not but be considered as disregarded, and soon after the Treaty of Tilsit was concluded, by which the interests of the Continent were regulated without the participation of Great Britain. His Imperial, Royal and Apostolic Majesty continued nevertheless convinced of the utility, and even of the necessity of a general pacification; and this conviction afforded him new motives for renewing his pressing representations of the Court of London. In July, soon after the signing of the peace, the Prince of Stahremberg again received orders to induce the British Ministry to enter into a Negociation with France, in order that the Continental Peace might be connected with and confirmed by a Maritime Peace. But these propositions were not more successful than the former had been, and the answer of England was again evasive. His Majesty, however, thought it right to return to a subject, of the most material influence on the general system of Europe, as well as on the prosperity of the Austrian provinces in particular. Prince Stahremberg was, therefore, for the third time directed, in September 1807, to make some further overtures connected with the former measures of the Court of Vienna. But before his Majesty's Ambassador reported the result of his communication, the Court of London declared its sentiments with regard to a maritime peace, in so positive a manner, refusing, at the same time, the mediation of Russia, making an attack on Copenhagen, and seizing the Danish fleet, without assigning any satisfactory cause for these violent measures, nay, endeavouring to justify these violent proceedings, their infringements of the unquestionable rights of Neutral Powers, by official declarations, which evidently clashed with the principles adopted by other great Powers, that it was impossible not to perceive in the course pursued by the British Minister, a determination to remove the possibility of peace to a greater distance, and not to listen to whatever had any tendency to restore tranquillity to Europe. The impression which this conduct, destructive of all the hopes which his Majesty had fondly conceived, made on him, was as deep as it was painful. Without waiting for the farther reports of Prince Stahremberg, orders still more urgent and more positive were sent him than he had before received. These instructions, bearing date the 30th October, contained first, a recapitulation of all former transactions, and directed him to represent to the Cabinet of St. James's, in the strongest colours, the unavoidable consequences of its conduct, and to insist, in the most earnest manner, on an open declaration of its real sentiments with regard to peace, and to avail himself of all possible means to lead back to sentiments of moderation fitted for the present situation, and meeting with the wishes of Europe. The dispatches closed with the precise order to apply once more on this subject in an official manner to his Britannic Majesty's Minister for Foreign Affairs, and to make to him the formal proposal for a maritime peace, on such principles as answered the interest of all the powers concerned, and as a provisional proof of his pacific disposition, to desist from the measures pursued against Denmark, and retract the declaration which accompanied them. Should the Court of St. James's reject these proposals, or purposely protract giving any answer, Prince Stahremberg was directed to demand his passports and leave London, with every person belonging to the Embassy. It was the Emperor's will that the above instructions should be restricted to such points of general interests as were most likely to move the British Cabinet to receive his proposals with attention and kindness. And if his Imperial Majesty ordered no complaints to be inserted by the numerous violations of his rights, as a Neutral Power—violations with regard to which his Majesty had not been able to obtain the least redress or compensation—the reasons will, no doubt, be obvious, which induce his Majesty to pass by in silence whatever concerned his personal interest. His Majesty's Ambassador in London could but execute the positive orders which he received from Vienna, to their full extent. But being of opinion that he might yet indulge an hope of being able to prevail on the English Ministry to shew more pacific sentiments towards France, he resolved to express at first only part of his orders, in a note addressed to Mr. Canning. On the 20th of November, the Secretary of State answered that Note by a mere repetition of the Declarations made to Austria by England, since the month of April 1807.

As further representation was now evidently ineffectual, a final notification was sent, on the 22d of December, to Prince Stahremberg, which repeated the orders of the 30th of October, and directed him, before his departure, to give in a Note, explaining the motives of the conduct of the Court of Vienna towards that of London. These dispatches did not, however, arrive in London till Prince Stahremberg had applied for and received his passes, and he no longer could have communication with the Secretary of State, and deliver in the Note which had been committed to him.

This representation, which is confined to the official communications that have passed between the two Governments, is sufficient to shew that the Cabinet of St. James's cannot mistake the causes nor the motives which have induced his Apostolic Majesty to break off the connection which has hitherto existed between Austria and Great Britain. The Emperor nevertheless wishes to see the moment arrive when the Court of London, sensible of its true interests, shall, with calmness and justice, judge of and compare the situation of England with that of other powers, and thereby enable his Majesty to renew with it his former friendly connections.

Vienna, Feb. 18, 1808.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MARCH 14.

A short conversation took place between Lords Mulgrave and Grey, explanatory of that which occurred on Friday, respecting the extent of our existing pecuniary engagements to Sweden. The result was, an admission on both sides, that the Subsidiary Treaty of 1805 was completely at an end from the moment of the evacuation of Stralsund. From Lord Mulgrave's statement it further appeared, that this was the construction put upon that transaction by the Court of Sweden itself; but that it had been conceived to be consistent with the honour and interest of this country to give it so liberal an interpretation, as to cover the expence of re-conveying the Swedish troops from Sweden; and for this purpose a month's subsidy had been advanced.

HIS MAJESTY'S MESSAGE.

Lord Hawkesbury moved the Order of the Day, for taking into consideration his Majesty's Message, relative to the Swedish Treaty. He stated it to be his anxious wish to avoid any topic which could lead to a difference of opinion on this subject. All must admit, that Sweden had manifested the most faithful adherence to her engagements with this country, and displayed the highest sense of honour in resisting the promises, as well as the threats, of the enemy. He subscribed most cordially to the sentiments stated in a dispatch from the Noble Lord opposite (Grey) to his Majesty's Ministers at the Court of Stockholm. His Swedish Majesty had acted in strict conformity to the principles there inculcated; and while he was playing the last stake for the independence of Europe, he was certain every one who heard him must agree, that it was due to the character and interests of the country to give him every aid in a war, which was not continued with a view to purposes of aggression, but which he now carried on to preserve his own independence, and to enable him to obtain honourable terms of peace. The Noble Lord wished it to be distinctly understood, that in adopting this line of policy, his Swedish Majesty was not acting under any suggestion from the British Government. On the contrary, the latter had expressly communicated to him that it would feel no dissatisfaction at his concluding a separate peace with the enemy, provided it should be on terms not injurious to the just rights of this country. The subsidy was so regulated in its payments, that at no time could there be any considerable advance beyond what the existing occasions might seem to require. His Lordship concluded with moving an Address, thanking his Majesty for communicating the Treaty with Sweden, and assuring him of their readiness to concur in giving it complete effect.

Lord Grenville was satisfied with the ground on which the Noble Secretary rested his motion; and so far he was not disposed to make any opposition to it. He heard with pleasure and approbation, that no attempt was made by Ministers to prevent Sweden from making what peace it might be in her power to negociate; and that the subsidy now offered her was prompted only by justice, generosity, and good faith. He was sorry, however, to see the Treaty encumbered with the article that provided that the two countries should negociate conjointly.

After a few words, in explanation, from Lord Hawkesbury, the motion was agreed to, with the dissent only, we believe, of Lord King.

IRELAND.

Lord Hardwick entered into an explanation of the circumstances which led to the dismissal of Mr. Giffard from his official situation in Ireland. The Noble Lord stated the particular instructions which he had received from Lord Hawkesbury, to make every exertion to prevent the mischievous effects of religious animosities in that country, and if he should not succeed in dissuading the Catholic party from petitioning, to endeavour to confine, as much as possible, the discussion of their claims, within the walls of both Houses of Parliament. He then proceeded to comment on the refractory conduct of Mr. Giffard, and to shew that the honour and character of his Administration required that he should be dismissed. His Lordship then moved for the production of certain Papers tending to [illegible] by his proceeding.

Lord Hawkesbury concurred in the truth of the narrative just given; but thought that some allowance ought to be made for the irritation naturally produced by the sufferings and losses which Mr. Giffard had sustained during the rebellion.

Lord Hardwick then withdrew his motion; stating, that his purpose was completely answered, by having had an opportunity of vindicating himself from the misrepresentations which had gone abroad, respecting his treatment of Mr. Giffard.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL BILL.

Lord Bathurst moved the first reading of the Orders in Council Bill.

Lord Grenville proceeded at considerable length to point out a variety of paragraphs in the Bill, introducing regulations of trade, warehousing, &c. totally irrevelant to a Bill of Supply, and therefore inadmissible in that form, in any degree of consistency with their Lordship's privileges. Among these he instanced a clause which, as now worded, put an end to the charter of the East India Company. He also particularly adverted to a clause by which a remedy at law was taken away from persons complaining of being aggrieved under the Orders in Council, unless their actions were brought within three months from the commission of the act complained of. As these Orders had now been in force upwards of four months, he thought such a clause was, with respect to the majority of those aggrieved, adding insult to injury. He concluded with moving that the Bill be rejected.

Lord Hawkesbury was of opinion, that the Order of 1702 had not been rigidly insisted on in the case of several Money Bills within the last half century. He should propose to read the Bill now a first time, and then to have it printed; with the view of its being read a second time on Wednesday, should the prints be then on the table.—Ordered.

Lord Lake's Annuity Bill was, after a few words from Lords Grosvenor and Harrowby, read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.

The Mutiny Bill was brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

REVERSIONARY GRANT BILL.

Lord Redesdale entered into a detailed repetition of the arguments which he formerly urged against the Bill, and to which he said he had heard nothing like an answer.

He objected to it as tending to infringe on the prerogatives of the Crown, the influence of which was now considerably less than formely; as trenching upon the privileges of their Lordships, by springing out of a resolution and address of the other House, in consequence of the rejection of a similar measure last Session; and, above all, as being the commencement of a system of innovation which might ultimately lead to the subversion of the Constitution.

Lord Grey, at considerable length, controverted the arguments of Lord Redesdale.

Lord Holland, the Lord Chancellor, and Lord Hawkesbury, then made a few remarks on a point of order connected with the exhibition of proxies; and, a division taking place, the Bill was rejected by a majority, proxies included, of 128 to 48.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16.

Lord Grenville moved the Order of the Day for resuming the adjourned debate on the motion for rejecting the Orders in Council Bill, on the ground of its being a violation of the Standing Order of 1702.

Lord Hawkesbury quoted a variety of precedents in the reign of Queen Anne, and of late years, to prove that this Order was not so strictly interpreted, as to preclude the introduction of Bills from the other House because they contained matter not absolutely necessary to be inserted in a Money Bill. The words of the Order described the interdicted clauses as being "foreign to and different from" the matter of the Bill. Yet such had been the practical latitude of construction given to these words, that in many of the Money Acts which he enumerated, there were clauses which very nearly, if not altogether, came within the prohibition. From this circumstance the Noble Lord inferred, that the House looked not merely to the form, but to the design of a Bill sent up to them; their chief object being to prevent any attempt to fetter their right of free discussion by the custom of tacking, which was so frequently attempted a little before the enactment of the Standing Order.

Lord Erskine quoted, as the most recent precedent, the rejection of a Money Bill, when he had the honour of sitting on the Woolsack, because it had a clause removing certain doubts which occurred in the case of Astlet, respecting Exchequer Bills.

Lords Harrowby, Melville, and the Lord Chancellor contended that the Bill was not an infringement of the true intent of the standing order.

Lords Lauderdale, Grenville, and Grey maintained the contrary opinion.

The Bill was negatived by a majority, proxies included, of 129 to 59.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17.

Lord Derby presented a petition from certain Merchants in Liverpool against the Orders in Council Bill, which he requested the Clerk to read.

Lord Derby, upon the petition being read, dwelt at some length on the motives of the petitioners. They consisted of more than 400 of the most respectable inhabitants of Liverpool, who, differing from each other on political subjects, had united in this application, from their apprehension of the injurious consequences to the trade of the country at large, and to Liverpool in particular, as likely to result from the Orders in Council. He concluded by moving, that the petitioners should be heard by their Council on the second reading, in furtherance of those Orders in Council.

The Duke of Montrose argued, that the motion was inadmissible; as, according to the standing orders, counsel could not be heard against a Bill of Supply.

Lord Erskine strongly insisted, that the Petitioners had a right to be heard against the measure of the Orders in Council; and if there was now any difficulty in point of form, it wholly arose from the House having entertained that subject in connection with a Vote of Aid and Supply.

The Lord Chancellor said, that there was no order to prohibit hearing Counsel against a Bill of Supply; but the general practice of the House had been not to hear them.

Lord Hawkesbury thought the prayer of the Petition contrary to the usual practice of the House. He contended that the Bill had been uniformly represented as a Bill of Supply, and that there was not a clause in it irrevelant to that object.

Lord Auckland conjured their Lordships not to shut their doors against the Petitioners, and adverted, in pathetic terms to the distresses which were daily accumulating upon the manufacturers in all quarters of the country. He deplored the consequences of the Orders in Council, as tending to shake that firmness and energy which the people had hitherto displayed under the most critical circumstances.

The motion was then put and negatived without a division; and after a long conversation on a point of order, the Petition was rejected.

Lord Derby presented a Petition from the same persons whose names were affixed to the former, complaining of the Orders in Council, and praying to be heard against them by Council, or to have their allegations examined into in such other manner as to their Lordships should seem meet. His Lordship moved, that the Petition should lie on the table, and that the Petitioners should be heard by their Council.

Opposite opinions gave rise to a long discussion, in the course of which Lord Hawkesbury moved, that the words relative to hearing Counsel should be left out of the motion. This amendment, after considerable opposition, was carried without a division.

Lord Erskine, in order to institute a proceeding upon which the petitioners might be regularly heard, then moved that the House should on Wednesday go into a Committee to consider of the Orders in Council. This motion, after a short conversation, was negatived.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 18.

The Foreign Cotton Exportation Prohibition Bill, and British Cotton Export Duty Bill, were brought up from the Commons, and read a first time.

Lord Auckland wished to know, whether any assurances had been given, that Sweden and Sardinia were to co-operate in the execution of this regulation, as without now entering into its policy, it was clear to him, that unless their concurrence was procured, it would be wholly inefficient to prevent the enemy from being supplied by means of the circuitous traffic, the legality of which, at present, had been distinctly admitted.

Lord Bathurst said, that he had admitted that British ships might convey enemy's produce from America to the ports of an Ally, whence it might find its way to France, until that

Ally took the necessary measures to co-operate with us; but he had not admitted that a direct trade could be carried on to an enemy's port from a neutral port, and therefore the supposed facility of intercourse from Sardinia did not exist.

Lord LAUDERDALE contended, that the trade from the latter, as well as Sweden, was open to France by means of neutrals, nay, perhaps, even by their own vessels; for Sweden might, upon this point, choose to follow the example given by our late Ally the Emperor Alexander, who did not prevent the continuance of a direct commercial intercourse with France in Russian bottoms, notwithstanding the existence of hostilities.

Lord HAWKESBURY then proposed some formal and verbal amendments, which were agreed to.

Lord LAUDERDALE briefly remarked on the inconveniences which had arisen to the manufacturing interests, from the practice of extending the terms of patents, and gave notice, that on Friday se'nnight he would submit two propositions of Order on that point, with the view of their being, with the concurrence of the House, entered on the Roll of the Standing Orders. The chief feature of his Lordship's proposal is, that six weeks notice shall be given in the London Gazette, previous to the Meeting of Parliament, by persons intending to apply for the Patent Bills.

The Lord CHANCELLOR intimated his general concurrence in the propriety of the remedy suggested by the Noble Lord.

MUTINY BILL

Lord HAWKESBURY very shortly pointed out, and justified the alteration from the Bill of the preceding Session. It was with a view to our Colonial service adviseable, that an option should be given for enlistment without limitation of the period of service. In order, however, to avoid all unnecessary interference with the new system, care was taken, that the man who enlisted in the first instance, for limited service, should not be allowed to extend the period until the expiration of the term for which he had already engaged.

The Duke of GLOUCESTER proposed to amend the Bill by leaving out the words, "giving the recruit the power of enlisting for unlimited service." The ablest military men in the British and Continental Armies, give a decided preference to the plan of enlisting for a limited term. It had been tried for nearly two years, with complete success. It furnished a better quality of men, and diminished the desertions in a most surprising degree.

Lord MELVILLE entered into a detail of the various expedients resorted to for the purpose of keeping up an army, and attributed its present effective state to the Army of Reserve Act, and the two opportunities given for volunteering from the Militia. He deprecated the sentimental reveries which had been indulged in with regard to the improving the quality of the soldier.

The amendment, after a short reply from the Duke of Gloucester, was negatived without a division.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MARCH 14.

Mr. Lascelles, from the Malmesbury Election Committee, reported that the Sitting Members were duly elected.

Mr. Wellesley Pole moved for copies of all such orders and directions as had been issued by the Lords of the Admiralty relative to relieving the squadron under the command of Sir Richard Strachan, and also of the supplies furnished.

The Hon. Gentleman moved also for copies of the orders issued by Admirals Lord Gardner and Young on the same subject, to the Victualling Office at Plymouth, for the supply of provisions to Sir Richard Strachan's squadron.—Ordered.

Mr. Huskisson moved an Address to his Majesty, for copies of the Order in Council of the 12th January 1808, under which certain American ships, the Temperance, Union, and others, bound to France, &c. had been captured and brought into British ports.—Ordered.

Sir C. Price presented a petition from the Merchants of London trading to the Continent, expressive of their support to the late Orders in Council.

Several Members spoke against the reception of the Petition, and, after a short conversation, Sir C. Price consented to withdraw it.

Mr. Whitbread moved for an Account of the Value of all Exports from Great Britain to Denmark, in 1805-6, 7, and 8, the 1st of January in each year, distinguishing British Manufactures from Foreign Produce.—Ordered.

Leave was given for the introduction of the Annual Qualification Indemnity Bill.

MUTINY BILL.

Mr. Calcraft stated, that in the progress of the Bill he should move to leave out the clause for enlisting men for unlimited service.

The Speaker said, that would come on after the Bill had been read a third time, as an Amendment in its body.

Sir F. BURDETT stated, that he now rose, in obedience to a notice given by his Noble Friend (Lord Folkestone) to move, that a clause be added to the Bill preventing, in future, any officer in the Army from being cashiered, and dismissed from the service, unless he should have been found guilty by a Court Martial. This regulation, he conceived, would not interfere with the Perogative of the Crown; but be productive of much benefit to the service, and highly satisfactory to the Army and to the Country at large. He wished to extend to Military Officers a degree of protection they had never enjoyed, but to which they were surely entitled, in order that they might not be exposed to dismissal from the army, through the base insinuations of disappointed individuals. His object was to prevent Officers, who from their merit were entitled to remain, from being forced to resign.—He contended that no Officer ought to be dismissed from his rank or pay, unless some substantial charge was made out to the satisfaction of a Court Martial. After enlarging upon the obvious policy of such a regulation, the Hon. Baronet concluded by moving a clause to the above effect to be added to the Bill.

The Secretary at WAR was sorry he could not comply with the proposition of the Hon. Baronet, who had not made out any fair ground for so material an alteration in the military system.

Lord FOLKESTONE supported the clause; and insisted, that the Hon. Baronet had stated ample grounds for its introduction. His Lordship recommended the Hon. Baronet to withdraw the clause, and introduce it in a separate Bill.

Sir F. BURDETT said he had abstained from any strong case, though he had many, of hard oppression, to elucidate; but yet he would, in the mean time, concur with the suggestion of his Noble Friend, and bring this important matter before the House in another shape. The clause was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. CALCRAFT said, he had a clause to propose, which was to reduce the Mutiny Bill to that state in which it was last year, with respect to the enlistment of men for a limited service had been attended with great success, and he considered the measure attempted by the present Ministers, of drafting from the Militia, as both expensive and oppressive. The draft of 16,000 men cost the country 640,000*l.* which fell mostly on the poorer portion of the landed interest.

The Secretary at WAR was averse to the clause, and contended, that the unlimited service was more congenial to the feelings of a soldier, and less expensive to the country at large.

The question was called for, and a division took place, when the clause proposed was negatived by 189 to 116.

The Bill was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 15.

Mr. Parnell moved for an Account of the gross Amount of the Value of all Exports from Ireland to America, and of American Produce imported into Ireland for the last three years; also of the quantity of Linen exported from Ireland to America, and the Tonnage of Vessels employed in the Trade between Ireland and America, for the last 10 years.—Ordered.

The Hon. Gentleman next moved, for an Account of the Amount of the Expence attending the Government Expresses sent to Ireland. He said this was a subject worthy of enquiry, as Government was in the habit of sending intelligence to a Newspaper, published daily in Dublin, to the exclusion of news from all the others. The news thus communicated was always concealed for some hours, and was extremely partial. He also moved, for an Account of the Expences attending the Transmissal of Government Dispatches from London to Dublin, via Holyhead, from the 1st of January 1801, to the 1st of January last.

Sir A. Wellesley stated, that the money spent in that way was extremely well applied. It only amounted to 7000*l.* a year. The Newspaper alluded to by the Hon. Gentleman was The Correspondent, certainly not a publication strongly attached to Ministers; and the only reason why it was so favoured, was the fact of its being the only daily evening Paper published in Dublin.

Mr. Huskisson presented Copies of the Orders in Council under which certain American ships, bound to French had been detained and brought into British ports.—Ordered to be printed.

An Account from the Custom House was presented, shewing the Amount of the Value of all Foreign Merchandize imported into Great Britain during the three last years.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. Buller presented a Schedule and various Papers, relative to the State of Equipment of the Squadron, under the Command of Rear-Admiral Sir Richard Strachan.—Ordered to be printed.

The Expiring Laws Perpetual Bill, the Irish Sugar Bill, the Hemp Import Bill, the Masts Import Bill, the Irish Linens Export Bill, and the Cinnamon Export Bill, were read a third time, and passed.

Mr. Secretary Canning presented copies of certain letters from Mr. Garlicke, at Copenhagen, to Lord Viscount Howick. Ordered to be printed

Mr. Sharpe postponed his motion till Monday next.

Mr. Perceval moved the order of the day for the House resuming the adjourned debate on the Oude Papers. The question was then put upon the first of Lord Folkestone's resolutions.

Sir T. Turton spoke at considerable length upon the treatment Lord Wellesley had shown to the Nabob of Oude, and thought the business had better be referred to the East India Judicature Committee.

Mr. G. Johnstone entered at great length into the subject of India affairs, and deprecated the unwarrantable interference with the Government of Oude. He concluded by assuring the House, that the system of Government adopted by the Marquis Wellesley, would in future be dispensed with; it was, therefore, not in contemplation to make any more conquests in India, but confine the Company to their present territory.

Mr. S. R. Lushington justified the conduct of the Noble Marquis with respect to Oude; and observed, that the Nabob, under all circumstances, ought to feel himself very happy in being relieved of the arduous task of governing subjects from whom he could not command obedience.—A laugh.

A motion was made for adjourning the debate till Friday.—The House divided, when the motion was negatived, the Ayes being 35—Noes 196.

After the Motion of Adjournment was disposed of, the House proceeded to debate the general subject of the conduct of the Noble Marquis.

Sir J. Anstruther then proposed his Motion, which, he said, was not for a general approbation of the Noble Marquis; but merely to say, that in his conduct in Oude he was actuated with a desire to serve the interest of the British empire in India.

Mr. Whitbread approved of the speech of Mr. Grant and Mr. Johnston, and others, against the Noble Marquis; and said, he saw nothing in the speech of Sir John Anstruther but general panegyric, where the injustice was too strong to be defended.

On a division—For the Resolution of Lord Folkstone, 31; Against it, 182.—Majority 151.

Sir John Anstruther then moved his Resolution, signifying that the Marquis Wellesley, in his conduct in Oude, was actuated with a desire to serve the British Empire. Division for the Resolution 180—Against it 29—Majority 151.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 16.

Mr. H. Sumner brought up a Bill for constructing a bridge or bridges from the Savoy Precinct, or near the same, to Cuper's bridge, on the opposite side of the Thames.—It was read a first, and ordered to be read a second time.

Lord Walpole reported from the New Malton Election Committee, that Lord Headley, one of the Sitting Members, had not been duly elected, but that the other Sitting Member had.

General Gascoigne presented a petition from the merchants of Liverpool against the Bill imposing a duty on Cotton Wool imported.—Laid on the table until the third reading of the Bill.

Lord H. Petty, from the Beverley Election Committee, reported that the Sitting Members had been duly elected.

Mr. T. Grenville, moved for a copy of Mr. Arbuthnot's letter to Mr. Secretary Fox, in 1806, stating the facilities which would be experienced by a British squadron passing the Dardanelles, and reducing Constantinople.—Ordered.

A Message from the Lords expressed the concurrence of their Lordships in the Marine Mutiny Bill, the American Commissioners Bill, and the East London Water Works Bill.

HIS MAJESTY'S MESSAGE, RELATIVE TO THE SWEDISH TREATY.

Mr. Canning said, that among all the Powers that had carried on war against France, since its revolution Sweden stood conspicuous as a memorable instance of fidelity and perseverance, and every tribute was due to that Power for its manly and magnanimous conduct. The engagements that formerly existed between Sweden and this country, were merely for temporary purposes, and principally for the protection of Swedish Pomerania, and the King's German territories. These engagements, however, ceased with the last campaign. A new engagement had now been entered into with that Monarch, and much might be expected from his future exertions. He had been called upon by the enemy to join the confederacy against Great Britain, but he had maintained a steady, uniform, and consistent resistance to such a demand. Thus was the King of Sweden reduced to the defence of his country from the combined attack of France and Russia. After enlarging upon the high spirit and independant character of the King of Sweden, he stated that it was intended to advance him 100,000*l.* per month, for 12 months, 100,000*l.* having been advanced before the meeting of Parliament, he should therefore move that a sum of 1,100,000*l.* be granted to his Majesty, to enable him to fulfil his engagement with the King of Sweden.

Mr. Whitbread said he should not oppose the subsidy, but he could have wished it had been bestowed as it was wanted, and that frequent recurrence should be had to Parliament for that purpose. He also said that he disliked that part of the Convention which stipulated that neither Sweden nor England would make peace without the consent of each other. England might make peace, and Sweden might do the same, without apprising the other of the transaction; at least such an occurrence might happen. Upon the subject of the subsidy, he had prepared an Address to his Majesty, which he should move after the House was resumed, expressing his opinion, that the money ought to have been paid from time to time, as required. He should propose this Address, merely for the purpose of recording his opinion on the subject.

After a few words from Mr. Smith, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Whitbread, and Mr. Canning, the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

EXPORTATION OF BARK.

Mr. Whitbread opposed the Speaker leaving the Chair, and said, their was a period in history of this country when such a measure would have been scouted, but times were unfortunately changed, and the object of the war totally abandoned. By this Bill we are required to carry hostility into the hospitals, and the miserable recesses of the sick, the lame, and the blind. It was a mean, despicable, and cruel policy to visit the sins of the French Ruler on the poorer classes of society. Fortunately for France, Bark was not so scarce as the Hon. Baronet and his friends would insinuate, for having enquired into the subject, he found letters from Paris, as late as the 24th ult. quoting the prices of Bark, viz. Red 54s. Yellow, from 5s. to 8s. Quill 16s. 8d.

Mr. W. Smith, Mr. S. Lushington, Mr. Herbert, and Lord Milton opposed the Bill, and Sir Wm. Elford, Mr. Gordon, and General Noel, supported it. A division took place for the Speaker's leaving the chair—Ayes 92, Noes 29. The Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17.

The Report of the Pilot's Regulation Bill was ordered to be taken into further consideration on Thursday next.

Sir C. Price presented a Petition from certain merchants in the City, carrying on trade with the Continent, in support of the Orders in Council. After a brief conversation it was ordered to lie on the table.

COLD BATH FIELDS PRISON.

Mr. Sumner wished to learn from Mr. Sheridan, whether or not he meant to proceed in calling the attention of the House to the Petition presented by him on that subject? He was unwilling to take the matter out of his hands, and he wished for a satisfactory answer.

Mr. Sheridan replied, that when he presented the Petition it was his wish that it might lie on the table for a reasonable time, in order to afford Ministers an opportunity of investigating its merits. One application he understood had since been made by the Petitioners to the Home Secretary of State, for information in regard to the proceeding Government meant to adopt. No answer had been given to that application, and he understood that another application had just been made. He could assure the Hon. Gentleman he was not inclined to shrink from the enquiry; but what had taken place had been solely occasioned by a wish to accommodate Ministers.

Mr. Sumner then stated, that he saw no occasion for more delay, and it would be expedient that the business should go on. He thought there was no occasion for resorting to the Home Secretary of State, but to come to the House at once for the appointment of a Committee to examine the facts alledged in the Petition. The charges, he observed, were either true, or else they were a libel on the Magistracy of the county; and it was on the part of the Magistracy that he now came forward, in order that they might be freed from such imputations. To get at the facts, a Committee was a much preferable tribunal to a Grand Jury. The Grand Jury in February had made a detailed Report on the subject of Cold Bath-fields-prison, in which the allegations in the Report of the former Grand Jury were denied, and he meant that these Reports, and the whole matters involved in the questions should be referred to a Select Committee. He concluded by moving for a copy of the Report of the Magistrates who visited Cold-Bath-fields prison, to examine certain abuses stated by Mr. Sheriff Phillips, in a letter to W. Mainwaring, Esq. in November last, complaining of light bread, and other abuses existing in the said prison.

Mr. Percival, at some length, objected to the notice given by the Hon. Gentleman, of moving for the appointment of a Committee, stating that the matter was now undergoing an investigation before the Home Secretary of State. He therefore recommended to the Hon. Gentleman to abstain from such a proceeding, until he should ascertain what Ministers intended to do, as no delay would take place on their part, and it would then be time enough for the House to interfere.

Sir F. Burdett could not agree with his Hon. Friend Mr. Sheridan, in his consistency to leave this important business in the hands of Ministers. The complaints against the Prison in Cold Bath-fields had too long existed; and the grievances were not small. If he had understood Mr. Perceval rightly, he thought him to say, no reflection could be thrown upon the Government. The Hon. Mover, however, had made a most perverse motion, as he exempted the Magistrates from any charge, while, in reality, they were the criminals that ought to be brought before the House. He then proceeded to contend, that the enquiry ought to be conducted by the House, and the Government should not be entrusted with its management; several reasons for which he gave. Parliament and the laws of the land had been set at nought by the Governor of that prison, and by the Magistrates who had so long protected and screened him. In that prison was every thing of woe and misery to be seen. There would be seen innocent men in irons, and Aris the Governor had been in the habit of whipping and beating the unfortunate individuals under his charge. Aris had also been in the habit of borrowing money from such of his prisoners as could gratify his thirst for money, and it was a fact, that he had in one way or another obtained from these miserable men, a sum of 1100*l*. (Hear, Hear, from the Opposition.) The former Committee had reported to that effect, and he thus did not state these things loosely. He therefore called upon the House to support the motion of the Hon. Gentleman, as a Committee was, in his mind, the best mode of obtaining justice and exemplary redress.

Mr. Sheridan said, the conduct of the Hon. Gentleman was most extraordinary, in taking the business out of his hands. He had told Mr. Sumner that he should not shrink from bringing the subject forward, and that he would submit it early next week. He was not fond of proceeding by a commission under the Privy Seal, as the former Commissioners had acted under very limited powers. After what had been stated by the Hon. Baronet behind him, could any man believe, for one moment, that Aris had been retained as Governor of the prison for an instant after these facts stated so publicly against him? Why a Magistrate for Surrey, such as the Hon. Mover, should interfere for the vindication of the Magistrates of Middlesex, he was at a loss to divine. With regard to light bread being distributed to the prisoners, the fact was, that the loaves weighed or ought to weigh, a pound each; but a superintendant of the bread, examined before the former Committee, had positively stated upon oath that there was no such thing as a pound weight used in the prison. The case of Mary Rich was one of the most inhuman and cruel ever stated against any man. She had been assaulted by a man, with intent to ravish her, and she was confined in Cold Bath-fields, to give evidence against him. Her father was so poor that he was glad to accept of a compromise from the offender to drop the prosecution, and the poor girl was confined in a damp dungeon, and so starved, that when she was discharged, she could neither speak nor stand.

Mr. Mellish denied the charge against the junior Aris, of having gotten a woman prisoner with child. The woman alluded to was delivered of an infant 18 months after her liberation from confinement. With regard to light bread having been distributed he believed the fact to have been exaggerated. When he had inspected with other Gentlemen the prison, very recently, he saw 308 loaves weighed, pound loaves, and their gross weight amounted to 315 pounds. It was well known that bread, when it got stale, weighed less than when just baked, and that fact, he apprehended, accounted for some of the loaves being lighter than others, as stated in Mr. Sheriff Phillip's letter to Mr. Mainwaring.

Mr. Sumner contended, that the Magistrates had in all respects done their duty.

Mr. Sheridan stated, that there was a foreigner confined who had become deranged through the severity of his treatment, as he had been ill-used by a fellow-prisoner appointed to watch him. This fellow had only been reprimanded and removed for so striking this wretched foreigner.

Mr. Wynne said, that the foreigner alluded to by his Hon. Friend, was confined as a spy, under the Alien Act. Government could not suffer him to go at large, neither could they send him out of the country, as he was possessed of information which would endanger the lives of others.

Sir F. Burdett said, he could never forget the facts of Aris having whipped his prisoners, and his having taken bribes. These enormities called for redress, and some justice was surely due to those who had suffered under his lash. In that infamous gaol there were no less than 300 cells, and no vigilance could detect the villainy to which the unfortunate prisoners were exposed. In serving their bread, it was very easy to pass one or two cells, and neglect the inmates entirely, at the caprice of the stern gaoler. There was, the Hon. Baronet observed, something mysterious in the protection Aris had received. He was a man of most notorious bad character. He had collected in Clerkenwell parish the rates for the poor, and had embezzled the money. He had been made Governor of the Cold bath-fields prison in order that he might repay the money by his honourable earnings in that capacity.

Mr. Perceval said that Government had no controul over the culprit, but the House had a right to dispose of him as they pleased: however, he thought a Commission would be much more advisable than a Committee.

Mr. Wilberforce was of the same opinion.

Lord Folkstone, Mr. Wm. Smith, Mr. H. Smith, Mr. Creevy, Sir John Newport, Mr. Sheridan, and Mr. Whitbread, were decidedly in favour of a Committee. The question being loudly called for, the gallery was cleared, when the House divided. For a Committee Ayes 50, Noes 74.

A Committee was appointed to examine the Journals of the House of Lords respecting the Reversion Bill.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, MARCH 18.

Mr. M. A. Taylor reported from the Maldon Election Committee, that the Sitting Members were duly elected.

Mr. S. Thornton brought up a Bill for constructing a Bridge across the Thames from Vauxhall Turnpike, or near the same, to Milbank.—Read a first, and ordered to be read a second time.

The Bill for funding Four Millions of Exchequer Bills, was read a second time, and committed for Monday.

Mr. Huskisson rose to move, that certain Orders in Council be referred to the consideration of a Committee of the whole House. His reason for this motion was the necessity of introducing a bill of Indemnity for Ministers, or more properly the Lords of the Treasury, who had permitted wine to be imported from Portugal, and other articles. He concluded by moving that the Orders in Council, presented on the 15th ult. be referred to a Committee of the whole House. After a few words from Sir J. Newport, the Committee was gone into, and leave was given to bring in a Bill allowing his Majesty to permit the importation of goods, from countries from which the flag of Great Britain is excluded, under any flag whatever. Leave was given to bring in the Bill.

Colonel Stanley presented a Petition from the Town and Neighbourhood of Manchester and Salford, signed by upwards of 50,000 Manufacturers out of employment, entreating the House in its wisdom to address his Majesty to embrace every possible means of concluding a peace with the enemy.—The Petition was ordered to lie on the table.

A brief Debate took place on the third reading of the Bark Bill, and the House divided on an amendment moved by Mr. Herbert, that instead of "now," the Bill be read a "third time this day three months." The Amendment was negatived.

Ayes for it 30. Noes 73.—The Bill was then read a third time and passed.

Mr. Alderman Combe moved the order of the day, for the House taking into consideration the Petitions from London, Liverpool, and Manchester, against the Orders in Council.—Agreed to.

Mr. Broom, Counsel for the Petitioners, was called to the Bar, who stated the object of his clients, in appearing before the House was with a view of shewing the operations of the Orders in Council, as injurious to the trade between this Country and America. Mr. Woods, Mr. J. Phillips, and Mr. G. Palmer, were severally examined, relative to the Petition from Manchester, and Mr. A. Glennie, and Mr. Bell, in support of the London Petition, when further proceedings on this business were adjourned till Tuesday next, and the evidence was ordered to be printed.—Adjourned.

MAIDSTONE ASSISES, MARCH 16.

SHERWOOD v. HOMPESCH.

Mr. Espinasse stated, that this was an action against Charles Antonie Hompesch, for a libel on the plaintiff and his wife.

Mr. Serjeant Sheppard rose to address the Jury, and in one of the most elegant speeches we ever remember to have heard in a Court of Justice, stated the nature and object of the action. He observed, that, from the circumstance of all female auditors being desired to leave the Court, the Jury would naturally infer that the libel complained of was of a sort that should not be suffered to reach a delicate mind; indeed he wished he could spare them and the Court the pain of hearing read one of the most abominable and filthy compositions which ever polluted paper, or stained the records of a Court of Justice. The case as in every case of libel, would involve three considerations: first, whether the paper stated was a libel; secondly, whether the defendant was the author and publisher of it; and thirdly, if these two points were established, what ought to be the measure of damages which the plaintiff was entitled to receive. As to the first point, whether the paper was a libel or not, it would be merely necessary to read it to the Jury, and the character of it would directly be manifest; secondly, that the defendant was the author of it, he should prove by evidence, which, in his mind, was wholly conclusive; for he should call a series of witnesses, who, if his instructions did not deceive him, would prove that it was the studied composition of the Defendant, to whom it was imputed.—The Learned Serjeant then described the libel.

It was proved that the plaintiff married his wife in 1795. Several witnesses were then called, who proved the following facts; that the plaintiff Sherwood was in the heat of going to the Baron's house, and one Sunday in October he sat with him drinking and playing cards all the Sunday, and all the night until five o'clock in the morning; then his wife came and fetched him home. The next day the Baron sent him a bottle of wine to refresh his spirits, as he said, and afterwards a plaister to cure the bruises which, he said, his wife might have given him, and an ornamented horse-whip to correct his wife. He afterwards set about to compose a song, called, "The Termagant, or Direful Kentish Tale," which was proved to have been given by him to one Goodwin to be circulated. This was the libel complained of, and was an obscene doggerel poem on Sherwood's wife fetching him home: it contained neither wit, poetry, nor humour, but vulgar obscenity. These facts being proved, Mr. Serjeant Best, for the defendant, made an able speech in mitigation of damages.—The Lord Chief Baron summed up the evidence.—The Jury withdrew for five minutes, and then returned with a verdict for the plaintiff, damages 500*l*.

At the Chelmsford assizes, an action was tried, Newman Harding, esq. v. Morgan, for not taking away the tithe of grass after it was set out, but suffering it to remain and incumber the plaintiff's land. The plaintiff, however was nonsuited. The farmer, (the Judge observed,) by common law, was obliged to ted the grass for the parson, and not put it in a green state into the cock; and the parson was not obliged to take it away, before it was turned into swarth.

THE FOREST ROBBER.—John Pitt, aged 27, who so long infested the Forest of Bere, and robbed almost every person travelling that way, was indicted at the Winchester assizes for feloniously assaulting John Brent, and robbing him, on the 24th of November last, on the King's high-way, in the parish of Warblington. William Goldson, Esq. Magistrate, of Portsmouth, deposed, that the prisoner made a full confession of the fact of having robbed Mr. Brent; that he held out not any hopes of pardon to him, so far from it, that he told him to consider well before he made the confession, as his crimes were of such magnitude, that he ought not to expect any mercy. The prisoner did not make any defence. The Jury, without any hesitation, returned their verdict—Guilty—Death.

A dreadful instance of ferocity occurred, about a week since, at Stapleton prison, near Bristol. Two Frenchmen having quarrelled, late in the evening were locked up previous to the settlement of the dispute; but in the night one of the parties, with his friend, insisted upon his antagonist's getting out of bed and fighting him immediately; the latter assented. It was determined that they should fight with the two legs of a pair of compasses, which was broken in half, and the points sharpened for the purpose. They rushed upon each other, mutually stabbing, until the aggressor fell lifeless on the ground, having been pierced through the heart and lungs. His friend immediately seized the weapon from the hand of the corpse, insisting that the fight should be renewed with him: it was agreed, and after a horrible rencontre, he shared the same fate as the first. The survivor (who is much wounded, but not very dangerously) was secured as soon as the circumstance was known to the guard, and a Coroner's Inquest sat on the bodies. As it appeared that the two deceased persons were the aggressors in the affair, the Jury brought in a verdict of Manslaughter against the survivor.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

The news we have received from the North is important. Hamburgh Papers to the 11th, and letters from Holland to the 15th, containing intelligence from Paris to the 9th, have come to hand. The most active co-operation is displayed by the Danes in preparations for the invasion of Sweden. The magnitude of the force which is marching against that unhappy country, seems to appal the writers in the foreign journals. Holstein is now filled with French troops: even Rendsberg, the residence of the King of Denmark, is occupied by them. The force under BERNADOTTE will, it is said, amount to 70,000 men; and the invasion of Sweden is expected to take place at four or five different points. No hope of salvation seems to be entertained for Sweden, except in extraordinary assistance from Great Britain. It is stated, that in this extremity, the King of SWEDEN has made proposals for Peace, and has offered to guarantee the neutrality of the Baltic; or even, according to some accounts, to engage for the exclusion of English ships from the Baltic; but on the other hand, if his terms are refused, that he has threatened every kind of devastation which a British fleet can effectuate, on the shores of the Baltic.

This melancholy prospect receives but too strong confirmation from the facts which have transpired from official quarters at home. Dispatches were received on Friday at the Office of the Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, from our Minister at the Court of Sweden. Their contents have not been fully disclosed, but it has not been concealed that they gave intimation of the commencement of efforts, on the part of his SWEDISH MAJESTY, to avert the ruin which threatens him, by acceding to terms of Peace. In the meantime, the preparations for the Baltic Expedition, which were so triumphantly and ostentatiously begun seem to be suspended. All the talk about the embarkation of troops is at an end. It is even estimated, at last, by the Ministerial Journals, that the defence of Sweden appearing to be a hopeless task, the expedition prepared for that purpose will now be sent upon another destination; and that a squadron of ships of war will alone be sent to the Baltic. We shall hereafter be informed of what utility they can be, after Sweden is at the mercy of our enemies. Our Ministers boasted that they had provided for the security of Sweden, by seizing the Danish fleet! Men of sense laughed at the time: experience will at last bring all men to the same mode of thinking.

Yesterday morning we received Boston Papers to the 29th of January inclusive. The embargo, which had been previously laid by the American Government, anticipated the effects of our Orders in Council, and prevented the people or merchants from experiencing any new calamity. There is but little outcry, therefore, in the Newspapers; and we are yet to learn what decision will be formed upon the subject by the Government. The Americans appear to be enduring so impatiently the embargo, that it is not probable it will be long persevered in, which will render the question about the Orders in Council more urgent and interesting. Some private letters have been received, which anticipate an easy adjustment of the differences between the two countries; but though we do not apprehend that they will terminate in war, we wish we saw a greater probability of an easy adjustment. The following are the principal articles of intelligence which the papers afford:—

"WASHINGTON, JAN. 17.

"Yesterday the British Envoy Extraordinary (Mr. Rose), was formally introduced to Mr. Jefferson, by the Secretary of State. As this was mere matter of ceremony, nothing material transpired.—This day Mr. Rose, accompanied by Mr. Erskine, waited on Mr. Clinton, Vice-President, and several other officers of Government.

"This place is extremely prolific in reports.—Among those of to-day is the following, which I by no means intend you should believe, though it is certainly not very far removed from probability: It is said that M. Turreau has openly expressed his disapprobation at our Government condescending to receive Mr. Rose, and that if he is continued to be recognised as British Envoy, he will demand his pasports."

"CHARLESTON, JAN. 20.

"EMBARGO.—What the effects of this Act will be abroad we are to learn hereafter, but those which it is producing at home we begin to feel pretty sharply; rice, which some weeks since sold briskly at 3 dollars 50 cents. is now nominally but one dollar 75 cents. Black seep cotton has fallen from 34 cents. to 22 or 25, and no sale; and corn down to 56 cents.

"The North Carolina Price Current says Flour is down to two dollars twenty-five cents. the barrel; and Tobacco to two dollars fifty cents. the hundred weight. Such is the beginning of the embargo measure; but what will be the end?"

"Jan. 13.—For several days past there has been no business of consequence before the House, except passing the following Resolutions:—

"That it is expedient to increase the military establishment by raising regiments of Infantry, Artillerists, Riflemen, and Cavalry.

"That it is expedient to augment the Marine Corps.

"And that it is expedient to authorize the President to employ on board the gun-boats as many seamen as the public service may require.

"The Senate has been on Executive business, probably to confirm the nomination of a Negociator to confer with Mr. Rose. Mr. Madison, it is expected, will be the man, and that the negociation will commence immediately.

"BOSTON, JAN. 21.

"GENERAL MOREAU.—Considerable conversation was afloat yesterday, on the subject of some newly discovered conspiracy, in which General Moreau was said to be implicated. On what foundation it rests we know not, unless the following article from a New York paper, of January 21, furnishes the authority:—

"It was reported yesterday, that the dispatches from the French Minister here to Bonaparte, which were intercepted in an American vessel, by a cruizer, and laid before the British Government, were afterwards submitted to the inspection of Mr. Monroe, before his departure from England. These dispatches are said to criminate General Moreau; and on Mr. Monroe's communicating their contents to the President, orders were given to arrest the General, if he could be taken within the United States."

It is stated in an article from Paris, inserted in the Hamburgh Correspondenten, that the Rochefort Squadron, together with the Spanish Squadron, from Carthagena, had entered the harbour of Toulon, and being there joined by the Toulon Fleet, had sailed from thence on the 7th or 8th of February, standing for Sicily. No intelligence has been received in this Country from the Mediterranean, by which we can judge of this statement. It is at last neither impossible nor improbable, but at the same time the intelligence is not of such a description, as to entitle it to implicit belief. The Moniteur is not quoted for it by the Correspondenten, and we may, perhaps, with some confidence conclude, that were such information very authentic, the Moniteur would not be the last Paris paper to give it publicity. The amount of this Combined Fleet is stated at thirty sail of the line, besides frigates, sloops, transports, &c.; though, from what is understood of the strength of the different squadrons, it cannot exceed twenty-two sail of the line.—The British force, under Sir R. STRACHAN, Lord COLLINGWOOD, and Admiral THORNBOROUGH, amounts to twenty-one sail of the line, for the result of a contest with which, and the combined fleet of the enemy, we should have no anxiety. But from the separate and distant courses which each of those Commanders is understood to have taken, we fear there is little chance of their effecting a junction, before the enemy will have accomplished his purpose of landing an army in Sicily.

His MAJESTY remained in Windsor Castle yesterday, engaged in the morning on military business.

The American Ambassador had a long interview yesterday with Mr. Canning, as had also the Swedish Ambassador.

Letters from Stralsund, of February 28, state, that Baron Dannfeldt, first Aid-du-Camp of the King of Sweden, who arrived there with dispatches from his Swedish Majesty, is gone to Paris. All correspondence with England and Sweden has been prohibited in the Duchy of Mecklenburg.

The letters from Amsterdam state, that the Government had directed a fresh contribution of 100,000,000 of francs to be levied upon the people of Holland, of which sum Amsterdam was to furnish one fourth, Rotterdam one tenth, and all the other towns in the usual proportion.—Bonaparte is reported to have set out for Spain and Portugal.

From Paris it is stated, that Bonaparte has determined to seize upon all the public treasures in Spain, and even the church plate throughout that kingdom, the amount of which is to be forwarded to Paris. It is added, that the produce of this plunder is intended chiefly as a loan to the Emperor of Russia, for the purpose, probably, of enabling him to send an army to the Caspian Sea; but, according to one of the letters, (we copy verbatim,) "of "securing fidelity to the compact lately entered into be- "tween Russia and France, and of enabling Alexander to "carry on the war without calling upon the discontented "subjects for a new supply."

Bonaparte, dissatisfied at the conduct of the Pope, has ordered the Nuncio, who resided in Paris, to quit France.

The Vienna Court-Gazette, of the 2d inst. states, that the Russian army in Moldavia and Wallachia has been considerably reinforced. It also contains the following article:—"The British squadrons, which are now cruizing in the Archipelago, and in the Ionian and Adriatic seas, take all Greek and Turkish vessels, and sink their cargoes. The Seven Islands are closely blockaded, and the scarcity and want of provisions are said to be very great in Corfu and Cerigo."

Fashion, ever varying, is at last coming to some decision in the choice of head-dresses. All the elegantes of London are seen in crowds at Millard's Straw Hat Manufactory, at the corner of Southampton-street, Strand, viewing the Shepherdess Hat, and an original model for a new Straw Bonnet, which will be the only summer head-dress that will be worn by ladies of rank and distinction.

THE THEATRE.

COVENT GARDEN.

ON THE CHARACTER OF RICHARD THE THIRD, AND ON MR. COOKE'S REPRESENTATION OF IT.

On Monday evening Mr. Cooke performed the character of Gloucester, in Shakespeare's King Richard the Third. It was in Richard that he originally stamped his reputation with the public; and he is still as popular in the representation of this tragic hero, as even in his admirable performance of Sir Pertinax Macsycophant, The Man of the World.

But the popularity of an actor is frequently as little deserved as the popularity of a statesman or of a beauty: accident often begins, and fashion continues it. It therefore becomes the business of those who undertake the duties of public admonition, to investigate with accuracy the claims of all who possess or seek the favour of the world: in order that some records at least may subsist, which shall prove to another generation that fashion even when general was not absolute among us—and which, like sea-marks, shall serve, when the flood has retired, to designate the boundaries appointed by nature.

The part of Gloucester, afterwards Richard the Third, is one which almost all actors in the first walk of tragedy have endeavoured to represent: and it appears to have been one in which but few of them have succeeded. The play, as it is now acted, may almost be considered a monodrame: and perhaps it is the singular prominence of Richard's character that has tempted so many men to essay its personation. But this projection from the canvas may be as dangerous for a performer of ordinary endowments, as it is glorious for an actor of powerful genius; for all here depends on the exertions of one individual. The play has no relief, from comic interspersions, or from contrasts of character—Richard is the only portrait whose outlines are filled up, the only figure on whom the eye is permitted to dwell. Nor has Shakspeare diversified the disposition of his hero with any of those softer emotions which allow to the actor an interval of relaxation; so that he who undertakes to play Richard the Third, must brace his nerves to the highest tension, and having once brought himself to the requisite pitch, must immoveably

"Screw his courage to the sticking place."

The subordinate characters are all thrown back at too great a distance to assist the efforts of the principal actor, or diminish the effect of his failure. He ventures on a wide water: if his strength will enable him to swim across it, he indeed will attain the desired shore: but if his powers are too weak to bear him over by one uninterrupted exertion, he must sink, without hope, because his comrades are remote, and without pity, because his danger has been voluntary.

But, however, the ambition of actors may have induced them to delight in performing King Richard, it is difficult, at a first view to perceive upon what principle the people have delighted in witnessing those performances. A little consideration will enable us to discover the springs of intellectual satisfaction that have been touched by Shakespeare in the play of which we are speaking: and the subject is very well worthy of attention, as affording a study of the human mind, and an exercise for those whose theatrical taste may induce them to investigate the metaphysics of some more of Shakespeare's heroes: since the same general principles, under different modifications, may be applied to the characters of Macbeth, Iago, and several other conspicuous persons of the drama.

It is not our business here, to consider how far Shakespeare may have agreed with historical truth in delineating his Richard the Third; for even if Lord Orford's ingenious defence of that Prince be admitted as conclusive, the duty of an actor will still be to represent the Richard of Shakespeare, not the Richard of old Chronicles—and the duty of a critic will therefore be to inquire why Shakespeare's Richard has afforded pleasure in representation, not how Shakespeare might have modelled a Richard from history.

The pleasure experienced in the representation of this play certainly does not arise from its plot and incidents. For the plot in general, like that of Shakespeare's other plays of the same class, is rather a history in dialogue than a dramatic fable: and the individual incidents, though they most of them tend to the elevation, or prepare the downfall, of the principal character, yet by no means possess that mutual dependence, connection, and climax, which are necessary for giving powerful interest to a play. As to the poetry, however beautiful it may be, every novice in a Theatre is well aware that fine writing alone will never make a tragedy popular in England: so that the pleasure that is felt at the performance of this piece must result from character and situation. The situations are not numerous, but they are generally well adapted to the developement of character: and what is the nature of the gratification here produced by character, we will therefore proceed to consider.

From a mere delineation of atrocious vice, no sort of pleasure arises to the spectator: disgust and horror alone pervade his mind: and when a personage of unmixed evil is represented on the stage, the pleasure experienced by the audience at the play in which such a personage is found (as far as their pleasure proceeds from the portraiture of character) is usually produced by the striking contrast of some good and injured being. Then the disagreeable emotions occasioned by vice are converted into a pleasing sensation by the opposition of virtue: and the shadows which, if unrelieved, would have struck a frightful gloom upon our vision, become beautiful by an artful juxtaposition of light. But in the play of Richard the Third there is no character that forms a contrast with the bloody villainy of Gloucester—several of the subordinate parts are now completely omitted on the stage—and among those that remain it is difficult to find one which strongly excites or prolongs our sympathy. A scene is introduced from the third part of King Henry the Sixth, probably for the purpose of producing an interest: but nobody cares about the murder of Henry, or the sorrows of Lady Anne. For Buckingham and Stanley there is little anxiety: and King Edward's widow with her children, and the Royal Duchess of York, are heard without much solicitude. Richmond himself, who may perhaps be called the hero of the piece, is not introduced till the fifth act: and then he is seen in so general and indefinite a character, that if he carry the audience along with him he pleases, not by his own intrinsic merits, but the circumstance of his contention with Richard.

In this single character of Richard, then, and in the situations that display him, the whole charm of this tragedy appears to consist; and yet in this character deformity of person is added to every vice that can disgrace the human heart; and there must be something in the portrait which goes beyond the mere delineation of vice, or the unmixed evil of the object represented would necessarily revolt, instead of pleasing us. But as that something cannot consist in any moral virtue, it is to be sought in an intellectual merit; and thus, after an analysis of our own sensations, it appears, that when we feel a pleasure in contemplating the character of Richard, this pleasure must arise chiefly from our admiration of his extraordinary talents and undaunted courage: qualities which have something in them so commanding, and so awful, that he who possesses them can never inspire us with disgust or contempt, however he may fill us with indignation. We have said, that our pleasure must arise chiefly from our admiration of his intellectual qualities; because, through four acts of the tragedy, there is no other feeling that takes decided possession of our minds; but, in the fifth act, we have a new source of gratification, in the prospect of that punishment, which, throughout the whole play, we have longed to see the usurper undergo. His courage and his wisdom, rising with the danger of his situation, render the event of the play still doubtful, and the ultimate satisfaction of our indignant justice affords an agreeable reflection when the curtain has fallen.

If such be the character, and such the causes which give effect to the character, of Richard the Third, an actor who plays this part should not only display the atrocity of the usurper's disposition, but also, in order to satisfy persons of good taste, give the greatest possible force to the qualities calculated to produce pleasant impressions, and exhibit, to the utmost advantage, the wisdom and gallantry with which Shakspeare has invested his hero.

But Mr. Cooke acts only one portion of Richard's character—namely, the deep malignity which appears, when reserve does not happen to be necessary. All that hypocritical villany, which should look like virtue, all that flattering falshood which should pass for attachment, are so broadly depicted by him, that it is impossible to fancy anybody could be deceived, with so palpable a cheat. The real excellencies, too, which exist in the mind of Richard are so coarsely described by the face and gesture of this actor, that the politician's prudence seems wretched cunning, the dignity of the prince appears the arrogance of an upstart, and the courage of the warrior has the air of awkward desperation. In fact, Mr. Cooke has not been calculated, by nature, for heroic expression: his conceptions are not lofty, and even if they were, his face, his figure, and his deportment, would be inadequate to give them due effect.

We shall conclude this article by pointing out two or three passages as examples of Mr. Cooke's deficiencies, and by recording those instances in which he appeared to us to be most successful. We have said that his hypocrisy was too palpable: and this opinion may be proved by one of the very points at which he gains the greatest applause from the undiscerning part of the audience. Richard being accosted by a Lieutenant, answers him sharply; but on hearing the officer's errand, is anxious to treat him with civility:

"Lieut. My Lord, I beg your grace—
"Glost. Begone, fellow! I am not at leisure.
"Lieut. My Lord, the king your brother's taken ill.
"Glost. I'll wait on him: leave me, friend."

In delivering these last words Mr. Cooke's manner becomes, not civil, but servile; and a Lieutenant, to whom the Duke of Gloucester, after so rude a commencement, should have made a low bow and assumed an humble tone, must have either imagined his Grace to be mocking, or discovered him to be cheating.

In the same manner throughout the scene with Lady Anne, Mr. Cooke's humility has the effect of a sneer. It is impossible, that even that weak woman could have been deceived by eyes so awkwardly disguised. And the whole manner of his suit is totally devoid of that tenderness which is so necessary for success among women, and which one expects from a man who has "A tongue shall wheedle with the devil."

There is a beautiful soliloquy in the third act, concluding thus:

"Why then shall after ages think my deeds
"Inhuman? since my worst are but ambition.
"Ev'n all mankind to some lov'd ills incline:
"Great men choose greater sins, ambition's mine."

This Mr. Cooke delivers with such an unfortunate littleness, that he makes the last line actually seem a satire on his own conception.

The same want of grandeur, indeed, is apparent through his whole performance, and most particularly in the last act; where the greater passions and the greater powers of Richard's mind are all called forth.

The lines to which he gives the greatest effect are these:

Richard (proposing to Buckingham the murder of the Princes.)
"Cousin, thou wert not wont to be so dull.
"Shall I be plain? I wish the bastards dead,
"And I would have it suddenly performed—
"Now, cousin, can'st thou answer me?

Richard, (answering Buckingham, who requests the performance of a promise) I'm busy—thou troublest me—I'm not i'th' vein.

Richard.—I can smile, and murder while I smile.

All these passages, and particularly the last, are conceived and uttered in the true spirit of a great actor. There are some others for which Mr. Cooke deserves commendation; but these exhibit the strongest marks of his genius.

Upon the whole then we conceive, that the talents of Mr. Cooke, powerful as they unquestionably are, do not adapt him for the performance of King Richard the Third. The praise we have bestowed on his Macsycophant does not preclude us from disapproving his Gloster; for we have felt too much pleasure from his merits, to be insensible to his defects.

A dance called The Highland Laddie, was produced a few nights ago, and has since been several times repeated between the play and farce; but we have not discovered in it anything worthy of particular praise.

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF CHANCERY, LINCOLN'S INN HALL,

SATURDAY, MARCH 19.

OPERA DISPUTES.

At the opening of the Court, it was stated to the Lord Chancellor by Mr. Waters's Counsel, that certain propositions had been made to Mr. Taylor for the accomplishment of a mutual agreement between the parties since last Tuesday; and it would be necessary for his Lordship to peruse a copy before he pronounced judgment. The Lord Chancellor observed that he would receive the papers as he did not intend to give his final judgment until Monday, when he would first hear whether the parties were about to harmonize their disputes.

The person of the name of Howard, who represents himself as being the legal owner of a part of the Duke of Norfolk's estates, in Surry, again attempted to address the Lord Chancellor, as he said, on behalf his rights: but his Lordship peremptorily refused to have the business of the Court interrupted, and observed to the intruder, that Mr. Milne had undertaken to investigate his claims.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The complaints, which have been some time made, on account of the unprotected state of our merchantmen in the North, will, we trust, be speedily removed. The following letter warrants this hope:—

"Admiralty, March 17, 1808.

"I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 16th instant, acquainting me that the owners of the ships and cargoes, as also the underwriters of the ships detained at Carlshamn and Carlscrona, wish to be informed, if any of his Majesty's ships of war have orders to afford them relief. Captain PARKER, of the Stately, and Senior Officer of his Majesty's ships at Gottenburg, has under his orders three sail of the line, a frigate, and small vessels. He sailed from Yarmouth on the 11th of January, and has directions, dated the 2nd of that month, to afford them every relief and protection which the season and the state of the Baltic will allow. Captain PARKER has stated his intention to proceed in the execution of his orders the moment the navigation from Gottenburg shall be open.

(Signed) "MULGRAVE."

"To THOMAS MIDDLETON, Esq.

LOSS OF HIS MAJESTY'S SHIP FLORA.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM AN OFFICER.

"Lieuwarden in Friesland, Jan 26, 1808.

"I am sorry to inform you that the Flora struck upon Schelling Reef last Monday, the 18th, and about nine o'clock that night succeeded in getting her off, but lost our rudder in the attempt, and after getting her to sea, we could hardly keep her free with all the pumps, therefore was obliged the next day to run her on shore again about four o'clock that afternoon; after making rafts, fearing that if it came on to blow that night, she would go to pieces, the Captain, Furber, Keith, Doneville, Watson, and myself, pushed off in the barge, that being the only boat we then had, with about 130 of the crew on the rafts, the rest choosing to stay by the ship, when after rowing eighteen hours, we did not know where, not being able to see the land, without sustenance, we landed on the Island of Amoland, where they made us prisoners and marched us here. After being four days and nights on board, the rest came on shore on some more rafts, and I believe all are saved. I have lost every thing, as when I left the ship, though my bag was in my hand, I would not put it into the boat, as the Captain would not his, nor indeed was it a time to think about any thing but one's life. Those whom we left on the wreck are at Harlingen."

POLICE.

BOW-STREET.—About five years since, a letter was put into the Post-office, at Brentwood, in Essex, with a 50*l.* Bank Note in it, which did not come to hand as directed. Information was in consequence given, at the Post Office, in London, and at the Bank; but it was not paid into the Bank till about three days since, when information was given at the Post-office, and Mr. Parkin, the Solicitor, employed Anthony to trace the note. The officer, after considerable exertion, traced it to the wife of a Serjeant Dew, of the Prince of Wales's Regiment of Light Dragoons, quartered at Malden. On the Officer questioning her, as to how she became possessed of the note? she very readily said she had it of her mother, who gave it her to purchase a bed with, previous to her being married, and she returned her the change. The officer, on tracing out her mother discovered her to be the wife of the Postmaster of Brentwood, at the time the note was stolen, upon which Anthony took her into custody. She was, on Thursday evening, examined before Mr. Read, and committed for trial. The old woman, in her defence, said, she took the note of a man, genteely dressed, in her shop, for goods.

THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

Our King, Constitution, and Laws.

No. 13. SUNDAY, MARCH 27, 1808. PRICE 8d.

The Proprietors of THE NATIONAL REGISTER have distributed GRATIS with the last Number of that Paper the Forty Columns of GENERAL WHITELOCKE'S TRIAL, which was all they promised in their Advertisements. However, for the Completion of that Trial another Sheet will be requisite, which the Proprietors intended to distribute GRATIS also with the next Number. But, the Stamp-Office having unexpectedly sent them Notice that the Trial must be subjected to the Newspaper Duty, it will be necessary to request of the Public the Stamp Duty of Threepence Halfpenny upon the SECOND PART. No sum except this Stamp Duty will, however, be charged: and as the Proprietors have been Assessed by the Stamp-Office, for the First Part, for which no Charge HAS been made upon the Public, it is hoped that no Subscriber will think it unreasonable to pay the trifling Duty for the remainder.

The Proprietors will be rewarded for the vast expences incurred, which must fall solely on themselves, if they shall find that the specimens of THE NATIONAL REGISTER already presented have afforded so much Instruction and Amusement, as to convince the Public that the Paper deserves a continuance of that great circulation which it obtained on Sunday last.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

ON SECURING THE RIGHTS OF THE CONSTITUTION TO THE OFFICERS OF THE ARMY.

On the third reading of the Annual Mutiny Bill, Sir FRANCIS BURDETT moved to introduce the following clause:

"That no Officer in the Army shall be dismissed or deprived of his Pay, otherwise than by the Sentence of a Court-Martial, or by Address of either House of Parliament."

This clause was opposed by Members both of the present and of the late Administration, and the Mover withdrew it, in order to make it the single subject of a future Bill.

As friends to the Constitution of our Country, we confess ourselves to be among the number of those, who ardently desire such a law. We shall state to our readers the reasons for it, and the objections against it; though the objections, in our eyes, appear so weak, as to look more like contrasts than like obstacles to the reasons in its favour.

The King has now an absolute power over the rank, over the professional income, and, virtually, over the character of every officer in the British Army. This power was originally acknowledged in the Crown, at a time when the numbers of the Army were so small as to be scarcely worthy of notice: but the exception to the great principles of the constitution, which forbid the arbitrary disposal of any man's fortune and character, has now been so vastly extended, that it has risen to bear no insignificant proportion to the rule itself. Still it retains its inherent nature, and is, properly, only an exception; for, even what is called martial law (which, though emanating from the Crown, and depending upon it, is much more favourable to liberty, than the immediate power of the individual Sovereign) is, as that great lawyer Sir Matthew Hale has declared, in truth and in reality no law, but something indulged, rather than allowed as a law.

Let it not be said, then, that in seconding a limitation of the King's Military Power, we are trenching on the Prerogative of the Crown; for nothing foreign to the Constitution can be a branch of the Prerogative, since the Prerogative itself exists but as a branch of the Constitution.

Charles the Second kept up, in this kingdom, a petty force of about five thousand men. In the reign of George the Third, the support of a great Army, (which has increased, and, if the plans of Ministers succeed, is likely to increase still further), has been deemed necessary for the defence of the State. But it is not necessary, that a force created to defend the State in general, be thrown into the hands of one single Member of the State: for that which was intended to protect us from our enemies abroad, may otherwise be, at some period, directed to the destruction of our liberties at home. His present Majesty, it is true, is not likely to take any such wicked measure: but if every King were to be wise and moderate, there would be no use for any Constitution at all, and the reason why our Constitution is so transcendently admirable, is because it has, in most instances, guarded so effectually against the encroachment of any branch of the Legislature. If, then, it be necessary (and we fear it is necessary) to keep up a large standing Army in the Country, it is surely expedient to dispose of the individuals, constituting that army, so as not to add too great a force to any power in the State.

It is urged that the Crown, which has constitutionally the prerogative of making wars, must have constitutionally the prerogative of appointing the Officers who shall be employed in those wars. But it ought not to follow, that the Crown shall, therefore, have the power of displacing its Officers without their trial or even crime: for these Officers having once been appointed by the King, become the servants of the country, and no cause but an offence against the country, and that too an offence fairly proved, ought to avail in depriving any man of his profession, his subsistence, and his honour. The twelve Judges are appointed by the King; but the twelve Judges are not removeable at the King's pleasure. The power of the King should be rather the power of reward than of punishment; in our constitution his actual authority is, as it ought to be, very small: but his influence is, as it ought to be, extensive. The power of granting Commissions is a power of influence: gratitude for the past may create an attachment, and hope for the future may perpetuate a devotion to the Crown: but the power of dismissal and deprivation is a power of authority; uncongenial with the gentle attributes of Majesty, discordant from the principles of the British Constitution, and invidious to men of so liberal a profession, who always act or should always be supposed to act, from the inspiring motives of honour and hope, rather than from the mean operation of servility and fear.

Under the present regulations of the army, no officer can be safe: his honour, which is his whole support, may be whispered away in a dark corner: envy, treachery, and falsehood may supplant him with the military advisers of his King: and his King, who can view him only with the eyes of these advisers, may sentence him, on such misrepresentation, to beggary and disgrace. The best monarch cannot help misusing such a power sometimes: what must that power be, if it fall into the hands of a bad King? It is said by Ministers, that no misapplication has in fact occurred as yet: that is to say, the public in general know no striking instances of such a misapplication. We firmly believe that his present Majesty would never knowingly misapply such a power: but, unknowingly, it is almost impossible for fallible humanity to avoid an occasional misapplication of it—and why should we leave a possibility for such an event?

But while we are desirous of restraining the arbitrary power of the Crown, because we conceive that it is not constitutional: we are eager to confirm to the Crown the prerogative of distributing justice, because to that prerogative the constitution has entitled it. Let the King be the fountain of military as well as of civil law; but let the law be in all cases open and certain; let the immediate cognizance of offences be in all cases delegated by the Crown to a competent tribunal. The civil law of this country is lodged by the Legislature in the King: from him it emanates, and is distributed by his Judges, according to the decisions of fact that are given by juries of his people. The Military Law does not so constitutionally come into the hands of the King, because the Lords and Commons have nothing to do in its ordination: but the defects in its origin would be greatly remedied by a regular course in its distribution. If the King is still to frame the articles of war, to create the crime and to create the punishment, at least let these articles be applied by a Court-Martial. Then the Officer tried will be tried according to a public code, and not according to a private caprice: then his country will know his conduct, and if injustice should deprive him of his commission, public opinion will never deprive him of his character. Courts-Martial are Courts of Honour: in their nature they will not require the same proofs that are demanded in the Old Bailey: their members will still have a great discretionary power: but the Judges of an Officer will then be his Peers, as the constitution directs. These are the Courts in which points of too delicate, subtle, and evanescent a nature for the grosser perception of the common law may be advantageously tried; and the exception to the principles of the constitution may be tolerated in consideration of its advantages. And when it is remembered, that the members of a Court-Martial are not bound, like a Jury, to be unanimous in their sentence, and how many offences may be comprized in the sweeping charge of ungentlemanlike conduct, no latitude of impunity can be apprehended from the universality of such a mode of trial. At present, the just and the unjust, all equally suffer. The causes of dismissal are not made public, and he who loses his commission for the most scandalous fault, is in no worse condition than he who may have been degraded by caprice or mistake, and who, if he had been tried by a Court-Martial, might perhaps have procured himself an honourable acquittal. In all cases, where it becomes necessary to dismiss an Officer, and where it would nevertheless be hard to expose him by a Court-Martial, a resignation may be properly accepted.

There is one answer which we foresee will be made to all we have said, namely, "that officers are not unfairly "treated by the existing laws, because they know on en- "tering the army the exact nature of the risk they incur; "and may be considered in the light of all other persons "holding places at will."

But our arguments have been directed to the injury sustained by the constitution rather than to that sustained by individuals; and at any rate, if it be adviseable to increase our army and encourage its officers, it must surely be unwise to place officers of the army in a worse condition than the rest of his Majesty's subjects. And as to considering officers as tenants at will of their commissions, that is the very idea which we combat; for it is not, and it cannot be, the principle or policy of the British constitution, to entrust the crown with this immense mass of revocable gifts, or, in other words to place in the power of the King a force that may be employed for the overthrow of the state.

In every instance where an officer's conduct shall be called in question by an address from either House of Parliament, it is to be hoped that a Court Martial will be necessary for the ultimate disposal of his case: for the example of Lord Melville has proved that the sentence of a lawful tribunal may differ from that of a Parliamentary majority.

On this important question we hope to find the sense of the country on our side. Let the hand of the King grant favours, but let it not be extended for the purposes of deprivation. The parent gives life to his child; but heaven has not empowered him to take that life away. The King can distribute the blessings of the State: but the State has not authorized him to annul them.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XIII.

THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

The flippancy with which some of the modern journalists discuss the vital interests of the country and constitution, cannot but disgust those persons who love order and sound principle, and who delight to see the means proportioned to the end. In our Political Disquisitions we therefore intend to sustain unvaryingly a tone of manly yet moderate argument: and, as truth is the only object of those discussions, the sophistries of misconstruction, and the antitheses of wit, must be totally unnecessary in conducting them. But the reverence that we entertain for the principles of British Government does not extend itself to everybody who chooses to busy himself about them; and we profess to feel no respect towards the crowd who declaim, for the purposes of fame or of profit, either by words or on paper, whether in or out of Parliament—intellectual pugilists, who contend upon the stage of politics as a show—bustling people, who make the constitution a foot-ball, and kick it North or South to keep themselves warm. Therefore, in our Review of Political Declaimers, where entertainment is necessary as well as truth, we shall vary our exposures of vice and folly, misrepresentation and inconsistency, selfishness and ignorance, by occasionally introducing some articles of a gayer and more satirical kind: articles which may have an operation, where our more serious Reviews cannot be brought to bear; and which, like light vessels, may pursue the enemy into that shallow water, where first-rate ships would not find depth enough to swim.

Without much more preface, therefore, we shall add a letter from a fashionable wit in London to his friend, a young man of family, who lives in the country. We have several of these letters by us, and the Hon. Mr. ——— has promised copies of his future epistles to a gentleman who will favour us with all that are not of a private nature. The first is, however, of a more serious cast than most of those which follow it.—

Digitized by Google

"DEAR R——,

"Your last letter to me contains so much important intelligence with regard to your views in life, and so many interrogatories upon a thousand great matters, that I really am at a loss to answer it satisfactorily, either to you or to myself. Twenty epistles would hardly suffice to give you the information you ask for, and how can I do it in one? But if you will be contented to take a letter from me once in a few days, as I can snatch time to write, I will try to answer your demands.

"Newspapers, as you very justly observe, give no idea at all, or at least a very erroneous one, concerning the nature and habits of our constitution, of its members, and of its jobbers: and as you are likely to pass many years in the country, you desire me to tell you something about the state of affairs in the Houses of Parliament, in order that when you shall succeed to your father's peerage you may have some notions of the characters and customs of your colleagues and associates.

"People who, like you, have spent all their lives in the simplicity of the country, are apt, when they first come to town, and pay a visit to the Houses of Parliament, to expect a great deal that shall strike them with reverence and awe.

"Your plain man, just imported from the fields, walks into the House of Lords, as he would into St. Pauls; and instead of the grave instruction that he hopes to hear in the Cathedral or the Senate, he finds in both alike a few boys trying to out-squall each other, and a few old women sitting patiently to listen to them. He expected in the highest public council of the nation, to have beheld senators decked in all the majesty of hereditary honour—and he sees a few careless loungers, with boots and horsewhips, scattered among cheerless benches. He fancied himself about to catch the gathered wisdom of centuries, diffusing itself in unaffected eloquence from the mouths of sages—he hears a few angry partisans broaching new notions on the immutable principles of nature, exposing sometimes their ignorance, sometimes their incapacity, and sometimes only their spite; and if at last by any accident, amid the quarrels of place hunters, and the mutual recriminations of past and present ministers, he hears one or two noble lords connecting candour and moderation with natural good sense, he wonders how they chanced to resist the established mischief, and rather regrets the rule than hails the exception!

"Here, as in the House of Commons, the art of making speeches constitutes a great part of the art of politics; but as this particular branch of the art of politics, is not carried to such perfection in the House of Lords as in the House of Commons, I shall not let you into its arcana, till I give you an account of the Declaimers among those who represent the people. Perhaps you will wonder why it happens that the Commons have more good speakers, even in proportion to their numbers, than the Right Honourables of the Upper House. The reason, my dear R—, seems to me to be this: Men are often put into the House of Commons for their talents, and the thing is a matter of selection; but in the Upper House there is no choice as to talent, for the whole is a matter of birth. If a nobleman happens to be born clever, very well—if not, he still has his seat. Now as the Peers do not amount, in number, to above three or four hundred, all of whom have seats, while the Commons can select their six or seven hundred members from among millions, it is not likely that there should be so great a proportion of men of genius among the unselected three or four hundred Lords, as among the six or seven hundred selected Commons. In short a seat in the House of Commons is the consequence of talent: but talent is not the consequence of a seat in the House of Lords. Their cleverest men are called up from the Lower House; and even these, after their political transplantation, for the most part follow the order that nature has established in the physical world, and cease to flourish when they leave their parent soil.

"But though the Peers in general cannot declaim so plausibly as the representatives of the People, yet many of them do declaim, and that behind the scenes, as well as before the curtain. Perhaps to you, who have been bred in retirement, and are blest with a father, the drummer of the Peerage, it may seem strange that a man who holds a high hereditary distinction among a people that value themselves upon their national honour, can ever condescend to make himself the tool of a party, or the slave of a Court. You would be apt to think that his pride would exempt him from the wish of private intrigue, and that his rank and property would place him above the temptation of fortune or of favour. No such thing. Desire increases with acquisition; and those who have fewest real wants have always the greatest number of wants in imagination. He who has already competence is eager to gain wealth; he who possesses wealth sighs for honours; he who enjoys both affluence and dignities, having no more real objects to pursue, creates to himself ideal pleasures in a ribband, a garter, or a star; and sells his country, if not for a fortune which he does not want, yet perhaps for the colonelcy of a regiment which he cannot command, or a bow from the Ministers who despise him while they smile. To win such baubles, often has a Peer in private influenced his powerful friends against the honest well-wishers of the King and Country! then, when the petty prize is once possessed, the devilish compact is religiously observed, and he who has privately betrayed his country for his profit, now publicly deceives her for his fame.

"The application of this statement, dear R—, is undoubtedly by no means universal; but the arts that I have described have been practised by thousands. Some have practised them with a thorough and shameless consciousness of their own villainy; and others have deceived their minds with the shadows of better motives. But whether the guilt proceed from bold or weak error, the country equally suffers; and you, who will be one of the country's legislators, ought to be informed of the worst.

"So much for political declaimers among the Peers. Yours truly, C."

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CONDUCT OF GENERAL WHITELOCKE.

So voluminous is the evidence on this trial, that, after the perusal, the mind has considerable difficulty in distinguishing the leading causes of our miscarriage at Buenos Ayres. The lateness of the season, and the consequent bad weather, engaged our attention as one of the principal obstacles to success—the hostility of the natives is another. And, it is not till after considerable reflexion that we arrive at the true conclusion, namely, that although both of these were serious difficulties, our expedition was strong enough to overcome them,—and that the grand cause of our failure was bad generalship.

Successful objects have been a prominent feature in the character of the greatest commanders, as Hannibal, Condé, Marlborough, Suwartow, and Bonaparte. But in attempting bold enterprizes, those men never forgot to adopt any precaution which could ensure their success. Bonaparte determined to fight the Russians at Austerlitz, but he passed the whole of the foregoing night in anxious preparation. Hannibal ventured to encounter an army twice as numerous as his own at Cannæ, but he had contrived a plan of battle in which the numbers of his enemy were to be of no avail. Nelson attacked the French on the memorable 1st of August, as soon as he could approach them, but he had occupied a great part of his previous cruize in describing to his captains the various ways in which he would fight them, according to the particular situation in which they might be found. Marlborough marched into the heart of Germany to fight a pitched battle at Blenheim) against superior numbers, but he revolved in his mind, during a long march, the measures which were likely to ensure success. Now, the difference between these commanders and General Whitelocke consists in this—that he attempted a difficult enterprise without taking almost any precaution whatever. It was natural to conclude that the troops would find no provisions dressed on their march, yet no camp-kettles were taken with them. It was to be feared that the march would be tedious and fatiguing, and that the ground would be wet, yet we find the troops directed to throw away their blankets in the middle of their march. The total abandonment of the country habitations afforded a clear proof of the hostile mind of the inhabitants, yet an assault is determined on, which was the very mode in which that hostility was likely to be most pernicious to us. The General appears to have taken no advice: He summoned his officers together, not to counsel him, but to receive orders. The only instance, indeed, in which he appears to have followed advice was in the unlucky adoption of Gen. Gower's plan of attack. In this point these two officers seem to be at issue. Gen. Whitelocke writes to Mr. Windham, that his own plan was to encamp to the westward of the town of Buenos Ayres, and to bombard it with the aid of the shipping, but that he was induced to adopt the plan of assault suggested by Gen. Gower. Now, the latter officer, on the other hand, states, that Gen. Whitelocke's plan was nearly similar to his own, the idea of assault having occurred to them both. Whoever may be right as to this matter, it would appear that Whitelocke had been of a different opinion, for we find him, when at Monte Video, averse to the plan of assault, and pointing out to Gen. Craufurd the formidable parapets on the tops of the Spanish houses, and the facility with which the armed inhabitants could defend themselves.

All the witnesses agree, that the 8000 men with which Whitelocke set out from Monte Video were fully adequate to the conquest of Buenos Ayres, and nobody blames the troops. The attempt failed therefore through mismanagement in the General. The badness of the season, and the inveteracy of the natives, were serious obstacles, but both were to be overcome with the means which he possessed. Instead of this, the troops are first placed in a most awkward state on account of the badness of the weather, and, to get them out of this scrape, they are next exposed to all the hostility of the natives. It is singular that none of the Generals should have expressed their disapprobation of the plan of attack at the time it was exhibited to them. They plead that their opinions was not asked, and that they did not consider themselves justified in volunteering them. Now this may do very well for an ordinary question, but it is scarcely a proper apology in so momentous a point. The lives of their troops, and the success of the expedition were at stake—all etiquette should have given way before these vital considerations.

With a similar want of precaution it was omitted to apprize the Generals commanding the columns of attack of the spot where the Commander in Chief was to be found during the day. The consequence was, that scarcely any communication took place, and that Gen. Craufurd ascribes his surrender to this unfortunate circumstance. Now, it was no doubt strange on the part of the General in Chief to omit to mention where he was to be found, but it was no less odd that it never occurred to any of the officers to ask him. If the truth were told, it is likely we should find that the plan of assault was generally approved of. It is a mode of warfare particularly adapted to the spirit of our troops, and this situation was so destitute, that they were naturally impartial to get out of it by the speediest means in their power. Hence it would seem that they resorted to the alternative of an assault, without a due consideration of its danger.

The conclusion which a reflecting mind will draw from this unfortunate expedition is not only that the Commander in Chief should be punished, but that the whole constitution of our army is in need of reform. Can there be a stronger evidence of an efficient head than the selection of an unfit officer for a momentous enterprize. Would Bonaparte have acted thus? Let us reflect then that we have to contend with a most skilful enemy—that our army is, next to our navy, our pillar of safety, and let us seriously undertake the correction of those abuses which impair its energy.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, DUTCH, GERMAN, AND HAMBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MARCH 12.—The Prince Arch-Chancellor has made a report to the Council, of several decrees lately adopted by the Emperor and King.—Among others there is one decree by which the hereditary titles of Prince, Duke, Count, Baron, and Knight, are established. The principal Officers of State are to be raised to the dignity of Princes, and their eldest sons are to be created Dukes; the Ministers, Senators, Councillors of State, &c. are to be Counts and Barons, and the Members of the Legion of Honour are to be Knights. These titles of Nobility are, however, to convey no privileges, nor any exemptions from the operation of the laws.

GERMANY.

HAMBURGH, MARCH 4.—A Division of Spanish Troops are ordered to march to the Isle of Rugen. Grateau's Division is also expected to go to Pomerania. Accounts, to which we can give credit, state the Swedish army to amount to 44,800 men, viz. in Finland, under General Klingspor's command, 17,000; in Scania, under General Toll, 8400; in Gottenburgh and the neighbourhood, under General Vegesack, 8000; and in the Provinces beyond Stockholm, a Corps of about 2700; a Reserve of 5000 in East Gothland, and a second Reserve in the Northern Provinces.

BANKS OF THE ELBE, MARCH 11.—"The conjectures which we have so long formed are realized: the French army, with the permission of the Danish Government, has entered Holstein, to proceed through Zealand, and other Danish islands, against Sweden. On the 5th inst. 1800 French horse entered the city of Altona, preceded by two Hambro' city dragoons, with drawn swords, and they serve them as guides. The men halted on the 6th, when Bernadotte reviewed them and about 10,6000 Spaniards, in a field belonging to the city of Hamburgh, called the Holy Ghost field. The citizens of Altona are allowed a mark a day for the keep of every man, at the expence, it is said, of the Hanse towns. The French have also marched into Holstein, from the side of Lubeck, and by this time the greater part of Holstein, not excepting Rendsbourg, the King of Denmark's residence, is full of French and Spanish troops. All the great and small craft are under orders to take in French and Spanish troops; and at Copenhagen all the gun-boats and merchantmen, with one ship of the line, four large Danish Indiamen, fitted out as frigates, and carrying 36 guns each, besides a number of Danish brigs, cutters, and pilot-boats, manned by French and Danish sailors, are in readiness to carry over the troops. The French will, it is said, attack Sweden in four or five different places; and the troops destined for the expedition are under the command of Bernadotte, and will, it is said, amount to nearly 70,000 men. Bernadotte himself set out at six o'clock on the 8th inst. in the evening, from Hamburgh, for Pinneberg and Rendsbourg. No posts from Holstein or Denmark are now expected, as the French and their Allies will probably stop them till a blow shall have been struck. By all accounts, the French have made great preparations for a descent on Sweden, in the ports of Wismar, Rostock, and Stralsund, and the island of Rugen. It is the general opinion here, that unless a British force speedily arrives, Sweden is lost. The French and Spanish armies, assisted, it is said, by the Danes, will be at Copenhagen, Croonberg, Elsineur, and other parts of Zealand, on or before the 25th or 26th instant."

SWEDEN.

STOCKHOLM, MARCH 1.—We are looking forward here for the breaking out of war. The Russian Minister Von Alopeus was already on the point to take his departure, when the King sent for him, and told him that he had still a last proposal to make; he would pledge his guarantee that no English ship of the line should enter the Baltic, if they would not molest him; if not, he would at any rate form an alliance with England, invade Norway, and bombard one part of the Baltic after another. The Russian Ambassador has sent another Courier with this proposal to Petersburgh.

GRIPSHOLM CASTLE, MARCH 8.—His Royal Majesty yesterday afternoon received a Courier from Lieut.-Gen. Vlercker, with the following Report, dated—

"Head-quarters, Tamatchas, Feb. 20, 1808.

"The enemy having compelled an advanced post (as mentioned in my former Report, of the 25th inst.), to fall back from the frontiers, part of the first brigade, posted near Forsby, under the orders of Col. Gripenberg, whom I ordered to perform the functions of Adjutant-General, was attacked on the 24th, early in the morning, by the enemy, far superior in force, and as his corps was in danger of being surrounded, he was forced, after having made a most gallant resistance, to retreat, closely pursued by the enemy. The second brigade, commanded by Col. Adjutant-Gen. Adlercreutz, Knight, was also attacked on the 25th, near Artalo, and in the night between the 27th and 28th, near Kaknia, by an enemy's corps, greatly superior in numbers; but the enemy was received with the most distinguished valour, and repulsed. The communication between the two brigades being intercepted by the retreat of the corps which had been posted near Forsby, I was obliged to order the second brigade to change its position, by which movement both brigades have come nearer this city. The former by Mensela, and the latter by Lucchus; and the left wing of the second brigade being joined by the regiment of East Bothnia, the whole corps now occupies a more concentrated position. The loss of magazines, as well as that of killed and wounded, is but very trifling on our part. The base and treacherous attempt of the enemy to seduce our men from their attachment to their King and Country, made not the slightest impression on them.

PROCLAMATION OF THE RUSSIAN GENERAL IN CHIEF TO THE SOLDIERS IN FINLAND.

"SOLDIERS—My most gracious Emperor has thought it right for the protection and prosperity of the Fins, to order his troops to enter Finland. It is his Majesty's pleasure that I am to assure you of his most gracious sentiments towards the inhabitants of this country in general, and towards you soldiers in particular; your fate is more to be lamented than that of other Fins, because you are obliged to leave your wives, children, relations, and friends to fight for an unjust cause!—Soldiers! I have my most gracious Sovereign's command to assure you, that such of you as shall lay down their arms, shall be instantly at liberty to join their friends and relations, and besides receive two rubles for a musket, one ruble for a sword, and ten rubles for a horse.—Can there be among you, soldiers, any man who sets so little value on his own happiness and welfare, as not to listen to a proposal so well calculated to procure him a peaceful and happy life, under the protection of my most gracious Emperor?

GOTTENBURGH, MARCH 18.—Twenty Mails for Hamburgh from Elsineur have been returned here this morning. The Danes are fitting out their East and West India ships as men of war. A vessel arrived at Carlscrona from Memel, brings intelligence that Prussia has declared war against Sweden. The Vanguard, of 74 guns, and the Quebec frigate, got into open water yesterday, and it is expected the Stately and Nassau of 64 guns each, will be released to-day, as great exertions are making for that purpose. The Governor of Gottenburgh offered to supply 1000 men to cut away the ice, which is very thick and strong; these ships, it is said, will proceed to the Sound. The King of Sweden has issued a proclamation, forbidding all intercourse with Russia.

MARCH 21.—A Courier has arrived this morning from Stockholm with Dispatches for England. It seems there has been an affair in Finland between the Russians and Swedes, in which the former are said to have lost 4000 men, and the latter 1700; but the Swedes have, however, retreated. This happened near Torneatchee We have not yet received the particulars. An Embargo was laid, last week, in this harbour, upon all Russian, Danish, and Prussian ships.

HELSINGBURGH, MARCH 19.—Yesterday's Courier arrived from Elsineur with accounts of the death of the King of Denmark, which took place suddenly on the 18th of this month. On the 16th the Crown Prince was proclaimed King on the Danish, with the title of "Frederick the VIth;" but there was not the least acclamation nor appearance of joy on the occasion.

Bernadotte had arrived at Copenhagen, and it is said, that [illegible] thousand French Troops had already got over to Zealand, and that more were daily crossing the Belts.

AMERICA.

WASHINGTON, FEB. 10.—The Bill passed to-day by the House of Representatives, the ostensible object of which is to explain the Non-importation Law, is in truth the virtual repeal of that Law. It permits the importation of all articles in vessels of the United States, which left this country prior to the 4th of December last. The embargo was laid on the 22d of that month, and consequently no vessels are now liable to the provisions of the Non-importation Law, except those which left the country between the 14th and 23d December. Thus, in the name and under the pretence of explanation, the boasted measure of Non-importation has silently been done away, provided the Senate agree to the Bill.

FEB. 12.—No particulars transpire of the pending negociation; but to judge from the conversations I have had with many well-informed persons, I continue of opinion that matters will be amicably adjusted. Mr. Madison has been confined to his room for some days, and is to-day very unwell; this will of course retard the negociation; but it is expected that the President will make a communication to Congress in the course of next week, acquainting them of a satisfactory reparation having been made for the affair of the Chesapeake. The President has said, that it cannot be determined until next week, whether Congress may adjourn for two or three months. It has been proposed to adjourn to the middle of March, and convene it again in May. As soon as Mr. Maddison is able to attend business, it is expected that a long Report on our relations with France, will be made to Congress.

FEB. 14.—There is a report that a Treaty has actually been framed between Mr. Rose and our Government. It is also said, that Mr. Nourse, brother to the Register of the Treasury, is to carry this Treaty to England. This latter circumstance, it is supposed, is in consequence of some doubts as to Mr. Rose's powers.

FEB. 17.—Last night Mr. Rose told a Gentleman that he had little hopes of a pacific result. A Cabinet Council has been held, and the language of the Ministerial Members in our House was uncommonly warlike. The opinion of the day is War.

GIBRALTAR.

FEB. 9.—Our Government has received information, that two French frigates are in a small bay in the neighbourhood of Tangiers, waiting for a favourable opportunity to run through.—There are several ships of war upon the look-out for them. It is said here, that part of General Spencer's Expedition is destined to take possession of Ceuta. The advantages of such a possession will be great indeed to this garrison, as well as beneficial to commerce. The greater part of our fresh provisions are obtained from that coast, and in the hands of the English it will be converted into a place of annoyance to the enemy.

The Emperor of Morocco gives his hearty concurrence to the measure, and will afford every assistance in his power to aid the British in the undertaking.

FEB. 23.—The Imperieuse, Lord Cochrane, arrived last night from the eastward, with the intelligence of the Carthagena fleet having sailed on the 10th of this month. The Imperieuse brought in with her a French corvette, of 10 guns, and four Spanish merchant vessels, which she cut out of Almeria a few days before, after a gallant action, in which Lieut. Caulfield, her first Lieutenant, and one man, were killed, with seven wounded. The Imperieuse saw five sail of the line three days ago, off Cape de Gatt, steering this way, supposed to be the Carthagena squadron: the Windsor Castle, Nymphe, Leonidas, with the Minorca and Redwing, put to sea this morning in consequence of the above intelligence.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MARCH 21.

The Royal Assent was given by Commission to Lord Lake's Annuity Bill, the Army and Marine Mutiny Bills, the Sugar Bounty and Drawback Bills, and various other public and private Bills.

Lord Auckland presented a petition from 127 persons, styling themselves Manufacturers and Merchants in Manchester, praying for leave to be heard by Counsel against the orders in Council. His Lordship concluded with moving that the petitioners have leave to be heard by themselves, or Counsel on the subject matter of the prayer of their petition.

Lord Hawkesbury moved an amendment, to the effect that the petitioners should be heard against the Cotton Wool Export Prohibition Bill, and such other matters connected with the Orders in Council, in which they would state a distinct interest.—After some further conversation, in which several Noble Lords repeatedly addressed the House, Lord Hawkesbury moved for leave to withdraw his amendment; but Lord Grenville contending, that this was inconsistent with the orders of the House, after a proceeding had been had upon it, the question was successively put on the two amendments, and on the original motion, all of which was negatived without a division.

Lord Bathurst moved the second reading of the Orders in Council Bill. He briefly stated the grounds on which the measure was adopted.

Lord Erskine opposed the Bill, as being founded on a measure of which neither the legality, justice, or necessity had been proved.

Lord Hawkesbury supported, and Lords King, Lauderdale, and Grenville opposed the Bill. A division took place, and the motion was carried by a majority, Proxies included, of 166 to 59. The Bill was accordingly read a second time, and ordered to be committed.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 22.

The House, in a Committee of Privileges, heard Counsel in support of Sir James Innes's claim to the Roxburgh Peerage.

A long conversation, in which Lords Auckland, Grenville, Hawkesbury, Lauderdale, Harrowby, and the Lord Chancellor took part, occurred, on the subject of the Petitions against the Orders in Council. In consequence of its appearing to be the general sense of the House, that the petitioners should, in some form or other, be heard by Counsel, Lord Buckinghamshire moved, that the House should go into a Committee on the Orders in Council, with the view of affording them an opportunity of being so heard. This proposition was resisted by the Noble Lords in Administration, on the ground of its being the same which had been already twice negatived, and which was now again submitted with due notice. The consequence was, that it was withdrawn by the Noble Mover for the present.

Lord Lauderdale proceeded to discuss the commercial policy of the Orders in Council.—The Noble Lord went over the whole series of arguments, which we have frequently had occasion to detail, to shew, that the pressure of this measure must fall immediately on neutrals, and ultimately with the most ruinous severity upon ourselves. He considered it as tantamount to a declaration of war against America. He concluded with moving a string of Resolutions, comprising the chief topics of his speech.

Lord Raphurst commented on the subject of each Resolution in succession, drawing a conclusion of a direct contrary tendency.

Lords King, Holland, and Auckland, supported the Resolutions, and condemned the Orders in Council, as being inconsistent with the theory and practice of commerce in every age, and in every part of the world.

The House divided, and the Resolutions were negatived by a majority of 36 to 21.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23.

Lord Auckland moved that the Orders in Council should be referred to a Committee, and that the Petitioners should be heard before the Committee by themselves or Counsel.

After a long discussion, and a division, the motion was agreed to, and Counsel ordered to attend at two o'clock on Monday.

The question being then put, that the House should "now" resolve itself into the said Committee, Lord Spencer proposed to substitute "Tuesday next" for the word now, which proposition was, after much discussion, negatived by a majority of 47 to 18.

Lord Grenville moved an Instruction to the Committee, for the purpose of dividing the Bill into two Bills. The motion was negatived by a majority, Proxies included, of 109 to 48.

The House [illegible] into the Committee, and adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 24.

Lord Suffolk rose, and stated a variety of considerations, to induce the House to demand a complete copy of Mr. Garlike's correspondence, up to the period when Zealand was invested: No part of this correspondence had yet been laid before their Lordships, though certain extracts had been presented to the other House. He concluded with moving an Address to his Majesty, for obtaining the Papers alluded to.

Lord Hawkesbury did not see the necessity of producing the Papers required. They had already been refused, after discussion, and the only public motive which there could be for their production, was obviated by a vote of approbation relative to the seizure of the Danish navy. The grounds which occurred in another place for producing them, did not here apply, as it would be recollected, that he had not founded any part of the defence of Ministers upon them.

Lord Hawkesbury spoke in explanation, and Lord Mulgrave against the motion, which, after being supported by Lords Holland and Grenville, was negatived without a division.

Their Lordships went into a Committee on the Orders in Council Bill, and after some conversation the Bill was ordered to be read a third time on Friday.

FRIDAY, MARCH 25.

SUGAR COMMITTEE.

Lord Binning, Chairman of the Sugar Committee, stated, that several Reports had appeared in the Daily Papers, announcing that the Committee had come to a determination to prohibit distillation from Sugar. The fact was not so. The Committee was still investigating that part of the subject, and had come to no decision whatever. He wished, therefore, to caution the Public against any such misrepresentations.

The Attorney-General obtained leave to bring in a Bill for amending the laws touching the mode of proceeding upon indictments and informations in certain cases in the Court of King's Bench. This Bill applies to matters of revenue, and authorises the Court of King's Bench to issue warrants for the apprehension of offenders in Scotland, who may have fled thither to avoid prosecution for offences against the revenue committed in England. The Bill was thereafter brought up, and read a first time. Second reading on Monday.

Mr. S. Barnard gave notice, for Monday, of a motion on the subject of Lotteries.

The Land-Tax Commissioners Bill was read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

Mr. Alderman Shaw, upon a report, obtained leave to bring in a Bill, reducing the several Acts into one, for recovery of Small Debts in the City of London. The Worthy Alderman likewise obtained leave to bring in a Bill for enlarging and otherwise improving Smithfield Market.—Adjourned till Monday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MARCH 21.

The Bill for constructing a Bridge across the Thames from the Savoy Precinct to Cuper's Bridge, was read a second time.

Lord G. Cavendish presented Petitions against the Bill, from Earl Spencer, and other Proprietors of Battersea Bridge.—Ordered to be heard by Counsel against the Bill on the third reading.

Mr. Baring moved for an Account of the Total Value of all Exports from the Port of London, from the 10th of October 1807, to the 15th of March 1808; and from the 10th of October 1806, to the 15th of March 1807, distinguishing the Quantity in each Week, and the Exports to foreign Europe, and other parts of the world.—The motion was agreed to.

Lord Mahon presented a Petition from the Merchants and Traders of Hull against the Orders in Council.—Laid on the table.

Mr. Huskisson brought up a Bill indemnifying all concerned in carrying certain Orders in Council into effect, in bringing home wine, &c. from Portugal. Read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

COPENHAGEN.

Mr. Sharpe rose, and said that the Public had a right to call for the most ample information respecting the actual hostility of Denmark to this country which had induced his Majesty to forbear and abstain from hostilities until the very last moment. At least the country had a most unquestionable right to learn the grounds upon which such idea of hostility had been founded. Ministers had captured the Danish ships and the arsenal with stores. That was an important fact, but it was a libel on the people to refuse to show the grounds on which Ministers justified such an act. The people had a right to know why we had bombarded the capital of a nation with which we were in a state of strict neutrality. He denied that Ministers had any genuine information in regard to the immediate or ultimate views of Denmark; and that they had acted upon a most wild and vague presumption that Denmark was driven into hostility against this country. He contended that there was no shadow of evidence to the contrary, and if there was, Ministers would readily produce it in their exculpation. He then descanted forcibly upon the inability of Denmark to enter into a war with Great Britain, urging at the same time that Ministers were fully apprized of that inability and also of the disinclination of Denmark to enter into such a struggle. All that Ministers had got by the Expedition was 16 hulks of ships of war, valued at 8*l.* a ton. After some further remarks, the Hon. Gentleman concluded a Speech that lasted two hours and a half, by moving a long address to his Majesty, condemnatory of the conduct of his Ministers in regard to the Expedition to Copenhagen.

Mr. J. A. S. Wortley moved a negative to the Address, and proposed a Vote of thanks to his Majesty's Ministers.

Mr. W. Ord supported the bills and said he was astonished that notwithstanding the Ministers had been so often called upon to give some proof of the disposition of Denmark in favour of France, the House was still left without a shadow of evidence, with respect to their hostile attack on Copenhagen.

Mr. Whitbread, in a long and impressive speech supported the motion of Mr. Sharpe, and censured all the conduct of Ministers in regard to Copenhagen which he condemned in toto.—Why, he asked according to the new morality, were they so shabby in their iniquity? why did they not seize the flotilla of Sweden?

Mr. Canning complained of Mr. Whitbread's acrimony and invective, tending to the degradation of the Ministry, whom he was always calumniating most forcibly, and applauding the wisdom and vigilance of Bonaparte. He should profit by the Hon. Gentleman's precepts but disdain his example. The House divided—For the Motion, 64; Against it, 224.—Majority 164. Mr. S. Wortley then moved a vote of approbation of the conduct of Ministry with respect to the Copenhagen Expedition. The previous question on this was moved and negatived,—They then divided on Mr. W.'s motion—Ayes 216, Noes 61.—Majority 155.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 22.

The Petition presented by Mr. Sheridan, against the return of Lord Cochrane, for the City of Westminster, dropped, no person appearing on the part of the Petitioner.

Mr. Huskisson presented an Account of the Monies issued from the Civil List, not made good by Parliament.

Lord Folkstone deferred his motion, fixed for to-morrow, until Tuesday next.

Sir C. Ayle read a clause in the Charter granted by King William and Queen Mary, and part of one of the Speeches of George I. and other documents, to prove that Greenwich Hospital was originally intended for the reception of wounded, or disabled Seamen; and that no Officer was qualified to hold any office in the institution, but such as had been in the Navy; though it would appear by the Report of the Commissioners of Naval Enquiry, that there were many of the offices filled by persons who had never been at sea. The spirit of the Charter having been grossly violated, and as there could be found in the Navy, many deserving individuals fully qualified to fill any situation in that institution, he proposed a Resolution, founded on the Report of the Commissioners of Naval Enquiry; and that an humble Address be presented to his Majesty, requesting all future appointments might be made agreeable to the original charter.

Mr. Perceval was disposed to go every length with the Commissioners, but there were certain offices which could not be filled by Naval Characters, namely, Surveyor, Organist, Auditor, Brewer, &c. He, therefore, moved these exceptions, by way of Amendment; and that when any office became vacant, he proposed that a month's notice be given thereof in the Public Papers, so that Naval Candidates might have an opportunity of applying.

The Address, with the Amendment, were agreed to.

Mr. Foster moved for a copy of the Report presented to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, for the improvement of the Harbour of Holyhead.

Upon the motion of Mr. Foster, leave was granted to bring in a Bill [illegible] the Exportation of Bark and Cotton Wool from Ireland, and a Bill to Amend an Act of the Parliament of Ireland [illegible] East India Goods.

The Annual Indemnity Bill was read a third time and passed.

On the motion of Mr. Perceval, the House went into a Committee, in which the adjourned consideration of the petitions from Liverpool, London, and Manchester, against the Orders in Council, was resumed. The following witnesses were examined—Mr. W. Bell, Mr. T. Martin, and Mr. A. Forrester. The House was resumed, and the further hearing of evidence was postponed until Thursday.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 23.

Lord W. Russel reported from the Renfrewshire Election Committee, that W. Macdouall, Esq. was duly elected, and that the Petition against his return was not frivolous or vexatious.

In a Committee of Supply 579,086*l.* were voted for the Extraordinary Services in the Commissariat Department; 5790*l.* for the Barrack Department; 587,288*l.* paid from the Civil List pursuant to Addresses, not made good by Parliament. Report to-morrow.

Sir A. Wellesley moved for leave to bring in a Bill for better regulating the Office of Justice of the Peace, and for preventing felonies in Dublin and its vicinity. The Hon. Baronet prefaced his motion by stating, that more murders, robberies, and burglaries, were committed in Dublin and its neighbourhood; than in any other City in the King's dominions. No man could go beyond the bounds of the City after sun-set, without danger of being robbed and ill-treated. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill accordingly. The Bill was brought up and read a first time, and ordered to be read a second time on Monday, and to be printed.

Mr. Foster brought up a Bill granting certain Duties on the Exportation of certain Articles from Ireland; also a Bill prohibiting the Exportation from Ireland of Jesuits' Bark and Cotton Wool.—Read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Friday.

Col. Long presented a Petition from the Merchants of the City of Cork, complaining of the late Orders in Council, as injurious to their Export Trade in Linen Cloths to America.—Ordered to lie on the table, until the investigation, at present going on, respecting the Orders in Council shall be brought to a conclusion.

On the motion of Mr. Perceval, the House went into a Committee, in which the adjourned consideration of the Petitions from Liverpool, London, and Manchester, was resumed.—Messrs. Glennie, Hinckley, James Palmer, Kinder, Mallet, Cropper, Rathbone, Martin, and Oxley, were then examined. Adjourned.

The further consideration of the Pilot's Regulation Bill, was deferred until the 25th of April.

The Malt Excise Duty Collection Continuance Bill was read a third time and passed.

The Report of the Committee of Supply of last night was brought up and agreed to.

The Orders in Council Indemnity Bill (Portuguese Goods in Neutrals imports) was read a second time, and committed for Monday.

Mr. Perceval, in moving that the House do resolve into the Committee for the further hearing of evidence on the Petitions against the Orders in Council, expressed a hope that the Petitioners would be able at length to close their case entirely this night. In support of these Orders in Council he did not mean to adduce any evidence.

The Speaker decided that the Counsel would be allowed to sum up, and that after that the House, should it chose, might call for and examine further evidence.

The House then resolved into a Committee, for the further hearing of evidence against the Orders in Council. Mr. Brougham, the Counsel, was accordingly called in, and examined Messrs. Garland, of Poole; Pollock, late of Boston, New England; Mann, of London; and Rathbone, of Liverpool. The evidence being concluded on the part of the petitioners, the Chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again on Tuesday next.—Adjourned.

The Orders in Council Bill was read a third time.

The question that the Bill do pass was put, and, after some conversation, decided in the affirmative.—Adjourned.

PROVINCIALS.

NORTHAMPTON ASSIZES.

PARBERRY v. JORDAN.

This was an action for seducing the plaintiff's daughter, wherein the damages were laid at 500*l*. It appeared in evidence, that the defendant had paid his addresses to the plaintiff's daughter for a considerable time, and that when he had found her pregnant, he not only deserted but ill-treated her; in consequence of which she was delivered of a dead child. The Jury, under all the circumstances of the case, gave a verdict for the plaintiff, with 500*l*. damages.

Curiosity.—On the 1st of last month was shot, in Rufford, by the game-keeper of Sir Thomas Dalrymple Hesketh, Bart. a beautiful cream-coloured cock partridge! This extraordinary bird has been stuffed by a gentleman of Ormskirk, and is now in excellent preservation.

Recipe for the Cure of Sickness in Young Sheep.—When the sheep is observed to be infected, let it immediately be brought into the house; then take a large table-spoonful of mustard, mix it with boiling water till it be of a proper consistence to be swallowed, and apply it as warm as the animal can bear it. Let the sheep stand twelve hours in the house after the mixture has been applied.

A few days since, as an ox was eating his fodder from a crib, in a close belonging to Mr. Scrase, of Boreham, the tongue of the animal was seized on by a large rat, which continued his hold for several seconds, while the poor ox ran about the yard roaring with pain. The tormented animal, however, at length drew his tongue within his mouth, closed his teeth on the loins of his ferocious assailant, and for his temerity, deservedly crushed him to death!

Dreadful Fire!—A terrible fire broke out at two o'clock on Saturday se'nnight at Chelmsford, in Essex, which burnt so furiously for a considerable time, as to threaten the destruction of the whole town. It broke out at Mrs. Smith's, the Milliner, formerly Miss Jones's, the first house of the Middle-row, in the centre of the town, which it consumed, together with the four next adjoining houses, viz. Mrs. Peek's, Mr. F. Hill's, Mr. Roote's, and Mr. Nash's. Unfortunately two young ladies, (one a daughter of Mr. G. Williams, of Ongar), apprentices to Mrs. Smith, perished in the flames; and a third was so severely burnt, that her life is despaired of. Nothing could equal the general consternation of the inhabitants, awakened to a scene of such extreme horror in the dead of the night. No discovery has yet been made of the cause of this dreadful accident.

The following melancholy catastrophe occurred at Dartford, on Thursday se'nnight.—A child, who had been blind from her infancy, being shut up alone in a room, in which there was a fire, approached so near to it as to occasion her clothes to catch the flame, by which accident she was so dreadfully burnt, that she died in 24 hours afterwards.

Execution.—On Monday morning last Luis Herquiada, for the wilful murder of Francisco Romaro, was conveyed from the new gaol, to the place of execution, near Winchester. He behaved with great penitence, and made a confession of the crime for which he was going to suffer. At the place of execution a most melancholy circumstance took place, owing to the hangman not understanding his duty, and fixing the rope on the gallows improperly:—The rope was put round the malefactor's neck, and the cart instantly moving away, he fell, suspended, and, in the convulsive agonies of death, his feet were partly on the ground, and he underwent a most violent strangulation. His dying groans were shocking. He remained in that situation for some time, and then spoke, in great anguish, requesting to be put out of his misery. One of the javelin men took him round the body, and lifted him up, in order to remove the rope, which was then under his chin, to under his left ear. He was again thrown off, and it was some time before death put a period to his sufferings.

[The Gazette contains a Dispatch from Capt. Maitland, of his Majesty's ship Emerald, dated off Vivero, on the coast of Spain, March 14, 1808, by which it appears that the Emerald, when on her return to Ferrol, discovered a large French schooner at an anchor in Vivero Bay. Though late in the evening, Capt. M. instantly determined to carry her by a coup de main, and standing in for the anchorage, which was defended by two forts, one of which had 8 twenty-four pounders, the other five of the same metal, he dispatched some of his boats, manned and armed, under the command of Mr. Bertram, the First Lieutenant, with orders to storm the largest battery, and secure the schooner, while the Emerald stood up the bay to silence the other; the Third Lieutenant, Mr. Smith, was detached with the remainder of the boats, to land and attack this battery in the rear, he was opposed by a large party of Spanish soldiers, most of whom fell, together with their officer, from the rapidity of our seamen's fire; and the ship at the same time silenced the battery. Mr. Bertram, having spiked the guns of the largest fort, proceeded to the schooner, which had been run on the Rocks, and deserted by the crew; he was also attacked by a large party of the enemy, who was soon obliged to fly, leaving many dead behind them, he then used every endeavour to get the vessel off, but a large body of infantry collected on the beach opened such a galling fire, that he was obliged to set the schooner on fire, when at one A. M. she blew up. The enemy having returned to the smallest battery, re-opened their fire, which they continued for two hours, till the ship was out of range. The schooner was a French corvette, of 8 guns and 70 men, from the Isle of France, with dispatches, and was called L'Apropos.

On the return of the boats the Emerald weighed and stood out of the bay, with light airs, and at day-light they discovered eight gun-boats pulling from the westward, but on their coming within the range of grape, the Emerald opened such a heavy fire on them, that they pulled into Veres Bay, after having kept up a smart action for about half an hour—and the total want of wind prevented the Emerald from pursuing them. Capt. M. speaks in the highest terms of all the officers and men, whose perseverance under an arduous contest, in which they were at their guns for 18 hours, could only be equalled by the spirit with which they rushed on to the attack during the darkness of the night, and in opposition to a much superior force. We are sorry to say that the Emerald had nine killed and 16 wounded, among the latter are the First-Lieutenant, both Marine Officers, and a Master's-mate.]

[The Gazette also contains dispatches from Vice-Admiral Dacres, on the Jamaica station, mentioning the following captures:—French schooner, Experiment, two guns and 40 men, by His Majesty's sloop Raindeer. Spanish privateer, Juliana, four twelve-pound carronades, one long eighteen-pounder, and 83 men, by His Majesty's schooners, Gracieux and Gypsey.—Spanish letter of Marque, laden with leather, and twenty-four thousand dollars, by His Majesty's brig Elk; and the French schooner, Lyonnaise, of five guns and 86 men, together with another run on shore, and destroyed, both by His Majesty's sloop Reindeer. It also contains a gallant exploit by the cutter and jolly-boat of the Confiance, Capt. Yeo, which had been sent to Row Guard, at the mouth of the Tagus, to watch the Russian fleet. The officer observing a French gun-boat at anchor, above St. Julians, boarded her and brought her out, after some resistance. She proves to be La Canonian, mounting one 24 and two 6-pounders, with fifty men.]

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

WAR BETWEEN RUSSIA AND SWEDEN.

The Declaration of the Russian Emperor against Sweden, and the Counter-Declaration of his Swedish Majesty have arrived in this country. As they are too long to be inserted verbatim, and are not properly speaking State-Papers for an English Newspaper, inasmuch as they do not immediately affect England, we shall content ourselves with laying the substance before our readers.

The Emperor of Russia has begun by relating that he had notified to England his determination of resisting the aggression on Denmark, and that, by a Note dated 24th September last, he declared this resolution to Sweden. That an article in the Treaty of 1783 between Catherine and Gustavus III. and another in the Treaty of 1800 between Paul and the present King of Sweden, contain the reciprocal agreement of guaranteeing the Baltic as a close Sea. That by those Treaties the Emperor had thought himself justified in requesting the co-operation of Sweden against England. That Sweden had not disavowed the obligations of these Treaties, but refused to co-operate until the French troops were removed from the coast, and the German ports opened to English ships. The Declaration, after charging the King of Sweden with partiality for Britain, proceeds to state, that the Emperor, in a second Note, dated 16th November, informed his Swedish Majesty of the actual rupture between Russia and England: which Note was for two months unanswered, and when answered at last, contained the same proposals that had been made before. That the Emperor congratulates himself on his own past moderation; but that, being informed of Great Britain's endeavour to terrify Denmark by a threat of occupying Zealand with Swedish troops, and of her promise to guarantee Norway to the Swedish King; being assured also, that the Swedish King, while the Russian Note remained unanswered, was negociating a Treaty at London, his Imperial Majesty could not allow Sweden to disguse her attachment to England under a pretence of neutrality, and had therefore been obliged to resort to those means which Providence had placed in his hands. That nevertheless the Emperor will change his measures into measures of mere precaution, if the King of Sweden will join Russia and Denmark in shutting the Baltic against England until the conclusion of a maritime peace, which he is earnestly invited to do.

The Declaration of the King of Sweden begins by inveighing against a rupture commenced without a declaration, or even the statement of a single grievance. It recounts the terms of amity that lately subsisted between Sweden and Russia, and the Emperor's promise in the Russian Manifesto of August 30, 1806, to reject all offers of Peace, however advantageous, which could not be reconciled with the honour of the Russian name, the security of the country, the interest of his allies, and the general tranquillity of Europe. How far, says this Swedish Declaration, the Emperor's promise is consistent with the Peace of Tilsit, has been declared by the present age, and posterity will affirm the doom: The King of Sweden stood upon the theatre of war, and was not acquainted with the negotiations till Peace was concluded, contrary to the express stipulations of the treaty made between Sweden and Russia on the 14th of of January, 1805, Article IX.

The Declaration goes on to state, that the news of the Peace between Russia and France was followed by an offer to contribute to the conclusion of a pacific treaty for Sweden, which induced his Swedish Majesty to renew the demand of an armistice. That this being denied, taught him to appreciate the value of Russian co-operation: and he was obliged to give up his German dominions. That his rejection of certain advantageous offers from France was not a matter for which he claimed praise, but that it gave him a right to expect honourable conduct from Russia: for one of these offers had been, that in case of a rupture with Russia, the provinces lost in the reign of CHARLES XII. should be restored to Sweden, with the addition of any part of the Russian Empire which Sweden should require. That the tendency of the Secret Articles of Tilsit which were first suspected to exist, and afterwards acknowledged by the Russian Ministry, began to appear, and that the steps taken by France to hem in the Continent, and shut it against the English trade, spread misery over every state. That by a Note of 6th October, it was proposed by Russia that Sweden should co-operate, as in 1789, to shut the Baltic: to which his Swedish Majesty had answered, that as the excluding system of France must prevent tranquillity in the Baltic, the Emperor ought first to prevail on the French to leave it. That whereas, when the Russian demand was repeated on the 27th October, compliance was urged on the ground of the Convention of 1780, his Swedish Majesty had answered on the 21st of January, that "by the Convention of 1801, between Russia and England, to which Sweden had acceded at Russia's desire, the former armed neutrality was done away. That his Majesty had then entered into direct engagements with England, which he could not justly break while England fulfilled them. That, with the other armed neutrality, the stipulation to shut the Baltic naturally fell to the ground; a stipulation the less fitted for the present circumstances, as the former Danish Navy then reckoned upon, did no longer exist, and as England had besides opened a passage through the Great Belt. Yet that as Sweden was not at liberty to contribute with an armed force to preserve tranquillity in the Baltic, she would endeavour to obtain, by negotiation with England, that the latter should send thither no ships of war, unless some other Power rendered that measure necessary by hostilities committed in that sea: but that it was too much to expect that Sweden should serve Russia for a bulwark, since she had been pleased to provoke England—that Sweden should sacrifice her fleet and her trade to protect Cronstadt."

The Swedish Declaration proceeds to state, that hostile preparations were immediately commenced on the Russian frontiers, on which, however, his Swedish Majesty had still looked with indifference, as long as no grievance had been started to him, and no claim preferred. That the offer to obtain, by negotiation, the tranquillity of the Baltic, opened prospects of peace and profit for Russia, and for the whole North of Europe, and therefore apparently could not be refused. That the offer was made on the supposition of England's consent, which there were strong grounds to expect, and which his Majesty hoped to obtain before the English Fleet, which was so much dreaded, should be able to reach the Baltic; but a direct answer to this offer being avoided, his Majesty's Ambassador was desired the 15th of February to make remonstrances on that subject, when at once all official communications with Sweden were broken off, and the Russian troops entered Finland. The Declaration concludes by a spirited notice of the contemptible Proclamation of General Buxhovden to the inhabitants of Finland, which we have given in our Foreign Intelligence.

It will be observed, that the only allegation in the Russian Paper, which can be plausible even for a moment, is that which relates to the obligation that former treaties imposed upon Sweden to co-operate in shutting the Baltic. But this allegation is ably answered by the King of Sweden, who proves that all these treaties have been, in fact, annulled by the consent of Russia herself, if not by the situation of affairs. The conduct of the Emperor is by this Declaration of Sweden placed in a point of view by no means respectable. The eager hurry of his wars, and the treacherous suddenness of his pacifications, the wretched policy which has accompanied his attack upon Sweden, and the wretched arguments which are employed in justification of that attack, are all of them treated with the [illegible] neglect they have deserved.

It is to be hoped that the vigorous conduct of Sweden will procure for her a safe and honourable Peace. As an active Ally of this Country she can do us little good, but she may do herself much harm; and no man who considers the situation of the Continent can wish to see her stimulated by this kingdom to any measures that may exclude her from so desirable an object,

The idea of sending troops to Sweden has now been completely abandoned; but a strong naval force is speedily to visit the Baltic: the vessels are ready to sail, and the easterly winds alone have prevented them from departing sooner.

The demise of the King of Denmark, who died suddenly on the 13th, is a matter of little moment, for the disordered state of his mind had long rendered him politically non-existent. The Crown Prince was proclaimed King on the 16th.

An engagement has taken place at Tavatschus, in Finland, between the Russians and the Swedes, in which the former lost 5000, and the latter only 1700. But as the Swedes have retreated, we fear the numbers are not accurately stated. This intelligence reached us by the Gottenburgh Mail of the 21st. Accounts which are accredited state that the Swedish armies amount to 44,800 men.

The Emperor of the French has introduced some new titles, or rather revived some old ones, among his principal subjects. Some great Officers of State are to be Princes, and their eldest sons are to be Dukes: others of less importance will be Counts and Barons, and the Members of the Legion of Honour will be Knights. These titles, it seems, are pronounced hereditary: and thus by degrees the French people are returning to the ancient system. In a few years, having run completely round the circle, they will pause at the place whence they originally set out: they will look back on the past as on a dream; they will recognise liberty, but as a name, and think upon equality, but as a phantom!

Mr. Rose, it is said, is expected home in the Statira frigate, which carried him out. He was expected at New York about the end of February. Mr. Erskine was to accompany him thither, and return to Washington after Mr. Rose had embarked.—It is now understood that Mr. Rose's mission has terminated favourably, and that the affair of the Chesapeake has been amicably adjusted. After it had been adjusted, Mr. Rose is said to have intimated to the American Government, that as they were satisfied on that point, and there was no other acknowledged cause for the interdiction of his Majesty's ships of war into the ports and waters of the United States, he trusted that the Proclamation for the adoption of that measure would be revoked, and British ships of war placed on the same footing with those of other nations in amity with America. The reply to this intimation had not transpired.

The denationalizing Decree issued at Milan, produced a very considerable effect upon the minds of the Americans, although the President had not thought fit to call the attention of Congress to it.

Mr. Nourse is to be the bearer of proposals to this country.—He was to set out about the middle of March, and to go by the way of France.—Some consider this as unfavourable to the idea of peace with this country, whilst others think that a strong remonstrance will be sent by him, against the Milan Decree.

A letter from New York says, that the embargo has created great embarrassments: that were British ships permitted to come in there, they would get hundreds of seamen who are now trying to find the way to Halifax: and that should things remain in the present state for six months, more British Seamen will be driven back into the service of their country, than by all the Proclamations the British Government can issue.

A New York Paper, of January 21, says:—"It was reported yesterday, that dispatches from the French Minister here to Bonaparte, which were intercepted in an American vessel by a cruizer, and laid before the British Government, were afterwards submitted to the inspection of Mr. Munroe, before his departure from England. These dispatches are said to criminate General Moreau; and on Mr. Monroe communicating their contents to the President, orders were given to arest the General, if he should be taken within the United States."

The Mail which arrived on Friday from Jamaica, does not communicate any news of importance. The following is an extract of a private letter, dated—

"KINGSTON, JAMAICA, FEB. 2.

"The negroes and white people in this island have been very sickly; but it is now nearly over, and health again restored.—Provisions are in tolerable plenty, and if any stoppage to American intercourse takes place, the plantations will feel it very little, as the seasons continue good."

The following is the Message which Mr. Jefferson sent to Congress, when he transmitted our Orders of Council of the 11th of November last:—

WASHINGTON, FEB. 3.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

"Having received an official communication of certain orders of the British Government against maritime rights to neutrals, bearing date the 11th of November, 1807, I transmit them to Congress as a further proof of the increasing dangers of our navigation and commerce, which led to the provident act of the present Session, laying an embargo on our own vessels.

"THOMAS JEFFERSON."

Extract of a Letter from Melazzo (Sicily), Jan. 28.

"Our force at present on the Island amounts to about 8000 men, including three foreign regiments. They are thus divided:—At Messina, the head-quarters, are stationed the 21st, 27th, 58th, 62d, and 81st chasseurs, Britaniques and Maltese regiments. The 81st forms a cordon from the light house at the Faro to Missina; at Augusta, under the command of Colonel Oswald, the 10th regiment, and part of De Rolle's; are stationed at Syracuse, under Brigadier General Stewart, the 31st and remainder of De Rolle's; and at Melazzo, under Brig.-Gen. Cole, the 35th and flank companies of all the numbered regiments on the island, except of the 62d; a detachment of 300 of the 20th dragoons, and some companies of the artillery, compose the remainder of the force in Sicily. We are at present actively employed in taking a statistical survey of that part of Sicily immediately in the vicinity of our posts, and I doubt not but that the result will prove the resources of the country to be very abundant under proper cultivation and encouragement. We are of course all activity at present; and, with the characteristic eagerness of British soldiers, notwithstanding our inferior force, look forward with confidence and joy to the moment of the threatened attack."

THE KING OF DENMARK.—The death of Christian the VIIth, King of Denmark, is announced in the Gottenburgh Mail which arrived yesterday. He was born on the 29th of January, 1749. In the year 1766 he was married to the Princess Carolina Matilda, Sister of our revered Monarch. The unfortunate history of that Princess, owing, it is generally supposed, to the enmity of her Step-mother, has long been a subject of regret in this country. The late King of Denmark came to England in the year 1767, and was received with every possible demonstration of respect by all ranks of people, as well as by the illustrious family to whom he had been recently allied. Soon after his return to Denmark, his faculties, which were never bright, sunk into a decay, which wholly unfitted him for the duties of his situation, and his Kingdom has ever since been governed under his name, without the least chance that he would be able to resume his Royal functions. Before this melancholy event, in his life there was nothing in his character morally or intellectually calculated to excite admiration or provoke censure.

Letters from Holland state, that great discontents prevail throughout France, the manufacturing towns being left entirely idle for want of the materials which neutrals formerly supplied, but which are now not to be had at any price.

It is reported, that Bonaparte has determined to send an army into Africa, to crush the rulers of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli.

Private letters received on Tuesday from Holland state, that seven of the most eminent Merchants at Antwerp, and four at Brussels, had been taken into custody, for having violated the Decrees recently issued for the prevention of all intercourse with Great Britain. They are charged with having "contrived, sanctioned, and connived at the admission into the ports under the dominion of France, of various goods the manufacture of England; of having negociated bills for the payment of such goods, and of having sent money out of the country contrary to the tenor of the Decrees of France." They have been forcibly taken from their families, and sent under a strong escort of Gens d'Armes, to Paris.

The Russian army acting against Sweden is commanded by Generals Buxhoeden, Bennigsen, and Springporten.—The first is the General who was said to have behaved so ill in the late war against France, at the battle of Pultusk. Springporten is by birth a Swede; and Bennigsen is the General who commanded at the battle of Eylau, and displayed so much talents opposed to Bonaparte, in whose cause he is now doomed to fight against his late friends.

Wednesday morning seven Portuguese seamen landed at Dover from Flushing, having escaped from thence in an open boat on Monday night last; they had been detained in Holland ever since the embargo was laid on the ships of their nation, and a short time since were informed that they must either go on board the ships of war to assist in fitting them out, or go to prison; they accepted of the former; but, as as soon an opportunity offered, they took a Dutch boat and came away sans ceremonie. There are eight ships of the line now ready for sea, besides frigates, at flushing, but want men to man them. Two Dutch frigates, and two schooners, made their escape from the Texel, a few days since, and got safe to Flushing Roads, where they now remain.

The preparations which were making for dismantling the Hall at Chelsea, in which the late Court Martial was held, have been, it is reported, countermanded; and this strengthens the rumour, that the conduct of another General Officer at Buenos Ayres is about to become the subject of investigation.

We have of late observed a great improvement in the shape and binding of the Opera Hat, which is now become almost an indispensible article of Gentlemen's dress.—It is not so wide as formerly, and rather higher, and the binding a very broad silk shag, in imitation of the French feather: the tout ensemble is strikingly novel and elegant. We understand the fashionable world is indebted for its introduction to Bowring and Co. of New Bond-street.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

HIS MAJESTY'S LEVEE.

Wednesday about twelve o'clock HIS MAJESTY came to town, from Windsor, and was received at the Queen's Palace by the Dukes of York, Kent, and Cambridge. About two o'clock HIS MAJESTY held a private Levee. The following had the honour of being presented to HIS MAJESTY:

General N. Balfour, upon his promotion; Brigadier-General Lumley, by Lord Heathfield, upon his appointment upon the Staff at Malta; the Rev. Dr. Goodall, the Master of Eton College, upon his being appointed a Canon of Windsor, in the room of the late Dr. Duval; the Rev. Dr. King, upon his being appointed a Prebend of Westminster Abbey; the Earl of Pembroke, upon his marriage.

HIS MAJESTY held a Privy Council, and gave audience to the Cabinet Ministers, Viscount Cathcart, and Mr. Ryder, the Judge Advocate, who laid before HIS MAJESTY the voluminous report of the trial of General Whitelocke, and was closeted with HIS MAJESTY for nearly two hours upon the business. At half past six o'clock HIS MAJESTY set off on his return to Windsor.

THE PARKS, KENSINGTON-GARDENS, &c.

Another day of rest now calls the gay votaries of pleasure to these emporia of dress and fashion; Sir John with his bays, my Lady in her barouche, women of character dressed for the season, and women of no character dressed for any season, all hasten to the gay resort, all pressed on by Sunday bucks and bits of blood in the ride, or swept along by the teeming crowd of John Trot's family, who gobble down a hasty dinner, to take a walk and show their finery.

At this propitious season, when Spring, with all its verdure, hastens to deck our fields with native emerald, a change of dress becomes an important topic, and those who wish to shine as the arbiters of fashion (like true philosophers) first try their experiments at the Sunday resorts.—The last weeks have been productive of much novelty this way, and this day, should propitious Sol, still shine resplendent, we may expect much of this important business settled.

The gayer nymphs, warmed by the approaching sun, now lay aside their clay-cold habiliments, whilst the pearl, the fawn, and the Bath purple shot, strive eagerly for pre-eminence; cloth caps now yield the pas to those of a lighter texture, and mights will be the struggle between the chapeaux à la Diane, and the coeffures a la Bergere.

The stores of Antiquity are already ransacked; the four quarters of the globe are deficient in novelty, and Heaven itself must be taken by storm. Each article of apparel, will therefore bear the patronizing name of some tutelary Goddess, till all Kensington Gardens shine a galaxy of native Stars, and the Astronomer fond of contemplating the heavenly bodies, may here gaze himself to madness. We might pursue the metaphor, but some wicked wits may perhaps by their eccentric lectures, call our attention to the conjunctions of the inferior planets, to blazing comets, or pun us through all the signs of the Zodiac from Virgo to Gemini.

'Midst all this dearth of novelty, we are surprised that none of our fair country women have clapped on the conjuring cap; but were it in our power to recommend a fashion, it should be the Cap of Modesty, and the Mantle of Reserve.

CITY.

Tuesday a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall, which was numerously attended, previous to which the Lord Mayor ordered the price of Bread to be reduced to 11d. the quartern loaf, of wheaten, and 9½d. household.

A motion was made, and question proposed, that it be referred to the Special Committee to consider whether, in the present critical situation of the country, it would be advisable to effect an alteration in the permanent military system of this City, with a view to add to the national defence, as well as to the internal protection of its inhabitants; the said Committee to report their opinion thereon, together with any other matters which they may think connected with the subject.

A long amendment was proposed, and upon a division being called for, a Member observed, that there was not a sufficient number of Members present to constitute a Court, upon which the Court broke up.

Thanks and the Freedom to Capt. Rogers were voted.

A Report from the Navigation Committee was presented to the Court, relative to the Bill pending in Parliament, for erecting a Bridge over the River Thames, which was read, and a Petition to the House of Commons thereon was proposed, read, and agreed to, and ordered to be signed by the Town Clerk, and presented to the Sheriffs, attended by the Remembrancer.

Friday a Court of Common Council was held at Guildhall, convened for the purpose of addressing his Majesty at this important crisis.

Mr. Samuel Dixon stated the object of his motion, and said he was at all times an advocate for peace, but the times were such as to preclude any idea of that desirable event. His Majesty's Ministers had done every thing in their power to maintain the interest and dignity of the country; and they could not act otherwise than reject the mediation of Russia and Austria, who were immediately under the controul of our eternal foe, who aimed at nothing but the destruction of this, the only country that would rather sink than yield to his yoke. He deprecated the measures of those who brought forward the petitions of peace, and praised the conduct of Lord Milton, with respect to those petitions. He concluded by moving an Address to his Majesty of the important state of public affairs, and to assure his Majesty of the unshaken attachment of the Court to his most Sacred Person and Government.

Mr. Deputy Box seconded the motion.

Mr. Deputy Goodbehere could not comprehend the necessity of the Address, as his Majesty could not entertain the smallest doubt of their loyalty and attachment to his Sacred Person and Government. This Address savoured strongly of a party question, but he trusted the Court would feel its own importance by rejecting it, which would be giving a proper example to the country at large; and concluded by moving an amendment, disclaiming party matters.

Mr. Waithman expected that something in the shape of argument would be brought forward to convince the Court of the absolute necessity of such an Address; he was well aware of the situation of this country, and was not, by any means, friendly to petitions for peace, though they were dictated by the pressure of existing circumstances. By this sweeping Address the Court was called on to sanction the entire conduct of Ministers; but he could not go to such lengths, for they had not yet done any thing in favour of the people. His Majesty's Speech recommended economy: had that been pursued? No. The fate of the Reversion Bill was fresh in the recollection of the Court. After all this we were now called upon to thank his Majesty on the happy choice of his Ministers. He concluded by proposing an amendment also.

Mr. Quin defended the Copenhagen Expedition and the Orders in Council, but lamented the fate of the Reversion Bill; he also proposed an amendment respecting that Bill.

After a few words from Mr. Jacks, Sir C. Price, Aldermen Shaw and Curtis, the amendments were rejected, and the original Address agreed to. A Committee was then appointed to prepare the same, and the Sheriffs were directed to wait upon the King, to know when he will be pleased to receive it.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Friday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Capt. Collins was sworn into the command of the ship Travers, consigned to Madras and Bengal.—The Court adjourned at six o'clock.

THE THEATRE.

COVENT-GARDEN.

The English opera is a species of amusement, which, though it combines more advantages than any other regular class of the drama, has nevertheless made the smallest advances towards perfection. Its natural and inherent inconsistency is its only objection: but as that objection has been waved by the public, who are content to hear songs introduced when singing must be impossible, the opera is become a kind of drama as much established as tragedy or comedy. But whatever resources of pathos may subsist in tragedy, whatever benefits of gaiety may be found in comedy, whatever accommodations for poetical unskilfulness may be met in either, all, exist in the opera as it is now constituted. For an opera is a mixed entertainment, which may contain indiscriminately pathetic and comic scenes—which may avail itself of all the pump and circumstance of machinery and decoration—which, while it may appeal to the head and the heart, may also retain in its service the important assistance of the ear. It might naturally have been expected then, that the English opera, possessing thus all the credit of genius, and all the convenience of indolence, would become the most perfect sort of theatrical representation. But we see no such effect; and there is not upon the stage a single opera which deserves to hold the same rank in its own sphere that the School for Scandal occupies as a comedy. The Beggar's Opera is a work of genius, but by no means a regular play; and Love in a Village is a regular play, but by no means a work of genius. The operas of the present day have neither regularity nor genius; and it continues to be a matter of regret that no piece has yet been produced which may delight at once our musical and our critical taste, and set aside Lord Chesterfield's sly Epigram,

> An opera, like a pillory, may be said
> To nail our ears down, and expose our head.

It is urged by modern authors, that in these times, when the music has become the principal object, there is a necessity for giving the first parts to the first singers: and that as singers seldom or never know any thing of acting, it is useless to write good plays or good parts. We deny the necessity of giving the first parts to the singers. An Opera might be constituted, as many Comedies have been, of two divisions; for if a Comedy may contain at once a serious interest and a comic story, surely an Opera may combine two divisions, one musical and one dramatic. Then we might see good actors in the chief dramatic parts, with good singers in the chief musical parts, and every class of the audience would go away satisfied. An attempt of this kind was made in an Opera called Peter the Great; but the piece had no success, for the music was not particularly good, and the dialogue was particularly bad. However this is no reason why we should not see a good play on this plan: and we must think that nothing but the unfair partialities of Proprietors can have hitherto prevented the performance of some such Opera. But these gentlemen, even in their chace of emolument, are often turned aside by private influence; and while merit is overlooked or repulsed by the literary judges of the theatre, a play is perpetually accepted because its Author is acquainted with some person high in the government. Thus misruled is the domain of the drama; its cultivators impart the juices of the soil to gaudy blossoms and tall stalks that stare in all the impudence of flaunting vulgarity; while the modest flowers that form the proper ornament of the garden, must spring spontaneously or not at all, and perhaps perish under foot before they bloom!

We have a striking example of their want of judgment in the revival of Mr. Bate Dudley's Opera of The Travellers in Switzerland. This piece abounds, not in character, for it has none, but certainly in characters, for it comprehends almost all the establishment of the Theatre. It has, probably, some sort of plot; but it is difficult to discover the affairs of the parties, till the end of the third act, when a discerning spectator may perceive by the relative positions of the actors, which of the ladies and gentlemen entertain any matrimonial views. Perhaps the Proprietors may think that the dialogue has jokes; but we confess that we could perceive no joke in the play itself, and certainly there is no joke in sitting to see it. In short, it appears to have no merit but its music: or, in the Irish phrase, the best part of the venison is the currant jelly. But is it not disgraceful, that such a genius as that of Mr. Shield should ever have been employed upon such a piece? Is it fit that the play should be but the appendage of the music, and that dialogue should float down the stream only when the fiddles have strength enough to tow it after them? The Proprietors who couple pieces like The Travellers in Switzerland, and Two Faces under a Hood, with the compositions of such a master as Mr. Shield, can be compared only to the tyrant in the Æneid, who procured putrescent carcases, and fastened them to the bodies of the living!

MR. THEODORE HOOK.

This lively young author, who was very sick in the measles a few weeks ago, is now completely recovered from that alarming distemper, and has again appeared in society, to the infinite gratification of a select acquaintance. But we are sorry to say, that we have learnt another circumstance, which, if true, must deeply mortify his numerous admirers, injure the theatres in which he has always stood so forward, and give a fatal stab to the glory of dramatic literature in Great Britain. In short we understand (Apollo grant the rumour be unfounded!) that Mr. Theodore Hook has presented at Drury-lane Theatre a piece which has—not been accepted! What shall we say of the Managers who could reject a work composed by the poet who wrote The Invisible Girl, and Catch him who Can: and who, every body knows, can speak extempore as well as he can write!—the gentleman Usher who brought Tekeli and The Fortress from France, and introduced them to the English nation—the fostering genius who took Il Fanatico per la Musica from the Opera House, and set it afloat at the Haymarket, under the title of Music Mad, as a hen hatches duck's-eggs till the young things are able to take water! We know that Managers have no regard for the Public, and inflict this pang upon the general mind without the slightest feeling of remorse: but they can have no consideration for their own interests when they reject the works of such an author. And we are told that their only motive for this rash act was, that Mr. Theodore Hook had written abusive criticisms on his theatrical friends in a Magazine, called The Satirist, or Monthly Something. Madmen! as if they could have been injured by such a step! or as if Mr. Theodore Hook, or any other young wit, had not a perfect right to show his humour by his personality, and turn to a public account the little gleanings that he might collect from the foolish ingenuousness of private society!

What there might have been in the piece thus rejected, we now can only conjecture. Perhaps there was a part with songs for Mr. Braham—perhaps some puns for Mr. Matthews—perhaps a dance for M. D'Egville's pupils—perhaps the piece contained original matter (such as never was seen before)—perhaps it was all a translation from the French. Perhaps there was a dog in it—perhaps a devil—perhaps a flour-sack for the concealment of a hero—perhaps a serious ballad with very comical poetry—perhaps there may have been good grammar.—Perhaps, in this piece, thus shamefully rejected, perhaps, as Gray's Elegy has it:

Perhaps in this neglected spot is laid—— —But the subject is too melancholy—we cannot continue it!—Oh!

LAW REPORT.

COURT OF CHANCERY, LINCOLN'S INN HALL, MARCH 22, 1808.

About a fortnight since, Mr. Parquet petitioned the Chancellor to be discharged out of custody, at the suit of Messrs. Kensington and Co. upon the ground that he had made a full and fair disclosure of his effects, under a Commission of Bankruptcy awarded against him. He complained of the great length of time he had been imprisoned, and the inflexability of his Creditors; tendering at the same time the affidavits of two medical men, who stated, that if the Petitioner was not speedily removed out of prison, his life would fall a sacrifice.

Sir S. Romily supported the prayer of the Petition.

Mr. Hart, on the other side, insisted that the Petitioner had not made a full and fair disclosure of his effects, but if he would find security in 2000*l.* for his not quitting the kingdom, Messrs. Kensington and Co. would consent to his liberation.

Upon this offer the case stood over till this day, and on being called on, Mr. Parquet's Solicitor informed his Lordship, that death had relieved his Client from his sufferings, and hoped the Counsel employed against him would intercede with their Client to pay the expences of his funeral.

The Chancellor enforced the propriety of this recommendation.

Mr. Hart said he did not know how he could interfere personally, but he trusted after his Lordship's recommendation that his Clients would do what was proper.

Yesterday another interlocutary motion was expected relative to the Opera dispute, and the Court was prodigiously crowded. The Lord Chancellor inquired of the Counsel if they had not an Opera motion to make, and on being informed in the negative, his Lordship jocosely observed that he had read in the newspapers such was to take place.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The important information was received on Tuesday, from Gibraltar, that the Carthagena fleet amounting to six sail of the line, had been forced to take shelter at Minorca—and consequently no junction can have taken place between that and the Rochfort and Toulon squadrons. The Hydra left the Carthagena squadron at Minorca, about the 15th February. We have reason to hope that Sir Richard Strachan will join Lord Collingwood, before any attempt can be made on Sicily: Sir Sidney Smith was left at Gibraltar on the 29th February, with the Foudroyant and Agamemnon, taking in water.

Dispatches have been received at the Admiralty from the Mediterranean, brought to Plymouth by the Diligence store-ship, but we do not understand that their contents are of importance. The report of the action in the Mediterranean, between Sir Richard Strachan's squadron and one of the enemy's, in that sea, has received no confirmation.—It rests upon private accounts from Holland, in one of which Sir Sidney Smith is represented as the Commander, and is said to have fallen in the action; but this is evidently a mistake, as Sir Sidney Smith remained on the 1st instant, at Gibraltar, and had no command in the Mediterranean.

The three Squadrons of the Enemy in the Mediterranean consist of sixteen, or at most seventeen sail of the line. The following is a list of the British ships in that quarter :—

Royal Sovereign	110	Eagle	74

Formidable	98	Colossus	74
Malta	84	Spartiate	74
Cæsar	80	Superb	74
Canopus	80	Cumberland	74

And a number of frigates and smaller vessels.

The Minotaur arrived on Friday, at Spithead, from Sir Charles Cotton's squadron which she left about ten days ago, so much in want of water, it was feared the gallant Admiral would be obliged to raise the blockade of Candiz. We trust, however, that he will not be driven to this extremity, as the Coquette sloop sailed on Friday from Portsmouth, with four ships, containing a supply of water for his use.

By letters from the out-ports of the Channel we learn, that the Gibraltar convoy has been chased by two enemies ships, and it is apprehended some of them have been taken. About 14 out of 38 have arrived at Plymouth, and four at Falmouth. The Sirius was chased, but escaped. From the situation in which this hostile force made its appearance, it is to be apprehended that it lately escaped out of Brest, during the absence of our squadron usually occupied in the blockade of that port.

His Majesty's ship Victory is ordered to be fitted up for the reception of the flag of Sir James Saumarez.

The capture of the Delight, of 18 guns, as formerly stated appears to have taken place at Reggi, not far from Sicily; she was cruizing with a small squadron, of which the Glatton, of 50 guns, Captain Seccombe, was the Commodore, and an attempt was made to attack, and cut out some gun-boats. The Glatton being too large to approach the shore, the Delight was appointed to this dangerous service, and Capt. Seccombe volunteered on board that ship; but in standing into the bay, she unfortunately missed stays, and got on shore, so that she was exposed to the fire of 1000 soldiers that came down from the forts. The Commander ordered them to surrender; but Captain S. refusing, thinking to get the Delight off, a heavy volley of musketry was fired on the Delight's decks, which were soon cleared of every officer and man: among those that fell, were Captain Seccombe, and Captain Handfield, who were afterwards buried at Sicily with military honours: the expedition, of course, completely failed.

POLICE OFFICE.—BOW STREET.

DASHING FEMALE DEPREDATOR.

About three weeks since, a female of genteel appearance, who lodged with Mrs. Darville, in Leicester-square, very unexpectedly left the house. Soon after she was gone, Mrs. Darville discovered that she had been robbed of bank-notes and bills to the amount of 85*l.* a pearl necklace, a diamond ring, a diamond broach, several trinkets, and other property to a considerable amount.—Mrs. Darville suspected Mrs. Morgan, and gave a full description of her person. She has been traced to Portsmouth, and brought to town. On Wednesday evening she underwent an examination before Mr. GRAHAM, and was committed for further examination.

The Prisoner is a very handsome young woman, and an elegant figure; she has had a liberal education, and is very accomplished. She was a natural daughter of the late General Spray. She married Lieut. Morgan, of the Marines, about five years since, but left him about two years and a half ago, and went off with a naval officer, and has taken to very loose ways. A person who knew her at Portsmouth wrote to her sister in London respecting her, who returned for answer, that her sister had conducted herself so extremely ill, that she would have nothing to do with her. When the prisoner was taken at Portsmouth, a gown, of which she was charged with stealing, was found upon her.

MARLBOROUGH STREET.

Thursday George Bond, who stood charged with defrauding the Bakery and Gentry, under pretence of publishing a History of Botany Bay, underwent a second examination, and the evidence being sufficiently conclusive, he was committed for trial. He is a man of mean appearance with but one eye.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

[illegible] since, Mr. Barnard, one of the proprietors of the [illegible], sent a parcel by the Bedford coach, to Messrs. [illegible], the bankers, of London, their agents, containing Bank of England notes, and country Bank notes, to the amount of 1200*l.* which never came to hand. The robber has not yet been discovered.

The following decision will, in some measure, guard the public against the impositions practised by hackney-coachmen at places of public amusement. A Mr. Howe took a coach from Drury-lane Theatre, on Tuesday night, having previously endeavoured to procure it in the regular manner, but the coachman would not go to Swallow-street under 3*s.* and Mr. Howe took him at all events. On being set down he tendered the coachman 1*s* 6*d.* which he refused to take, or to suffer him to leave the coach, without paying the extortion, for which the coachman was on Wednesday fined 40*s.*

An inquisition was taken on Thursday, at Fordgate, Islington-road, on the body of Mrs. Esther Able, who met her death by accidentally setting fire to her clothing on Sunday night. On a sudden her servant in the kitchen was alarmed by her shrieks, and on going to her apartment Mrs. A. presented herself at the door enveloped in flames. Her dress, which it is supposed had caught fire whilst she was dosing in her chair, was reduced to tinder, and the servant, in her fright, was unable for some time to afford assistance, and the unfortunate woman, who was 60 years of age, expired the next morning. She was unable to tell how the accident happened.—Accidental Death.

A shocking accident befel the footman of Mrs. Barkett, of Kensington, yesterday, at Knightsbridge. The carriage had stopped for a few minutes at a gentleman's house, and the footman waited, speaking to another servant, after the coachman had driven off; on attempting to mount behind, he overballanced himself, and fell on the hinder wheel, which broke his arm, and afterwards passed over his breast. The poor man was put into the coach and conveyed to Mrs. Barkett's house without hopes of recovery.

Friday se'nnight the range of offices in the gallery over the Royal Exchange were discovered, by the watchmen to be broken open. Some of the doors had been wrenched open with crows, others were found open, without any marks of violence, the locks having been picked. The Merchant Seamens' Office was broken open, but fortunately the villains found no plunder; 700*l.* which had been set apart for a payment that morning to the seamens' widows, escaped their hands, by the strength of the iron chest, in which it was contained. Mr. Chapman's office shared a similar fate, from which was taken two quarters of a Lottery Ticket in the present Lottery. Mr. Hodges lost two pieces of Irish cloth. Mr Wartnaby's premises were also broken open, but the plunderers found nothing that they could carry off. They also broke open the iron chest in the countinghouse of Mr. Secretan, strewed all the papers about the room, and left behind them marks of indecency. Mr. Smith lost about 40*l.* in cash, and 700*l.* in bills. Messrs. Rivers and Angerstein lost about 90*l.* in money. Mr. Parish about 40*l.* amongst which was a draft for 5*l.* which the villains contrived to get paid the same morning. The River Dee Office was likewise broken open, but nothing stolen. In short, every office round the place was entered. The Royal Exchange and Lloyd's being well watched, they did not attempt them. The Royal Exchange Assurance Office was attempted, but the villains failed. No clue whatever was left to lead to the depredators.

BIRTH.

At Plymouth Dock, the Lady of Commodore Sir Richard King, Bart. of a daughter.

MARRIED.

On Tuesday, the Rev. Robert Henry Johnson, Rector of Wistansow, and Vicar of Staunton Lacey, in Salop, to Carolina, second daughter of Sir Charles Wm. Rouse Boughton, of Rouse Lench, in the county of Worcester, Bart.

DIED.

Last week, in Clerkenwell workhouse, William Paddock, Pastrycook, in the 77th year of his age: he was well known for many years, being remarkable for singing convivial songs at public-houses adjacent to the two Houses of Parliament, and being a choice spirit, always went by the name of My Soul!—He was a companion of the late Charles Bannister, and also much noticed by the celebrated, though eccentric character, George Morland. He was much addicted to drinking spirits, and the day previous to his death drank, in the course of one hour, what he facetiously called fire-balls, no less than seventeen glasses of gin.

Lately, near Cullybackey, in Ireland, Martha Hanna, aged 126 years: she was born near Dungannon, and remembered to have heard the shots fired in an engagement that took place there in the year 1690: she was a little woman, measured this last year four feet seven inches.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FOURTEEN.

ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A HEREDITARY NOBILITY IN FRANCE.

We have at length arrived at the concluding chapter of that awful lesson which the French Revolution has published to the world. We now learn how weakly the efforts of man are adapted to his objects, and how naturally the hand of Providence can produce the greatest events, by the very means which appear to forbid them!

France, oppressed and enslaved, was roused but twenty years ago from the sluggish submission with which she had endured her thraldom, and, starting with a sudden impulse, turned furiously on the rulers who had trampled on her rights. But instead of establishing a constitution whose mutual and inherent checks might ensure the good order of her government, she rushed into an opposite and wild extreme, madly hoping to ensure her peace by the subversion of her laws, to bless her people by the despotism of her demagogues, and to confirm her honour by the destruction of her King and her Nobility. Europe trembled to its centre; and not a single throne among its hundred dynasties stood unconscious of the mighty shock. Monarchs were taught to distrust their heaven-commissioned powers, and the rights of man were dreadfully asserted in the sufferings of humanity. Justness of principle was darkened by atrocities of practice: honourable independence degenerated into brutal ferocity—and this unaccountable mixture of magnanimity and folly, of glory and disgrace, affording to the nations an example at once admirable and detestable, terrified the weak, and confounded the wise! Who that had a heart to feel for the degradation of human nature, could refuse to hail the shout of triumph which France, in the first emotion of her rising liberty, sent forth to all the Empires of Europe? Who could deny a blessing to the infant efforts of a great nation, emancipating the bulk of her population from the tyranny of needy oppressors, and vindicating the sacred privileges of freedom that are given by Nature and by God! Who was so insensible as not to rejoice that some bold arm had undertaken the demolition of that system which had pampered the Nobles, till they rose, like over-hanging trees that check vegetation and exclude the common benefits of light and heat from the humbler shrubs that grow beneath them?—Yet who, that understood the real nature of human governments, could refrain from expressions of disgust and despair, when the reform of particular abuses became the ruin of all civil institutions, and the freedom of the subject was purchased by the slaughter of the sovereign: when every thing that for centuries had been deemed noble, honourable, and great, was swept away in one undiscriminating extermination; when virtue was punished for its connection with nobility, merely because nobility had required punishment for its connection with vice: when all the customs of society, all the charities of the human heart, were sacrificed to the ambition of wicked adventurers, and the spirit of virtue was extinguished with the hope of reward; when the smiling plains of France, on which the day-star of Liberty had so brightly dawned, became one vast and desolated wilderness, where the horizon was overclouded by the darkness of a new despotism, where the poor were not satisfied, and weariness found no repose!

But the faults, the follies, and the miseries of the multitude, have always been productive of advantage to the few: and among the generals and statesmen who rose amid the misfortunes of their country, appeared one leader of a genius proudly pre-eminent, who made morality a shadow, and used the glories of all former conquerors but as a contrast; danger was his stepping stone, and anarchy was his path of power. With rapid strides he advanced amid the tumult of his time: and now, Emperor of France, and arbitor of a host of Princes, he triumphs in his own security, and wields the empire of the world!

When we view these strange and sublime events, when we contemplate a nation which plunged into liberty only to be dashed once more upon the strand of despotism, when we trace the steps of a ruler who rose by republicanism to a throne, and aided the suppression of a stubborn aristocracy, that he might erect a Nobility whom he could mould, we are struck at once with a contempt and an admiration of human nature.—France, after seas of blood have flowed over her fields, to moisten the newly-struck roots that were shooting from her tree of liberty, has submitted once more to arbitrary power, and lost every trace of her popular independence. A new Nobility is established, which is bound to the Emperor by the remembrance of a partnership in dangers past, by the hope of participation in honours to come, by the certainty of enjoyment in the distinctions and property already possessed. Nobles, endowed with titles, that are destined to last but for their lives, might have found a motive for rebellion in the desire of security; at present all is secured by the Emperor's constitution, and the Emperor's constitution itself becomes the more secure. The government of his annexed dominions is already settled; every day contributes to its confirmation. The death of his favourites at home will create no confusion: for the succession to their titles and fortunes is fixed to their heirs. Bonaparte himself stands on high, the centre of government, the dispenser of fortune and honour, the cause at once of his country's greatness, and of her slavery. One thing only is wanting to perpetuate his Empire: and that one thing is, the freedom of his subjects. The French people should share in the legislative power, and each annexed domain should send its representatives to the deliberative councils of the Metropolitan state. Then France might be happy, and her Ruler powerful: now, the people are, indeed, more powerful abroad, but as much enslaved at home as in the days of their Kings. They wake, and think that they have dreamed: for all is in its ancient course. We, who have looked on, admire the wonderful ways of heaven: for the career of revolution has concluded at the starting place from which it began, and millions have been weak and wicked, only that an individual may be great!

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XIV.

THE DUTY OF NEWSPAPERS.

The list of periodical works is daily increasing, and the vices of these productions appear to be augmented with their numbers. When Newspapers first appear in a country, they confine themselves to the publication of such intelligence and such reasonings as may inform or influence the rational part of the community; but the power that resides in the hands of Newspaper politicians is exceedingly dangerous, even while the press is thus made the channel only of new facts and conscientious opinions. For most writers, even if unconnected with a particular party, have, at least, an attachment to particular prejudices: those attachments they publish, and the minds of young and weak persons, and even of that great mass of sensible men who never take the trouble of judging for themselves, are affected and often decided by such partial reasonings. If the power of the periodical papers is to be dreaded, when the smallness of their numbers occasions them, like the upright Roman who dwelt on a hill above the city, to occupy a pre-eminence where nothing hides them from the public eye, how much more dangerous do they become, when surrounded by a host of neighbours, who increase their inducements, and conceal their deviations, to vice! In such a predicament are the journals of the present day. Their multitude preserves them from investigation: all may hope to pass in the crowd, and all are tempted to swerve either toward the right or toward the left, in order to arrive as conveniently as possible at their journey's end. Thus the Newspapers, instead of directing the stream of the public, have begun to follow it. No man now lays down for his readers those principles, which his readers ought to adopt; but every one adopts those principles which his readers have chosen to lay down. The Editor of a Newspaper is now, what a physician is at a fashionable watering place: a parasite who feels pulses with a selfish care; who, if he finds the health perfect, persuades the patient into illness, in order to get the business of curing him: who, if the constitution be actually disordered, feeds the flame that preys upon the vitals, and pleases the palate by poisoning the blood!

A Paper, which, like The National Register, professes to be a work of record, should be peculiarly careful of hazarding any observations that may appear to spring from a party motive. There are two parties at present in the State, and an implicit adherence to either of them is equally absurd. For the Ministerial set have faults which every friend of the constitution must deeply deplore: and the Opposition have follies which the enemies of the country must hail with rapture. On the one side is the name of the King, the imposing appearance of established power, the dignity of high situation, and the reverential favour with which most people are very justly inclined to regard the existing government of a state. On the other is an assemblage of able, powerful, and wealthy men, frequently injudicious in their practice, but almost always correct in their principles. Between these two parties the Newspapers have thought it necessary to make a choice: and instead of ranging themselves on the sides of establishment and reform, of crown and people, of peace and war, they almost all enlist beneath the banners of the Percevals and Camings on the one hand, or of the Grenvilles and Greys on the other. Men, and not measures, have been the objects of their attachment. Now, in public life, where a person, in order to be any thing, must belong to a party, we can easily understand why party should get the better of principle, and be employed to supply its place: but we cannot help thinking that in literature, where a blind determination is not requisite, where soundness of theory is expected rather than promptitude of action, impartiality would succeed better than undiscriminating enthusiasm, even if it were only from the charm of novelty. But the truth is, that the temptations which induce the Proprietors of Newspapers to swerve from the plain and manly conduct they should pursue, and descend to party falsehood and personal spite, are temptations of a very mean and unimportant class: temptations that, in the true nature of devilish seduction, afford a little for the present, only that they may damn more completely for the future: and Newspapers, in order to obtain a temporary popularity with a party, commit themselves by statements that degrade their character, and finally expose them to public contempt. Like all traitors, they are paid till the treason is complete: and then the very persons who have employed or encouraged them, are the first to exclaim against their falsehood and their folly.

In this Paper we wish, upon principle, to lean toward the side of the crown. For it seems that he who can divest himself of all party prejudice, and love the constitution sincerely, must be a friend of the great principles upon which the constitution depends: and as the principle of our constitution, though under many limitations, is on the whole monarchical, a paper which ventures to take the title of The National Register, ought to incline rather toward the kingly than toward the democratic part of the State. Not that we are at all disposed to compromise the rights of the people: for that, in our opinion, would be ultimately to injure the people and the crown too; but we wish to prove, that as it is the real and grand policy of the crown to avoid the oppression of the people, the people, when they have once submitted themselves to authority, are in duty bound to uphold the authority they have created; to oppose it by no vexatious obstacles; to infringe no portion of its just prerogative; and to deny to it no species of honourable influence.

It ought to be always remembered, that the actual power of the crown is not great in this country; that the weight of the royal branch of the legislature consists much more in opinion than in substance. This is one of the axioms which it is at this moment most particularly important to enforce, because there seems to be a party daily increasing, a party led, or rather misled, by certain factious scribblers, who teach that the essence of the British Constitution is the absolute despotism of the people, and that the balance of power is to be kept even by throwing all the weight into one of the scales! Absurd as the doctrine appears, it has many followers. If the power of the crown were real and substantial, the idea would not be dangerous: but since the power of the crown depends, as we have said, upon the opinion of the people, it is surely the duty of all who wish to see the enormous might of the Commons kept in check by the operation of royal power and influence, to aid the only means by which that power and that influence can be supported, namely, the constitutional prerogative, and the respectful feelings of the people.

We acknowledge that the free discussion of the rights of the branches of the Legislature is productive of good to all; one of the greatest blessings of the Constitution is the very privilege of speaking, and even publishing, all fair opinions; but the privilege is too often abused, and unfair opinions are foolishly imagined and sophistically preached. We are the advocates of liberty; but we have a right to advise our contemporaries not to make their liberty licentiousness. Some persons believe that violence on either side can do no harm to the country, because the violence is sure to be equal on the other side; but the martyrs of the inquisition never found their frames contrived knit when four horses were dragging their limbs in four different directions. Antidotes are very necessary after poisons; but it is a safer plan to feed on a moderate and ordinary diet, than to take poisons and antidotes in the most regular variety.

The National Register will not therefore lend itself to a Party; it will not admit the grossness of personality, nor the flippancy of epigram, in those grave Disquisitions which purport to be the real sentiments of its Conductors; For those Conductors are well aware, that when their Paper begins to be a Register of Party, it will cease to be a National Register.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, GERMAN, AND HAMBURGH PAPERS.

FRANCE.

PARIS, MARCH 12.—By an Imperial Decree of the day before yesterday, an University is established, to which is entrusted the care of supervising public instruction through the whole French empire.

The following is the oath to be taken by the new Nobility:—"I swear to be faithful to the Emperor and his dynasty; to be obedient to the constitution, laws, and institutions of the empire; to serve his Majesty as a good, upright, and faithful subject; to educate my children in the same feelings of fidelity and obedience, and to march in defence of my country as soon as its territory shall be threatened, or as his Majesty shall go to the Army."

Further, a Council has been established for the sealing of titles, consisting of three Senators, two Councillors of State, one Attorney-General, and one Secretary-General. The expences of this Council are to be discharged out of that which persons are to pay for their patents of Nobility.

The Moniteur of March 23 contains the intelligence of the march of the Russian troops into Finland, and the arrest of the Russian Minister at Stockholm, with the sealing of his papers, &c. It adds the following remarks:—

"Such an outrage on the rights of nations, which is known only to barbarians, has roused the indignation of the whole world. Of what does the King of Sweden complain? That Russia has declared war against him! More than six months are passed since Russia intimated to him that all the principles of neutrality had been broken, and that his alliance with England could not be suffered, so that war must necessarily follow.—On the other side a French army is entering Zealand, and all preparations are making to send these allies of England to America, that they may reign there. The King of England may, doubtless, congratulate himself again in Parliament, as he did before, on the new power he grants to his Ally: it is pretended also, that England is to give St. Thomas's to the King of Sweden as an indemnification. Thus the brave Swedish Nation, after having seen their commerce annihilated, is torn to pieces by a war in their interior. How dreadful a calamity it is for a nation to have a King who is governed by levity and folly!"

PRUSSIA.

KONIGSBERG, MARCH 8.—Our Court has published the following Declaration:—

"His Royal Majesty the King of Prussia, our most gracious Sovereign, has been solicited by both Imperial Courts of Paris and St. Petersburgh, consistently with the system of the other powers of the Continent, and the declaration against England, to extend the same measures against Sweden, which have been taken against England, on account of her fresh alliance with that power. In imitation of the declaration issued by the Emperor of Russia on the 10th (22d) of February, in this year, his Majesty has accordingly broken off all Relations with Sweden, and commands all in office under him, under the penalty of severe punishment, to refrain from all community or intercourse whatever with Sweden. In pursuance of this, from the present moment, and till further orders, all Prussian harbours shall be utterly closed against Swedish vessels; Prussian vessels shall no longer be sent into Sweden, neither shall Swedish or neutral ships, or wares which come from Sweden, be admitted into Prussian harbours.—Konigsberg, March 6."

A meeting of the States (viz. Parliament) of East Prussia was held on the 2d of February, and dissolved on the 17th of the same month, in order to consult on the means of relieving the country from the consequences of the disasters it had endured. The owners of land, not proprietors, were called to the meeting, so that the Diet consisted of 23 noble and 13 civic Deputies.

TURKEY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, FEB. 6.—Intelligence has been received here not only of the honourable reception of the French Ambassador, Gen. Gardanne, at the Court of Persia, but also of the beneficial effects of his first negociation. It is, for instance, affirmed, that the ancient treaty between France and Persia has been renewed. These tidings, which are confirmed by various letters received here, have enticed several French mercantile houses, which were settled at Constantinople, to establish themselves in Persia.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, MARCH 28.

The Royal Assent was given by Commission to the Orders in Council Bill, and several other Public and Private Bills.

The House in a Committee heard Counsel and several witnesses in support of the Petitions against the Orders in Council. The tendency of the evidence was to attribute to those Orders the present stagnation of Commerce. The most interesting details connected with this subject were related by Mr. Glennie of London, and Mr. Martin, of Liverpool.

Mr. Glennie stated, that he received remittances on American account from the Continent to an amount considerably upwards of half a million yearly. He could positively state, that of the vessels bound to ports on the Continent, the proceeds of whose cargoes were placed at his disposal, not one had been confiscated. He had been usually in advance to the British manufacturers, upon the drafts of his American Correspondents, to the extent of 30,000*l.* but had begun to decline making any such advances as early as October last, in consequence of the capture by a Plymouth Privateer of an American vessel consigned to him. The remittances from the Continent had rapidly declined since the issuing of the Orders in Council, and would speedily cease altogether, as he was now receiving only the arrears of the cargoes landed on the Continent previous to the American Embargo. This measure he conceived to have resulted entirely from the expectation of the Orders in Council, the purport of which he had seen pretty accurately stated in an American Paper of the 15th or 16th of December. The explanation given at Paris, in September, of the Berlin Decree, could not in his conception, be regarded as the immediate cause of the embargo, as it must have reached America long prior to the imposition of the embargo, which was enacted the 22d, and took effect on the 26th of December.

Mr. Martin stated the details of the American commerce with the port of Liverpool, and spoke generally to the injurious effects of the Orders in Council upon that branch of traffic. It appeared clearly from his evidence, that the purport of the Orders in Council reached America on the 12th of December. The earliest copies of the Orders received in Liverpool did not arrive until the 16th or 17th of November; but he had been apprised of their contents so long prior to that date, as to be enabled, on the 12th of November, to communicate them in a printed Circular to his American Correspondents.

At nine o'clock the House was resumed, and the further hearing of the evidence postponed to Thursday.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29.

LORD HOLLAND entered upon a discussion of the general policy of the Orders in Council, particularly attaching himself to the consideration of their probable effect on the United States of America. The Noble Lord considered it as the dictates of sound policy to cherish the friendship of America, as affording the consolatory prospect of rearing a great Transatlantic Power, which, united with England, would effectually control the military despotism which threatened to unite the whole Continent of Europe under one dominion. He concluded with moving five resolutions, forming an abstract of the chief topics of his speech.

LORD WESTMORELAND asserted, that if war were to take place with America, it would be more proper to ascribe it to the effect of the speeches which had been delivered in Parliament, than to any thing done by his Majesty's Ministers.

LORD LAUDERDALE considered the evidence delivered at the bar as conclusive, with respect to the injurious operation of the Orders in Council, and as having established the fact of their being the immediate cause of the American Embargo.

Lord Grenville supported, and Lord Hawkesbury opposed the resolutions; which, after a short reply from Lord Holland, was negatived, on a division, by a majority of 53 to 25.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30.

The Bills on the table were forwarded one stage, and several orders were made respecting the hearing of Appeals.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 31.

Lord Waldegrave took the oaths and his seat, on coming of age.

Several witnesses were examined in support of the Petition against the Orders in Council, and the examination was ordered to be further proceeded in on Monday next.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 1.

Received from the Commons, and read a first time, the Irish Cotton and Bark Bills.

The Duke of Norfolk presented a Petition from the Corporation of London, praying for the abolition of sinecure places and pensions. His Grace stated, that it was unanimously agreed to by the most numerous meeting of the Common Council which had occurred for many years. As an opportunity would most probably soon be afforded of recurring to the subject of the petition, he would satisfy himself at present, with moving that the petition should lie on the table. Ordered.

The Cotton Wool Export Prohibition Bill, was read a second time, after a few observations from Lord Lauderdale, who represented it as unjust to a neutral and friendly nation, and as vesting in the crown, a power imminently dangerous to the constitution.

The Bark Bill was read a second time.

Lord Darnley remarked upon this Bill, that it was as disgraceful to ourselves as it would prove inefficient with regard to our enemies.

Lord Holland intimated, that he might have to present a petition against the Bill before it went through the Committee. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, MARCH 28.

Mr. Alderman Shaw brought up a Bill for enlarging the Market Place in Smithfield; and a Bill for consolidating into one Act the several Acts for the Recovery of Small Debts in the City of London.—Read a first time each.

Mr. Biddulph, Chairman of the Penrhyn Election Committee, reported that Mr. C. Bell was duly elected; and that the Petition against his return was not frivolous or vexatious.

Mr. W. M. Pitt, Chairman of the Stirling Election Committee, reported, that the Sitting Member was duly elected, and that the Petition of Sir J. Henderson, Bart. against his return, was not frivolous or vexatious.

The Sheriffs of London presented a Petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Commons of the same, against the Bill for constructing a Bridge across the Thames, from the Savoy's Precinct to Cuper's Bridge on the Surrey side. The Petition stated, that the Lord Mayor was Conservator of the Thames, and that the Bill was prejudicial to the interest of the Corporation.—Referred to the Committee on the Bill, and ordered to be heard against the same by Council.

Mr. Whitbread put a question to Mr. Canning, whether since April and October last, there had been any communication with Austria; as there had been very recently published the Declaration of Austria, asserting, that there had been such a communication made to Great Britain in July; and also, that Prince Stahremberg had been ordered by Austria to offer her mediation between France and Great Britain.

Mr. Canning replied, that he was not aware of any such communication having been made. What had passed between Government and Prince Stahremberg, was by no means of the nature alluded to by the Honourable Gentleman.

Mr. Bankes rose to move for leave to bring in a Bill prohibiting the Grant of Offices in Reversion for Joint-Lives, with Benefit of Survivorship. At some length he went into the merits of the former Bill, which had been negatived in the Upper House, and described his intention of proposing in the present Bill, that no Office should be in future granted, but on a vacancy occurring. He meant also, in order to do away any objections to this Bill in another place, to move that it should only endure for a time to be limited. He concluded by moving for leave to bring in a Bill.

Mr. Percival said he had no objection to the motion, but in its future stage he should submit certain amendments which would tend to insure the Bill passing in the other House. He intended, as one of his amendments, to propose, that whenever any grant should be conceded by the Crown, that notice of the same should, soon thereafter, be inserted in the Gazettee; and also that every such grant should be subject to abolition, either by the King, or by an Address of the House to his Majesty to that effect. He believed these provisions would meet the approbation of the House.

The Hon. Mr. Ward spoke in favour of the Bill, and said the chief benefit it held out was, that the office was necessarily abolished by the demise of an incumbent. He did not look to economy as a means of alleviating the burdens imposed on the people, but the people ought to be informed that they did not suffer privations for establishments that were unnecessary. There was a faction in the country, unconnected with Parliament, bent upon blackening its character, which said that the Parliament was all equally corrupt. Such an allegation was certainly calumnious, but the House ought to demonstrate, by agreeing to the Bill, that they were unfounded. He supported the splendour of the Crown, but if the Bill was to be opposed by those illustrious names he read in the paper in his hand (the Report from the Committee), it was in vain almost to attempt it.

Mr. Percival explained.

Mr. W. Dundas defended the prerogative of the Crown, and insisted, if the Bill passed into a law, it would not have the effect anticipated by the Hon. Mover.

Mr. Ponsonby explained the prerogative of the Crown, so far as the people were concerned, in supporting unnecessary taxation. But Parliament had a right to interfere, when the Crown took too rapid strides, as in the present instance.

After a few words from Mr. I. H. Browne and Mr. Bankes, leave was given to bring in the Bill.

Mr. S. Bernard took a melancholy view of the profligacy concomitant upon Lotteries, and moved, that a Committee be appointed to enquire into the evils respecting Lotteries since the last laws had been passed to remedy the same.

Mr. Percival had no objection to the motion; but from his situation he could not consent to abolish Lotteries generally, at the same time he could have no objection to the Committee. The Committee was accordingly appointed.

The House then went through the ordinary routine, and adjourned at Half-past Eight o'clock.

TUESDAY, MARCH 29.

Lord Folkestone rose to trouble the House with a motion, in relation to the restoration of the Danish Fleet. When our Expedition first sailed, Ministers held out they were ready to receive the Danish Fleet as a deposit till a definitive Treaty of Peace, but that proposal was rejected by Denmark; and he was not surprised at the rejection of such a proposal by a Power that wished to maintain its independence. The Noble Lord argued, that Ministers had shewn no ground for violently having seized the Danish fleet, and the demand to keep it till a peace he considered a mere pretence to induce the Danes to cede it, in order to get it entirely, and for ever, into our possession. He concluded with entreating his Majesty to return the Danish fleet, on the restoration of a general peace.

The Hon. T. Brand seconded the motion. He certainly thought that Ministers, in regard to Copenhagen, had acted with propriety; but when their conduct had been investigated they had assumed grounds in defence, which they had not produced in the face of Europe, or manifested to the satisfaction of the people of Great Britain.

Mr. S. Thornton conceived that the conduct of Ministers was justified by that line of conduct which Belligerents had a right to resort to. He thought, however, that the question of its restoration ought to be left to the discretion of Ministers.

Sir T. Turton opposed the motion.

After several Members had spoken for and against the motion the House divided—For the motion 44—Against it 105.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 30.

Mr. Fane, from the Christchurch Election Committee, reported at the Bar, that Mr. Rose and Mr. Sturges Bourne had been duly elected, and that the Freeholders Petition against their return was found frivolous and vexatious.

Sir John Newport gave notice of his intention to move for certain Papers respecting the granting Offices in Reversion in Ireland.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Brogden and Mr. Mellish presented Petitions from the Inhabitants of Wandsworth, Battersea, Pimlico, Kensington, and Knightsbridge, in favour of the intended Bridge across the Thames, at Vauxhall.

The consideration of the Donnegal Election Petition was postponed to the 3d of May next.

The Orders in Council Indemnity Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. Calcraft asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer across the table, what proceedings he intended to found on the Report of the Medical Committee; the Chancellor replied, that since the Report had been presented he had not had sufficient time to read it, but he would very soon give it due consideration.

The Irish Cotton Wool, and Bark Prohibition Bill, was read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, MARCH 31.

The Indictments Bill, and the Orders in Council Indemnity Bill, were severally read a third time and passed.

In a Committee leave was given to bring in a Bill for preventing the Exportation of Wool to Ireland, unless a bond for its being landed in Ireland be previously given.

Mr. Bankes brought up a Bill Prohibiting the Grant of Places in Reversion for Joint Lives, with Benefit of Survivorship, for a time to be limited. Read a first time.

Sir J. Newport moved for a Return of all Offices granted in Reversion in Ireland, to two or more persons for their concurrent lives.

Mr. Foster said, that such a return had been made during the Lieutenancy of the Duke of Bedford.

Sir J. Newport said, that in the last return five of these offices had been omitted. The last return was made eight days before the Duke of Bedford acted as Lord Lieutenant. The Account was ordered.

The Dublin Police Bill was read a second time, committed, the blanks filled up, the Report received, ordered to be printed amended, and the Bill to be taken into further consideration on Thursday, the 28th of April next.

Lord A. Hamilton rose to submit certain resolutions for indemnifying the Nabob of Oude for the treatment he had experienced from the Marquis Wellesley. The Noble Lord moved a string of Resolutions, stating generally, that by the Treaty between Lord Teignmouth and the Nabob of Oude, the annual subsidy of the Nabob was 56 lacs of rupees, but that by the Treaty with Lord Wellesley that sum had been encreased to 790 Lacs.—The last resolution suggested the propriety of the East India Company revising that Treaty, in order that the Nabob might be indemnified for the losses he had sustained.

Mr. Dundas moved the previous question on all the Noble Lord's resolutions, excepting the last, to which he said, he should give a flat and positive negative.

Mr. H. Martin supported the resolutions; contending, that no case had been made out, shewing, that there was the smallest particle of either justice or policy in the conduct of Lord Wellesley towards the Nabob of Oude.

Mr. R. Thornton had always deprecated the policy pursued by Marquis Wellesley in India. The unfortunate Nabob had been very ill treated, in compelling him to sign a Treaty under the horrors of compulsion. The House, therefore, ought to do justice to the injured Prince. The Nabob had, in all respects, been treated like Bonaparte's conquered Princes, in squeezing from them their last penny; under the pretence of its being done by way of "Treaty" he was sorry to use strong language, but the circumstances warranted it. The Court of Directors never sanctioned the measure; they had been called upon to give their usual approbation before they had read the Treaty.

The House divided—For the previous question 80—Against it 20.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 1.

The Sheriffs of London presented at the Bar two Petitions from the Corporation; one against the Vauxhall Bridge Bill, and the other in favour of the Reversion Bill; which, on the motion of Sir C. Price, were read, and ordered to be laid upon the table.

Mr. Sumner presented a Petition from the inhabitants of Stockwell and Camberwell, in favour of the Vauxhall Bridge Bill. Another Petition was presented by Mr. S. Thornton, from the inhabitants of Clapham and neighbourhood, in favour of the same Bill.

Mr. Banks, from the Sussex Election Committee, reported, that John Fuller, Esq. had been duly elected; and that Col. Sergison's Petition was not frivolous nor vexatious.

The Bill for enlarging Smithfield Market was read a second time.

Sir E. Knatchbull presented a Petition from the debtors confined in Maidstone Gaol, praying for relief, which was laid upon the table.

Mr. Byng presented a Petition from certain inhabitants in the western part of the metropolis, in favour of the Vauxhall Bridge Bill.

The Bill to prevent the granting of Offices in Reversion was read a second time.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of Ways and Means, when The Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the future management of the Game Duties be taken from the Stamp Office and added to the Assessed Taxes, for the more effectual means of collecting the same, and that Woodcocks and Snipes should, in future, be considered as Game, so as to prevent persons from eluding the payment of Game Licences. The Assessed Taxes amounted to five millions five hundred thousand pounds; he proposed to equalize the Taxes under that head, adding 2 per cent. which would yield 110,000*l.*

Mr. W. S. Stanhope complained of the different surcharges made by Surveyors, frequently from wanton motives, which he hoped would be remedied.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer observed, it was his intention to submit a Bill to the House for that express purpose.

Mr. T. T. Jones said, that taxes were rendered more odious by the surcharges made by Surveyors, whom the people considered pests of society. In one district, he knew 700 surcharges, and only one out of that number was substantiated. Surveyors, in such cases, ought to be severely punished.—After a few words from Mr. Biddulph and Mr. Huskisson, the resolutions were agreed to, and the report was ordered to be received on Monday.

Mr. Farquhar brought in a Bill to amend the Act of the 41st of his present Majesty, for the admission of Public Notaries.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee, when the following grants were made to his Majesty, viz. 63,399*l.* 6*s.* for carrying on the Military Canal; 1299*l.* 4*s.* for the Thames Police Establishment; 3500*l.* for the Board of Work; 348*l.* 11*s.* to the Commissioners for investigating the debts of the Prince of Wales; 3597*l.* 6*s.* Bounty on Fish imported to the West Indies from British Colonies in America; 219*l.* to Mr. Clementson, Sergeant of that House, for house-rent; 556*l.* 15*s.* to Dr. Broom Clerk, for Expences incurred in the Non-residence Bill; 1613*l.* to W. Watson, Esq. Sergeant of the House of Lords; 2298*l.* 13*s.* to Lord Walsingham, as Chairman of the Committees in the House of Lords; 1560*l.* to Mr. Grant, Secretary to the Commissioners of Military Enquiry; 127*l.* 19*s.* 6*d.* additional to Dr. Broom Clerk; 661*l.* 9*s.* to Mr. Grove, for removing certain monuments in Westminster Abbey; 344*l.* 14*s.* to the Cashier of the Stationary Office; 2175*l.* for New South Wales; 434*l.* 17*s.* to Mr. Nettleship, Clerk of the Grocers' Company, for Sugar-returns; 166*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* for a Bill drawn on Mr. Chinnery, from St. Vincent's; 1,328*l.* to L. Hansard, for printing the New Plan of Finance; 3,236*l.* 10*s.* to Mrs. Parke, widow of Mungo Parke; 1,085*l.* to Mr. Anderson, her father, who accompanied that traveller; 5,135*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.* to Sir S. Hood, for arrears of salary while one of the Commissioners of Trinidad; 6,702*l.* 18*s.* 2½*d.* to the representatives of Col. Fullarton, for ditto; 2,311*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* to Col. Rutherford, Surveyor General of Trinidad; 366*l.* 18*s.* to H. Gunnel, Esq. to pay Clerks attending on Committees; 762*l.* to E. Stracy, Counsel to the Chairman of the Committees in the House of Lords; 6,345*l.* 16*s.* for the Horse Patrole round the metropolis; 82*l.* 11*d.* to J. Dubois, an American Loyalist; 19*l.* 12*s.* for Mathematical Instruments sent to New South Wales. The Report was ordered to be received on Monday.

The Bill for abolishing certain Fees in the Customs in Ireland, was read a first time.

The Irish East India Warehousing Bill was read a third time and passed.

The House then went into a Committee on the Petitions from Liverpool, London, and Manchester, against the late Orders in Council. Mr. Broughton was heard, at great length, in summing up the evidence, in favour of the Petitioners. The House was resumed; and, after Mr. Rose had intimated his intention of calling evidence early in the ensuing week, in support of the Orders in Council, the House adjourned till Monday.

IRELAND.

At a late hour on Wednesday, March 3, Judge Day got through the whole of the calendar at Clonmell, notwithstanding it was remarkably heavy; a great number of prisoners, however, were discharged for want of prosecution. It is fully understood amongst the common people in that country, that any person who comes forward to support a prosecution must abandon his home for ever, and settle in a distant part of the kingdom. There were in all but six persons executed. Fielding, who rejected the offer of pardon on becoming an evidence against his master, John Ryan, for the murder of Burke and Doherty, and burning the house at Chantersland, and who in consequence was tried and convicted himself for the same offence, was executed on Wednesday. When at the gallows he expressed the utmost regret, that his obstinacy had been of no use to his master, and that he had fallen a useless sacrifice. —In the charge of the Honourable Justice Day, to the Grand Jury of the county of Tipperary, he said, upon looking through your Calendar, I perceive, with infinite regret and pain, that the afflicting reports from hence appear to have been in no wise exaggerated. If the Calendar (as I have sometimes heard it called) be the criminal Barometer of Baillwicke, if the state of the gaol be no unfaithful epitome of the moral and civil condition of the county at large, then is the state of civil society in your county deplorable in the extreme. I hold in my hand a paper, which for its size and quantity of matter, resembles more the chart of a county than the Calendar of its gaol; an affecting catalogue of 148 of our unfortunate fellow creatures incarcerated since the last assizes, under charges of the deepest atrocity. In truth, it is a downright misnomer, a gross abuse and perversion of a language to say that civil society exists in a country so inundated with crime.

PROVINCIALS.

CAUTION TO SERVANTS.—At the last Kingston Assizes, Charles Martin, coachman to Sir William Rush, was tried on an indictment for defrauding his master of 2s. 4d. by overcharging for bating his horses on the 19th of October last. This small sum was selected as admitting of the most easy proof; but it appears, from his weekly books, and the testimony of the different tradesmen, that he has been for a long time in the habit of overcharging all the articles which went through his hands full one-third, and often much more; that he frequently charged expences not incurred, and on other occasions never paid the bills for which he received the amount from his master. In one instance he charged Sir William Rush, from Nov. 4 to Dec. 21, at Brighton, 4*l.* 16*s.* for eight bushel of beans, while it appears, from the declaration of the stable-keeper, that the horses had only 1*s.* worth of beans during the above time. The charge in the indictment being clearly proved, he was sentenced to twelve months imprisonment. The above example, it is hoped, will operate as a salutary warning to servants. Their wages have of late years been so high as to leave them wholly without excuse for fraud; and the trust necessarily placed in them is so great, that no punishment, short of capital, can be too great for the breach of it. It is a duty, therefore, which every Gentleman owes to society, to prosecute the offenders. On this ground the learned Judge observed, that Sir William Rush deserved the thanks of the county for bringing this man to justice.

At the last Assizes for the county of Dorset, a cause was tried of considerable importance to people in private life, who are able to keep servants.—An indictment was brought by Jos. Hyde against J. S. Barham, Esq. for an assault.—The former was servant to the defendant, by whom he had been discharged, but who refused to quit the house. A struggle ensued, and in the end the prosecutor being turned out of the house, he indicted his master at the next Assizes. The defendant was acquitted, to the satisfaction of a crowded Court, as it appeared that when a master discharges a servant for improper behaviour, and the latter refuses to go, the necessary force may be used to effect his removal.

At the late Hereford Assizes, in an action brought by Miss Matty, of the Wear, near Hereford, against Mr. Wilson, Attorney, near Ross, to recover 1000*l.* the penalty of a bond granted by the Defendant to the Plaintiff, promising her marriage, the Jury, after a long trial, gave a verdict for 600*l.*

ANTIQUITIES.—There was discovered in digging a trench near Broadgate House, in the neighbourhood of Ing Chapel, in Cumberland, a Roman bulla, at the depth of two feet below the surface of the earth. It is a very uniform ring, made of jet, and retains a very beautiful polish; although it can scarce be less than 1380 years old; it being so long since the Romans quitted Britain. The diameter of this bulla or ring, at the outside of the rim is 3 inches and ¼th: and its inside, or shortest diameter, is 2 inches and 4-10ths—and the specific gravity of this light yet durable substance is only as 1238 to one when compared with rain water: that is bulk for bulk; this jet being scarce one and a quarter the weight of rain water; and therefore more convenient to wear at the breast, as an ornament, than a heavier substance.

A person near Braintree, in Essex, has long had annually, an acre of carrots for horse food, which he considers also most excellent for cows, as contributing greatly to an increase of the richness and flavour of their milk. He estimates one bushel of carrots to be in nutriment and value equal to one peck of oats. He has allowed one bushel of carrots per horse, per day, without oats, for four winter months. If not used till dry, they are, of all vegetables, the least laxative. He sows from eight to ten pounds of seed per acre. Had once 600 bushels; but not more, on an average of three years, than from three to 400 bushels per acre.

Sir Joseph Banks, from various experiments, and the experience of many years, recommends a general revival of the now almost obsolete practice of laying straw under strawberry plants, when the fruit begins to swell, by which means the roots are shaded from the sun, the waste of moisture, by evaporation, prevented the leaning fruit kept from damage by resting on the ground, particularly in wet weather, and much labour in watering saved. Twenty trusses of long straw are sufficient for 1800 feet of plants.

Mr. Russell, a farmer, at Gressenhall, Norfolk, has this year an ewe, five years old, which has yeaned four lambs; they are all well, two are bringing up as cots, the other two are nursed by the mother. It is remarkable of this ewe, that she has yeaned within four year 22 lambs, of which only five have died.

Experimental agriculturists now strongly recommend, instead of styes for pigs, that every farmer should get cots made on wheels, which may be shifted from place to place, and if necessary, moved about on grass land for its improvement.

At Wrexham fair, which commenced on Tuesday, the shew of Irish, Manchester, Yorkshire, and Birmingham manufactures was very great. Owing to the late winds, the arrivals from Ireland were late. Linens in general looked down; and speculative purchases were made to a considerable amount, in the hope of an amicable adjustment with America. Leather retained its price, and much business was done.

A few days since a violent explosion happened at the gunpowder works, belonging to Messrs. Jeakens and Love, at Battle, in Sussex. The fire began in the corning-house, and communicated from thence to a magazine, wherein were upwards of 200 barrels of gunpowder, the explosion of which swept away the drying-house, running-house, and other buildings. Two men who were at work were killed, and a child lost its life by being struck by some of the shattered ruins.

A pair of oxen, which had been worked, and fatted on grass and hay only, by Thomas Tourle, Esq. of Landport, were last week slaughtered in Lewis, and weighed, one the amazing weight of 192 stone, and the other 182 stone; a degree of weight and fatness which has, perhaps, been never exceeded by any two bullocks, fed on grass and hay only, in the kingdom.

There is now in a garden at the High-house, near Morpeth, a strawberry in blow in the open ground, or rather a northern aspect. The plant has five blossoms, the first of which has done blowing, and the strawberry is completely set.

On Monday last, a man publicly sold his wife to a fisherman, in the market at Brighton, for twenty shillings and a blunderbuss! The disposed of female, apparently "nothing loth," walked, with her new proprietor, to a neighbouring public house, where her left-hand nuptials were celebrated, in a manner entirely suitable to the occasion! These sort of indecencies, which have of late become very frequent, we think, should be put a stop to; they are quite as disgraceful as the practice among the great, some time since prevented by an Act of the Legislature, viz. that of driving their wives into the arms of gallants, and then petitioning the Parliament to allow them to purchase new ones!

A very singular and most impudent robbery was committed on Friday se'nnight in Liverpool: A carter went to the warehouse of Mrs. Brades, and obtained from the warehouseman a load of rope, under plausible pretexts, which he carried off, and then came for another. He returned a third time, when, his purpose being suspected, he was taken into custody, and remanded for trial.

MONTHLY AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

The easterly cold dry winds, which prevailed almost during the whole of the month of March, have continued to operate beneficially upon all the more early and luxuriant young Wheat crops, by affording a seasonable check to their too forward and rapid growth; while, on the contrary, the sharp keen dry frost have had an unfavourable effect on most of the late thin crops of this valuable grain in many districts. The same causes have likewise been prejudicial to those Bean crops which had been got in at an early period, in the preceding months, and were now just beginning to appear above the ground, by giving a sudden check to their young growth, and in some more exposed situations, by almost destroying the young tender shoots. By the same means also the portions of turnip crops, which had remained from the consumption of the preceding period, have been much destroyed, so that a much smaller quantity of this sort of cattle food had been left for use in the present month than is usually the case. The cabbage cole and other similar green cattle crops have, however as usual, stood the severity of the season, will and must now be of vast service to the farmer. The later sown tares, and other artificial grasses, have, on most of the better descriptions of land, continued to have a promising appearance, and will probably afford a very desirable supply of food for stock. The dryness of the whole month, has been particularly favourable for all the different operations of the field, which, from the state of the weather in the two preceding months had been unusually retarded. The business of ploughing and sowing has been performed over a very great extent of land. From the extravagant price of peas, a more extensive space of land than usual, will be sown this year with Barley and spring Wheat, in situations where this last sort of crop is grown. A large portion of the latter has been already put into the ground. The work of making and repairing the fences has likewise been well executed throughout the whole of the month. There has been but a very poor supply of feed for the store stock which has been wintered in the pastures, of course they have not gone on to the usual proof in many places; nor has the home feeding been performed without extraordinary expence, except in cases where great attention had been paid to the rising of beneficial articles of cattle food for winter use. The dearness of hay, straw, cake, potatoes, and other sorts of dry food, have contributed greatly to this circumstance. In the spring months, the scarcity of feed for stock will probably be considerable in many districts where improved husbandry is but little practised. The dryness of the weather, during the whole of the month, has been favourable to the lambing ewes, as well as the couples with young lambs. In many situations, sheltered by the hills, and elevated grounds, the ewes, especially those of the South Down kind, have lambed down with much success, producing twins in great numbers. The state of the weather during March has also been favourable to the fattening of sheep, which have gone on to much greater proof than during the last. All sort of fatted stock is upon the advance, and there is rather a scarcity of some sorts, as hogs. Cows are rather cheaper, but low in condition.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

VICTORY IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

A respectable Banker has transmitted to Ministers, a letter from his Brother on board the Lavinia frigate, Captain HANCOCK, cruizing to the Westward. This letter, to which considerable credit is attached, states, that "Sir RICHARD "STRACHAN found in Palmas Bay, Majorca, a force of "12 sail of the line (supposed to be the United Rochefort "and Carthagena squadrons); and though he had only "eight sail of the line to oppose so very superior a force, "he gallantly determined upon bringing the enemy to ac- "tion. A most dreadful conflict ensued, which continued "several hours, and terminated in the complete defeat of "the enemy, of whose ships six were captured, three sunk, "and the remaining three effected their escape. The loss "on our side, with such immense odds against us, must "necessarily have been very considerable; and it is under- "stood that two of our ships were sunk, an Admiral, two "Captains, and upwards of fifteen hundred men killed.— "It is added, that Sir RICHARD gloriously fell towards the "close of the action."

It is evident that Government have long expected an engagement, because an order was some days ago received at Plymouth for the Masters attendant and their assistants, to hold themselves in readiness for the reception of any ships that might arrive from the West. There is therefore a great internal probability in the account we have quoted. The wind has veered into such a western direction, as to allow the conveyance of intelligence from the Mediterranean up Channel: and the easterly gales will have expedited the passage of dispatches through the Streights into the Atlantic. Sincerely as we shall rejoice in a confirmation of any favourable accounts, we must nevertheless feel that if the victory have been purchased by the death of Sir RICHARD STRACHAN, it has been purchased at a great expence. In this uncertainty, the belief of Englishmen will probably incline with their wishes, and every body will endeavour to assure himself that England has conquered, and that her Admiral is still alive. If indeed he lives, he lives for admiration: if he has died, he has died but to be immortal!

The westerly winds will aid the progress of our fleet, under the command of Admirals Sir J. SAUMAREZ, HOOD, and KEATS, which are probably by this time on their voyage toward the Baltic.

No advices from Sir RICHARD STRACHAN's squadron had reached the Admiralty at a late hour last night. A telegraphic communication from Plymouth was said to have reached the Admiralty, but its result had not transpired when this Paper was put to press; and it was not supposed to refer to the floating reports of the defeat of the French and Carthagena squadrons.

The Captain of the Portuguese vessel, Quatro Hermanos, which arrived on the 22d at Cork, reports the blockade of Lisbon to have been carried on so strictly, that not more than four vessels had entered since its commencement. He adds, that the scarcity of provisions is dreadful; that a quantity of letters, collected on board of our ships, were given to a French Officer, who was mistaken for a Russian; that this Officer took charge of them, and delivered them to JUNOT, who sent an express to Paris for instructions; and that general apprehensions were entertained of a great discovery of English property.

A flag of truce has passed between General JUNOT and Sir CHARLES COTTON, probably on the subject of an exchange of the crew of a gun-boat that was cut out of the Tagus. This communication is the source of the vague reports about the Treaty for the Evacuation of Portugal.

There have been no fresh arrivals from the North. The adverse state of the winds has prevented the passage of packets from England; and at Gottenburgh not one is left for the dispatch of ordinary business. We hope, however, that some means would be found for the conveyance of any very decisive intelligence. At present we are in total ignorance of the operations in Finland, and of the progress of the invasion with which Scenia is threatened by Zealand; where it seems there are, or lately were, 32,000 troops, under the command of General BERNADOTTE.

The Declaration of the King of Prussia is a short and clear avowal of his own imbecility. He says that he has been solicited by France and Russia to break his relations with Sweden, and adds, that they are broken accordingly. His own opinions, if he presumes to entertain any, he has not thought it expedient to state. Such is the event of this Monarch's shuffling policy!

The Mayor, Corporation, and Citizens of London, have presented a loyal Address to the King; which, however, they have followed with Petitions to both Houses of Parliament, complaining of the Rejection of the Reversion Bill by the Lords. It is our intention, at no very remote period, to call the notice of our Readers to the measure of prohibition, by which the country wishes to determine the system of Reversionary Grants, and to the unwarrantable opposition with which that measure has been waylaid.

It is said that the Russians have obtained possession of the whole of Finland, and that a French and Danish force have succeeded in effecting a landing in Sweden. The first part of this intelligence may perhaps be true, but to the last we cannot give credit, unless it should appear that the frost, which is said to have recommenced in the Baltic, has been so severe as to enable the enemy to pass on the ice. This, however, very rarely occurs, and if the sea has remained open, probably the few British ships which sailed about a month ago from Gottenburgh, would be sufficient to prevent any invasion of Sweden from the Danish Islands.

Our advices from Gibraltar, a few days ago, informed us, that an Expedition was expected from England to go against Ceuta, a maritime town on the Barbary coast, to prevent it from falling into the hands of the French, who it is understood have a design upon it. It is now known to be a fact, that General Prevost's Expedition is intended to co-operate with that under General Spencer, in an attack to be made upon that place, prior to its proceeding to Halifax, which is its final destination. General Prevost left England in the Penelope frigate on the 13th of February, accompanied by the Banterer frigate, and a fleet of transports, having on board the 7th, 8th, 13th, and 22d regiments. The Expeditions, it is supposed, will rendezvous at Gibraltar.

A Treaty has been lately negociating between France and Denmark, for the manning of the French fleet with Danish sailors. Bonaparte offered to take into his pay Danish seamen to man twenty sail of the line, which he has completely equipped for service, or will have soon in a state of complete preparation. The Courts were agreed upon the terms, when the sailors, who were informed of the arrangement, made known their determination not to fight under the command, or in the service, of any foreign power whatever. They would fight the battles of their own Sovereign, but would not condescend to become mercenaries. This impediment was not altogether removed when the last information was transmitted; but Bonaparte, we believe, will not sacrifice any imagined or expected benefit to a matter of ceremony. He may sell or lend his ship to the King of Denmark; they will still be employed in the same warfare, and, whoever be the nominal Commander, will act under the same orders.

The Danish Government has issued a Manifesto against Sweden, dated Copenhagen, February the 29, which contains nothing remarkable. It is sufficient to state, that it charges the Court of Stockholm with observing a total silence, while all Europe has resounded with the cry of indignation at the attack of England on Copenhagen. It complains of the facility afforded before the reduction of Stralsund, to the departure of the English forces from Pomerania, and of the present engagements between Great Britain and Sweden.

Private letters by the last Gottenburgh Mail state, that a letter had been received by Baron D'Armfeld from the Russian Minister, Count Romanzoff, offering him a bribe of a large sum of money, and an extensive Principality, if he would betray his Sovereign and effect an insurrection of the people in the neighbourhood of Stockholm, in favour of the cause of Russia. It is added, that the Baron, on receiving this letter, immediately laid it before the King, who has amply rewarded the loyalty and fidelity of his Minister.

According to private advices from the Continent, the following is the subject of dismemberment of Turkey, agreed upon by France, Austria, and Russia:—

"Russia is to receive part of Wallachia, Moldavia, and Bessarabia.

"Austria to receive Servia, Bosnia, part of Wallachia, and Upper Balgaria.

"France to receive Albania, and the whole of Greece, extending from the Adriatic to the Gulph of Salonica, together with Candia and Cyprus; and to receive from Austria, in consideration of the above cessions to that Power, the surrender of Trieste and her other possessions in the Adriatic."

Austria, it is added, is assembling an army of 50,000 men in Hungary, to give effect to this arrangement.

There has been a report for some days, that General Junot had entered into a negociation with Admiral Cotton, for evacuating Portugal, in consequence of the scarcity of provisions. This story is extremely improbable; for it is well known that the French Commanders always take care to supply their troops, without regard to the misery to which they subject the people of the country in which they are. It is ridiculous, therefore, to suppose that Junot, with all the resources of Portugal at his command, cannot find food for his army.

Advices from Seville have reached town to the 17th inst. That place is filled with French, and the people are astonished at the daily arrival of fresh French forces in Spain, now that Portugal is completely subdued. The French force now in Spain is not less than 100,000 men.

It appears that the whole of the money paid into the Registry of the High Court of Admiralty, from the year 1794, to March, 1808, amounts to

As Droits of the Admiralty	474,925 11 10
As Droits of the Crown	1,588,434 10 2
A mixed Account of both, out of which nothing has been paid to Captors	1,051,094 19 2
Making the sum total of all the Money paid amount to	3,113,905 1 2
Sum total of all the Money drawn by the Royal Warrant and otherwise	2,539,887 19 7½
And the Balance now remaining is something more than half a million, viz.	574,007 1 6½

The Danish prizes are not included in this return.

Government, we understand, have determined to take the East India Company's troops into their own direction, in order to incorporate them into the regular army.

The sailing of the first East India fleet, which was appointed for Saturday, is deferred, as we learn on inquiry at the India House, for a few days.

Mr. John Whitelocke, late Lieutenant-General Whitelocke, intends, it is said, shortly to embark for America.

Bonaparte has had the following return made to him of the number of the Jews in all the different parts of the habitable globe; viz. in the Turkish Empire, 1,000,000; in Persia, China, India, on the East and West of the Ganges, 300,000; and in the West of Europe, Africa, and America, 1,700,000—making, in the aggregate, a population of three millions!

Ten artillery-waggons came from Croydon on Wednesday to the Bank, and took away specie to the amount of 200,000*l.* which is to be conveyed to Portsmouth, and there shipped on board a frigate to Gottenburgh, for the use of the King of Sweden, being part of the subsidy granted him.

The Private History of the Court of England, is published by Crosby and Co. Stationer's-court, Ludgate-street, in two elegant volumes, price 12s. The public curiosity has been so much excited by this truly-spirited production, that the Publishers authorise us to promise that every means will be taken to meet the demands, and with the utmost impartiality.

A boat with twenty-one men on board got into Dover on Sunday, from Flushing, from whence they made their escape on Saturday; the forts fired at them as they put to sea, but without doing them any injury. They state that there are eight sail of the line nearly ready for sea, and that two frigates had lately sailed from Flushing. Perhaps these were the frigates that were seen on Thursday off Flamboro' Head.

The following occurrence took place on Tuesday at Spithead:—A man belonging to the Salcette frigate was sentenced to be flogged through the fleet for thieving. The boats from all the men of war, had assembled, as usual, when at the moment that the punishment was about to be inflicted, he jumped overboard, and was never afterwards seen. It is supposed he had previously put some shot in his pockets, to prevent his rising.

SUMMARY JUSTICE.—As an honest countryman was a few days ago, walking through Bond-street, he was met by three of those coxcombs, who, to the great annoyance of passengers, walk arm and arm, and fill up the pavement. One of those puppies took offence at the countryman's black'd hat, approaching him nearly, and thrusting his quizzing-glass into his face, asked him who was his hatter? The sturdy rustic immediately seized him by the nose, and dragging him a few paces, said, "I'll lead thee to him," much to the entertainment of the by-standers in general, and the mortification and disgrace of the coxcomb's companions, both of whom seemed apprehensive of being obliged to submit to the same means of information.

THE COURT AND WORLD OF FASHION.

Wednesday about 12 o'clock his MAJESTY arrived at the Queen's Palace from Windsor. At two o'clock a deputation from the Corporation of London arrived, with the Address voted last Friday. On the Deputation being introduced, the Recorder read the Address, to which Lord Hawkesbury as Secretary of State for the Home Department, read his MAJESTY's answer. Aldermen Birch was introduced to his MAJESTY by Lord Hawkesbury, upon his election, and had the honour to kiss his MAJESTY's hand, as had all the Alderman, and most of the other persons composing the Deputation. Mr. Sheriff Philips had the additional honour of Knighthood conferred on him by his MAJESTY. Afterwards his MAJESTY held a private levee.

The following had the honour of being presented to his MAJESTY:—

Major-General Campbell, on being appointed to the command of the 5th Garrison Battalion; General Bertie, on his being appointed Colonel of the 89th Regiment, in the room of Mr. Whitelocke; Judge Lawrence, on being appointed a Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, in the room of Judge Rooke, deceased; Rear Admiral Sawyer, on his promotion; Sir James Saumarez on being appointed to a command; Captain Hope, on the same occasion; Brigadier-General Moore, on his being appointed to the command at Newfoundland; Lord Napier, on being appointed Lord High Commissioner to the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; Viscount Lake, on coming to the title; Lieutenant-Colonel French on his promotion and appointment upon the Staff in America; Sir Charles Edmonstone, upon coming to his title; Earl Cavan, on his being appointed Colonel of the 77th Regiment of Foot; Lord Redesdale, on his being appointed a Lord of Trade.

His MAJESTY held a Privy Council, and gave audience to the Cabinet Ministers and the Judge Advocate, who laid before his MAJESTY the proceedings of a Court-Martial.

Soon after six o'clock his MAJESTY set off on his return to Windsor.

FASHIONS FOR APRIL,

EXTRACTED FROM THE 20TH NUMBER OF LE BEAU MONDE; OR, LITERARY AND FASHIONABLE MAGAZINE.

LADIES' DRESSES.

Fig. No. 3.—A plain white dress of real French cambric, made with a long train, and enriched round the bottom with a superb border of sun-flowers in needle work, and between every flower is inlet a rich footing of point lace—these flowers may be worked in colours or in white, and give a beautiful effect either way; the body of the dress is also made a degree longer than is usually worn; the back and bosom high, to wrap simply over, and fastened with a small diamond clasp, and trimmed all round to correspond with the bottom of the dress; the sleeves are made in the bishop style, of a much lighter texture than the dress, and are made separate from the dress. A robe pelisse of a delicate pink, pea-green, lilac, or sky-blue, lined throughout with white sarsnet, and trimmed all round with a wreath of green ivy leaves. The hair is formed into tasteful curls in the front of the head, with a narrow band of pink sarsnet, bound round the forehead, and shews transparently through the hair. A rich white lace handkerchief thrown carelessly over the head, and tied under the chin; gloves white kid, and shoes pea-green.

GENTLEMEN'S DRESSES.

MORNING DRESS.—In this we are scarcely at present able to point out any variety, as the coldness of the weather still renders a good great coat indispensable, and thus far precludes the opportunity of exhibiting the motley changes of fashion and taste, to any advantage. We are, however, justified in saying that light colours will certainly take the lead in the ton for coats. Waistcoats of striped Marsailles quilting will of course resume their stations as soon as the mildness of the weather will permit; and drab kerseymere or leather breeches, with brown top boots, will be as much the rage as ever.

EVENING DRESS.—The most prevailing at present is a dark blue coat with large sized flat gilt buttons, with velvet collar, or collar of the same cloth, according to fancy; with this we see single breasted white Marsailles quilting waistcoats, black silk breeches and stockings; some few sport drab coloured kerseymere breeches and white stockings.

DRESSES OF THE ARMY.

The following changes are spoken of in the dress of military officers, whereby each rank will be distinguished, as in the Continental armies, and in our navy; so that on actual service each rank may be known, though the officers are unacquainted with each other:—

Ensign—An epaulette of gold or silver fringe on the right shoulder, and white plume with red bottom.

Lieutenant—Epaulette of fringe and bullion right shoulder; plume as above.

Captains—Epaulette, with bullion and fringe, right shoulder; and one of fringe on left shoulder; plume as above.

Majors—Epaulette on each shoulder of bullion and fringe; plume white, with red top.

Lieutenant-Colonels—Epaulettes as above; white plume, with black top.

Colonels—Epaulettes as above; black plume, with white top.

Generals—Epaulettes as at present, and white plumes. Their different ranks are already distinguished by buttons.

N. B. Ensigns and Second Lieutenants of Highland and Fuzileer regiments to wear two epaulettes as formerly, but of gold or silver fringe only.

Lieutenants of Fuzileers—An epaulette, with fringe and bullion, left shoulder; and one of fringe on right shoulder, being the reverse of Captains.

THE PROMENADES.

The long wished for return of the vernal zephyrs is still delayed, whilst Eurus, Boreas, and Auster howl around in savage melody. The sprightly varieties of fashion for the season are yet in embrio; and the warm pelisse and fur cap, though they have lost their novelty, yet still retain their comfort.

A bright sun, for a few hours, induced us, last Sunday, to anticipate some of these many-coloured changes; but the icy hand of General Frost had placed sentinels over the gay abodes of Whim and Caprice, so as completely to check the first operations of the everchanging goddess.

There were few carriages in Hyde Park, with the exception of the Duchess of St. Albans, Countess of Barrymore, and Sir John Lade. In the gay throng of bits of blood, Sunday hacks, &c. there was little sprinkling of Nobility, except the Lords Sefton, Cranley, and Barrymore; and in St. James's and the Gardens nought appeared but sable pelisses, muffs, and fur tippets, enlivened at intervals by a scarlet gypsey cloak, or mameluke turban. Those who were disappointed of a peep at the fair Chancery Pleader, on Friday last, are on tiptoe in hopes of seeing her to-day in the gardens; and as there is a degree of optic novelty in her costume, we should not be surprised if Chancery Suits were to come into fashion.

An event of considerable importance to the world of Ton has since sprung up, in the death of "the Royal Dane;" an event which may, perhaps, throw us all into mourning. So sombre and lugubrious a circumstance, threatens to blight the tender buds of Fancy, to turn the gay shops of Bond-street into mementos of mortality, and to confound Abigails, Dyers, and Old Clothes Women, into one motley groupe of fashionable confusion.

One hope still remains for the gay world:—As this is an unprecedented case, it is expected that the arbiter of Court Etiquette will feel the motives of general convenience so powerfully as to induce him to wave a form, which in the midst of hostility might pass for insult.

CITY.

Tuesday a Court of Aldermen was held at Guildhall, at which the price of the quartern loaf was ordered to remain at 11*d*.

On Wednesday a Deputation, consisting of the Lord Mayor, twelve Aldermen, the Recorder, the Sheriffs, and twelve of the Common Council, waited upon his Majesty at the Queen's Palace with a loyal Address, to which his Majesty returned the following gracious answer.

"I thank you for your very loyal and dutiful Address.

"The assurances I receive of your unshaken attachment to my person and Government, afford me the greatest satisfaction.

"The example you have given to all ranks and descriptions of my people, of union and public spirit, at this important crisis, cannot but produce the most beneficial consequences, in enabling me to resist effectually the powerful and extensive confederacy, which the enemy has directed against my dominions, and ultimately to accomplish the great object of all my efforts—a secure and lasting peace."

COMMON COUNCIL.

A motion was made that Petitions be presented to both houses of Parliament, expressing regret that the Bill for preventing the granting Places in Reversion (which was regarded as the first step towards a reformation of existing abuses) should have been defeated, and praying that measures may be adopted for carrying so necessary and beneficial a Bill into effect; and also for causing inquiries to be made into the Receipt, Management, and Expenditure of the Public money, and adopting such measures as may effectually guard against such abuses in future, and for abolishing all unnecessary Places and Pensions, as a means of consolidating the strength of the empire; and calling forth the united energies and exertions of the people, which was seconded and agreed to, and a committee was appointed to withdraw and prepare the same, and being returned the Petitions were read, agreed to, and ordered to be fairly transcribed, and signed by the Town Clerk, and presented by the Sheriffs attended by the Remembrancer.

Mr. W. Howell was elected by ballot to serve the Office of Water Baliff, in the room of Henry Shepheard, Esq. deceased.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a quarterly General Court was held at the East India House.

The Chairman (Mr. Edward Parry) laid several accounts before the Court, agreeably to the bye-laws; the titles of which having been read,

Mr. M. Rock wished to be informed whether those papers were sufficiently ample to enable the Proprietors to form a complete judgment of the state of their affairs.

On the Chairman's replying in the negative,

Mr. Randle Jackson said, that the custom had been to have all the papers in the Company's possession read pro forma, which would enable the proprietors to have access to them at their convenience.

The Deputy Chairman (Mr. Grant) having adverted to the existing Committee of Investigation in the House of Commons, hoped the Proprietors would give the Executive Body due credit that should any thing arise which might be deemed important to the interests of the Company the earliest notice would be given to the General Court.

Mr. Randle Jackson expressed his gratitude to the Honourable Deputy for his intimation. He confessed he felt a more than usual anxiety on the subject, as there was not any instance of a Committee being appointed with such power, since the year 1782; and it must be well recollected what a revolution in the constitution of the Company that Committee had produced. He felt the more deeply the importance of the subject, when he found the most enlightened persons in other respects so totally ignorant of the relative situation of the public and the Company. He then adverted to the general notion, that the Company were in arrears to the public nearly six millions, and said it was owing to the successful exertions of himself and his friends that this claim on the part of the public had not at present the shadow of any legal existence.

The Deputy Chairman perfectly co-incided with his Learned Friend as to the miserably gross ignorance and misconception which was so prevalent with respect to the Company's affairs; he could assure the proprietors, that the Committee of which he had the honour to be a member, had not been disposed to trench on the Company's rights; should such an idea unfortunately occur, not a moment's time would be lost in convening his constituents.

Captain George Weltden, of the ship Indus, took leave of the Court previous to departing for Madras and Bengal. The Court adjourned at six o'clock.

THE THEATRES.

DRURY-LANE.

On Thursday Evening was produced, a new Comedy, called The World, written by Mr. Kenney, the author of Raising the Wind, Matrimony, Ella Rosenberg, and other popular pieces. We will preface our observations on this Comedy by an account of the principal characters, and of the plot:—

Cheviot	Mr. Elliston.
Echo	Mr. Bannister.
Withers	Mr. Wroughton.
Index	Mr. Mathews.
Subtle	Mr. Wewitzer.
Social	Mr. Purser.
Loiter	Mr. De Camp.
Dauntless	Mr. Palmer.
Margin	Mr. Maddocks.
Lady Bloomfield	Mrs. Jordan.
Mrs. Barclay	Mrs. Powell.
Eleanor Barclay	Miss Boyce.

Echo, who has long been pinned to his mother's apron string, comes to town to begin business and woo Lady Bloomfield, a rich widow. Though naturally well-disposed, he commits several follies from his ignorance of the world, and imitates the manners and the tones of all his idle acquaintance. This regard to the opinion of The World, has induced him to abandon, in her adversity, Eleanor Barclay, whom he once honourably loved. Cheviot, a foundling, was during infancy dependent on Mr. Davenant, a man of fortune in Northumberland, who placed him with Subtle, a gambling merchant: but the high spirit of Cheviot revolts from his guardian's practices; he leaves the business, and, disdaining to apply for further charity to Davenant, who has never admitted him to his presence, he maintains himself as an author. By rescuing Lady Bloomfield in a fracas at the opera, Cheviot interests her affections: she sends him a bank-note, enclosed in a letter signed by the Goddess Fortune: and he, with the money destined to dissipate his own distresses, presently relieves the poverty of Mrs. Barclay, a prisoner in the King's Bench, by purchasing, in Margin's shop, a volume of manuscript sermons which Eleanor has come thither to sell. The rivalship of Cheviot and Echo, as admirers of Lady Bloomfield, produces a sharp remonstrance from Echo: who, however, by a strong appeal to his feelings, made by Cheviot in favour of Eleanor, is brought back to a sense of his duty, shakes off Dauntless and Loiter, his idle companions, and is restored to the amiable object of his early love. Cheviot is discovered to be a natural son of Davenant, who, from a weak fear of The World, has not owned him: but who, nevertheless, under the name of Withers has found him in London by the assistance of the good-natured Index, and heard him reproach his parents for abandoning the child. Mrs. Barclay owns herself his mother, who having, since her seduction, wedded and become a widow, receives honourable amends in a marriage with Mr. Davenant. Cheviot, after some little obstacles, occasioned by his own pride and poverty, by Lady Bloomfield's jealousy of Miss Barclay, is united to her Ladyship, with the consent of her father, Mr. Social: and the piece concludes with a confession, that the approbation of our own conscience is ill sacrificed to the opinions of The World.

This play has more merits and fewer faults than we remember to have seen in almost any production of the present time.—The plot is protracted, it must be confessed, to a very unnecessary length; but one or two representations will shew how it may be curtailed with advantage. It does not abound with tragic situation or farcical incident; but it affords much rational amusement, and will leave a still pleasanter impression on the mind, when it shall have been judiciously pruned.

The characters are all natural, and those of Dauntless and Echo have the further merit of novelty. Dauntless is an attorney, whom every body dislikes, but who is so abominably impudent that nobody can shake him off: and Echo's peculiarity, which is by no means without its prototype in real life, consists in an assumption of other people's follies. By the bye the name of Margin is particularly well adapted to a vender of modern books.

But the principal merit of this comedy consists in its dialogue, which, as far as it is possible to decide, without reading the play, we believe to be infinitely superior to that of any modern piece, except The Honey Moon alone. The satire, the illustrations, and the remarks, are keen, striking, and correct. The sentiment for the most part is poetical without show, and interesting without romance.

Plays, like men, when really good, may be said to have a double existence: for after their form has vanished, their soul continues to live. To The World we earnestly wish a long career upon the stage: and when its course shall be terminated there, it will probably be translated to immortality in the closet of the man of letters.

Mr. Elliston, of whose acting in genteel comedy we so frequently have occasion to record our admiration, here supported and even encreased his just fame: and Mr. Bannister, in Echo, was so chaste, so humourous, and so natural, that no praise, except perhaps the gratitude of an author, can adequately pay him for his performance. Mr. Mathews was comically quaint, and of course entertaining, in the representation of Index: and Mr. Palmer and Mr. De Camp gave a great deal of character to their parts. Miss Boyce deserves particular praise for her unaffected sweetness in Eleanor; and Mrs. Powell has a part as much beneath her talents, as the character of Lady Bloomfield is above the skill of Mrs. Jordan; who, though she is sure to charm in her representations of nature, always displeases in her performance of fine ladies, because those are things of art.

There are a Prologue and an Epilogue. The latter is from the pen of Mr. M. G. Lewis, and consists in a collection of lively puns upon the words "The World."

The Play was received with the loudest and longest applause; and the Epilogue was saluted with proportionate marks of the public favour.

COVENT-GARDEN.

On the same evening was performed, for the first time, at this theatre, a burlesque Melo-Drama called Bonifacio and Bridgetina; a piece disgraceful to the author or authors who conceived it, disgraceful to the proprietors who produced it, insulting to the actors who performed in it, and insulting to the public who hissed it. We do not insert an account of its plot; because we think that our columns would be disgraced by the record. The analysis of a puppet show, and the criticism of nothing, are beneath the dignity of common sense. Vulgarity and folly were the characteristics of the dialogue, profusion was the leading feature of the decorations, and disgust was the sentiment of the audience. Sadler's Wells or the Royal Circus would scarcely have opened its doors to such a hodge-podge, and Covent Garden Theatre is degraded to the level of a Bartholomew show-booth. It is high time for some more revivals to appear: the beams of Nature and Shakespeare, perhaps, may dissipate the clouds of nonsense that shadow this dramatic hemisphere.

HINTS TO COMMERCIAL SPECULATORS.

A convoy is appointed for the ships bound to Brazils, upwards of forty sail of vessels are at this time ready loaded with British manufactured goods for South America, among them are several Portuguese vessels lately arrived in British ports from Oporto and Lisbon. We sincerely hope the adventures will turn out advantageous, and with respect to the "returns," there is no doubt of their coming to a good market at home, as the cotton-wool of that country is perhaps the finest of the world; of this article alone were exported, from the Brazils to Portugal, annually about 140,000 bags; of sugar, 25,000 chests; of indigo, about 1200 serons; and of hides, 1,200,000 with horns and tallow in proportion. It will be necessary for speculators to be very careful in the quality of the British manufactured goods they ship for the Rio de Janerio, as none will sell there, but of the very finest quality; and it is the very contrary in the other parts of South America, where every kind of coarse goods, such as we usually send to our West India Islands, meet a ready sale. Tallow from that quarter of the globe, will, no doubt, find a ready sale, particularly at a time, when it is impossible to import it from Petersburgh. Their indigoes will not suit this market, being too flinty and come at a much dearer price, in proportion, than those of other countries. Buenos Ayres hides have been sold from 2d. to 6½d. per lb. weight.

SUGAR.—With respect to the market for sugar, it still continues very dull indeed, the prices of raw sugar may be called from 55s. to 79s. per cwt. according to quality; lumps from 5l. to 5l. 6s.; powder loaves from 4l. 18s. to 6l. 1s.; and single loaves from 4l. 12s. to 5l. 6s. per cwt. In the course of this month we may expect a Jamaica and a Leeward Island fleet to arrive, with, no doubt, a large quantity of this article, and we hope, prior to it, that the market will be still better than at present it is. Fine Jamaica Rum is worth from 5s. 6d. to 6s. per gallon, and Leeward Island Rum, from 4s. 2d. to 5s. per gallon.

COTTON.—This article is rather flat in the market except the Brazil wool, called Maranams and Pernambucco's, which have advanced in price nearly 2d. per lb. and they are now worth from 2s. to 2s. 3½d. per lb.

The prices of British plantation Coffee may be called from 4l. 10s. to 6l. 10s. according to quality. If this article could be shipped for the Continent at this time, it would bring nearly 100 per cent. profit, and, notwithstanding all Bonaparte's plans against our commerce, this very article has found its way into France, Germany, and Holland.

TEA.—The prices of all kinds of black Tea, such as Bohea, Congou, and Souchong, have advanced nearly 4d. per lb. Hysons and all kinds of Green Teas continue in price as usual.

WINE continues to advance in price, and fine old Port cannot now be purchased under the enormous price of 100 guineas per pipe. Claret is plenty in the market, and that of good quality sells from 85*l.* to 90*l.* per hogshead. Good old Sherry is rather scarce, and that of fine pale coloured Wine brings 90*l.* per butt. Old Madeira from the East Indies, brings 125*l.* per pipe of 110 gallons.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

The last season, which, for the sports of the field, has been through the whole winter the most unfavourable ever known, has now nearly concluded two of its subjects, coursing and hare-hunting, as the hares are now breeding in every county. In truth, no fair sportsman would now think of pursuing an animal in a state of gestation, which it is inhuman to distress, particularly as it is not worth having when killed, and when two or three are killed in one. In addition to this, the farmer, though himself a sportsman, begins to be materially interested in his grounds not being hunted. The young seeds are beginning to shoot; and the ewes, with their infant lambs, are now in the fields as well as the ewes who have not lambed down—all equally liable to be injured by a field of sportsmen—"who give care to the winds," and care little what they ride over.—The fox-hunter, however, is in a different predicament; and many packs, we trust, will continue their sport till the middle of the end of April.

The Earl of Darlington's fox-hounds had one of the most brilliant runs of the season, from that celebrated covert, Sessay Wood, Yorkshire. They presently unkennelled a fox, which seemed determined to shew, that the justly-famed breed of Hambleton Foxes is not extinct; for first skirting along the banks of the Swale, about two miles, he then had the courage to face the wind towards the hills, passing by Sowerby, Bagby, through Thirkleby Park, Thirkleby Spring, Osgodby, and Hoodhill, where, notwithstanding many earths were open, he scorned so mean a retreat, and turned to the right, across Kilburn Common to Byland Abbey, Newborough Park, and Yearsly; then pointed towards Black Wood, but the scent growing very cold, he was lost about three miles from Easingwold, after a run of two hours and ten minutes, with only one short check. The country passed over was supposed to be at least twenty-five miles. Amongst the best sportsmen and riders were the Earl of Darlington, on his capital mare Flora; Sir F. Boynton, on Mr. Bennet; Mr. Treacher, on Copenhagen; Mr. Frankland, on Coxcomb; Mr. Bell, on All-fours; Mr. Livesay, on Rector; Mr. Stourton, on Poppleton; Mr. Silvertop, on Traveller, &c. &c.

The hounds of Sir T. Stanley, of Hooton, in Cheshire, lately drew Shotwicke Gawes, and in a few seconds a couple of foxes broke cover. The hounds divided, and two couple and a half went away with one; he took his country direct, from Find to Puddington, then to Hinderton; he was headed crossing the Parkgate great road, when he took for Ness Gawes, from thence to Raby, Wilison, and Thornton Common, where he was again headed, and being obliged to take the low lands leading to Woodchurch, finding himself closely pursued he began to take water. He then took to Storeton Mill, opposite Liverpool, where he was again headed, and then taking his course towards Bebbington, he was tallihoed about two hundred yards before the hounds, he was now nearly exhausted. The two horsemen who were in, tallihoed him crossing the great turnpike road at Bembo Mill, about sixty yards before the hounds. He took down Ponten great cover, and under Ponten-hall got into ground. This chase was calculated to be upwards of thirty miles, with two couple and a half of hounds.

At Norbrook Races, near Bicester, which are fixed for Wednesday next, the 6th inst. much company is expected. Eleven horses are named for the 50*l.* Cup, five for the hunters Sweepstakes, and six for the sweepstakes by hacks; after which some matches will be run; and as the turf is in excellent condition, great sport is depended on.

Boxing.—Tuesday next is looked for with considerable avidity, as a day for much diversion amongst the amateurs of pugilism. Besides the match between young Belcher and Dockarty, for 50 guineas, which has been for some time fixed to take place on that day, Cropley and Dutch Sam will also exhibit for a similar sum.

A Wiltshire gentleman has started on a pedestrian excursion in that county, which if he performs within the given time, will outstrip all pedestrians. His name is Padgers, and his undertaking is to go 50 miles a day for eight days. He started on Tuesday morning, at about 4 miles from Basingstoke, to go to a spot near Warminster. The undertaking is for a bet of 150 guineas.

LAW REPORTS.

COURT OF CHANCERY, LINCOLN'S INN HALL,
MARCH 28, 1808.

HEIRS DEALING WITH EXPECTANCES.

BOWES, ESQ. v. JACOB.

This was a motion for an injunction to restrain the Defendant from proceeding upon a post obit bond for 1800*l.* given under the following circumstances: The Plaintiff, T. Bowes, Esq. one of the sons of the late Lord Strathmore, being extremely distressed for money, proposed to raise 10,000*l.* upon post obit bonds, stipulating to pay back four times the amount of the money advanced, in case his elder brother, George Bowes, Esq. should die without issue male, and he became possessed of his estates, which he was legally entitled to in case that contingency happened, at that time the Plaintiff was in custody at the suit of the Defendant, whose debt and costs amounted to 325*l.* The Defendant agreed to accept the Plaintiff's proposal, and a post obit bond for 1800*l.* was executed. Shortly after Mr. George Bowes died, and the Defendant put his bond in suit. In support of the injunction Sir Samuel Romilly contended that the Plaintiff being in embarrassed circumstances, had been induced to deal with his expectances improvidently, and that the transaction was precisely that in which the Court would interfere to give relief. Sir Samuel added, that at the time the bond was given the Defendant knew Mr. George Bowes to be in a bad state of health, and that the contingency was very likely to happen. After hearing Mr. Richards on the other side, the Lord Chancellor ordered the injunction to be granted, and the Plaintiff be made to pay the amount of the original debt and costs into Court within six weeks.

There were two other Motions made of a similar nature, which met a similar result.

Yesterday application was made to the Court on behalf of Lord Athbone, for an order to deliver to his Lordship's care and custody his eldest son, Lord Aghrise, who was a lunatic. Several affidavits in behalf of the application were put in and read, and it appeared by them, that the young Nobleman who was the subject of this application had for a length of time laboured under mental derangement. The affidavits went on to state that he had been removed from place to place by his wife, to the exclusion of his family, who had been denied access to him, and they were ignorant of his present abode.

Sir S. Romilly and Mr. Martin were heard at considerable length on the part of Lord Athbone, and the case was ordered to stand over until Monday; when Counsel will be heard on the other side, and the Lord Chancellor will give his decision.

WESTMINSTER SESSIONS.

At these Sessions a case was tried, for an assault committed by the coachman of a stage-coach, on the Serjeant of the Bank Picket Guard, as he was marching on duty, near the corner of Little Newport-street, in the month of December last, and of breaking through the ranks with his horses. The Chairman, in delivering his opinion on this case, observed that officers and soldiers, even in this situation, were bound to be civil to the public, and that it was occasionally their duty to give way in the street, according as the case might be; at the same time he added, that the public were bound to give every possible facility to the public service. The parties not being able to adjust amicably their differences, which was strongly recommended by the Court, the defendant was sentenced to pay a fine of 5*l.*

The Sessions ended yesterday, with a goal delivery. Thirty-six persons were discharged by proclamation.

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

British Navy.—The naval force, in commission, this day, amounts to 151 sail of the line; from 50 to 44 guns, 22; frigates, 173; sloops, 222; gun-brigs, &c. 222.—Total 720.—Building, and in ordinary—of the line 110; 50 to 44 guns 15; frigates 83; sloops, &c. 75; gun brigs, &c. 30.—Total building and in ordinary, 322.—Grand total 1112 vessels of war; being at increase, within the last month, of 32 vessels.

The following ships for the Baltic sailed from Portsmouth, on Wednesday morning, viz. Mars and Orion, of 74 guns; Polyphemus, 64; Salcette, Daphne, Mutine, Insolent, Hearty, Protector, Redbreast, and Steady.

The whole of Admiral Russell's squadron, except the Majestic, was to sail from Yarmouth the moment the wind would permit, for Gottenburgh. The ships were all victualled and ready for the purpose. Admiral Russell will have another squadron ready in a few days, in order to enable him to resume his station off the Dutch coast.

A smack belonging to Queenborough, bound to Faversham, laden with King's stores, was on Thursday driven on the Pollard (a bar that runs out of Whitstable). The crew and passengers consisted of four men, two boys, and one woman, the Captain's wife. They got the boat out, and the Captain, his wife, and boy got into it, and put off for the shore. At a small distance from the vessel, the boat stove, and the Captain regained the smack, but his wife and the boy perished. He remained on board with the rest of the crew until morning; the vessel being nearly dry, they left her, and walked ashore, with the exception of the owner, who perished through the extreme cold. The woman and boy have been picked up. The distress of the Captain has been great, he had been married a week only, and was bringing his bride to Faversham, to introduce her to his friends.

PORT NEWS.

Deal, March 29.—Admiral Sir Samuel Hood is arrived here, and has hoisted his flag on board the Centaur, of 74 guns, which came in yesterday from Portsmouth. The gallant Admiral, we hear, is to have a command in the squadron destined for the Baltic, which is daily accumulating in the Downs. Several frigates are already here, and the strong easterly winds only prevents others joining from the westward; they are, however, hourly expected.

Sheerness, April 1.—Dropped down to the Nore, His Majesty's ship Victory, to receive the Flag of Admiral Sir James Saumarez.—The wind having come round to the N. W. the whole of the Gottenburgh convoy have assembled below the Nore, and if the wind proves favourable they will proceed on their voyage to-morrow, under convoy of his Majesty's brigs Bold and Turbulent.

POLICE.

PUBLIC OFFICE, BOW-STREET.

While a funeral was going into St. Clement's Church, several suspicious persons were observed lurking about, one of whom held up his fist in a menacing way at a Gentleman, who watched him. Application was made to Bow-street, and some Officers sent, by whom one of the fellows was taken and brought to the Office, and who proved to be the notorious Harry Woodford. A Gentleman who was in the crowd identified Woodford to be one of the most active in the gang in hustling the people belonging to the funeral as well as the spectators, and stated, that he was the fellow who had the audacity to hold up his fist at him in a menacing way. Mr. Read asked Woodford what he had been doing since he was last liberated, but he could give no account of himself; on being asked what he was doing in the Strand, he replied he had been to the Transport Office to endeavour to go abroad but could not meet with Mr. Stewart; he could not say whether he had seen any body. Mr. Read pointed out the impossibility of his story, and said the only question with him was, whether he should convict him as a rogue and vagabond, or an incorrigible rogue, and sent for all the Officers and Patroles to ascertain whether he had ever been convicted before, but that could not be proved. To prevent this difficulty in future, Mr. Read ordered, that all the Officers and Patrole should procure books, and make memorandums of the conviction of Woodford, and all the other pick pockets, to be brought to the Office, and directed that every possible exertion should be made by the evening, to ascertain whether he had been convicted before, which was accordingly done; but it could not be ascertained. Mr. Read therefore, convicted him as a rogue and vagabond.

MARLBOROUGH-STREET.

Thursday another of those depraved women, who entice the unwary into their abodes and rob them, was charged with robbing a young man, seventeen years of age, of eight shillings and his watch. The prisoner, who was stricken in years, had enveigled him through a court or entry to her subterraneous abode, at the back of Crown-street where she put him in fear, and robbed him of his property. He was then hurried into the street by another passage, but obtained assistance, when the prisoner was secured. She was committed for trial.

ACCIDENTS, OFFENCES, &c.

A melancholy occurrence happened on Wednesday, on the London side of Blackfriars Bridge. A spirited and dangerous animal, in a single horse cart, loaded, in descending the hill, started at some unknown object, and reared up on his hind legs, and continued to plunge for some time in the most furious manner, he then dashed furiously towards the side, and came in contact with a very respectable woman of the name of Dingle, and her aunt, who, in endeavouring to make their escape, both fell under the wheel nearest to the kirb-stone, when the unruly beast, at the critical moment moving forward, the near-wheel instantly passed over the head of Mrs. Dingle, who died without a groan, and over the arm of the aunt, which it shattered to pieces. The aunt was carried away in a hackney-coach, the mangled remains of the niece, to the disgrace of the surrounding spectators, was allowed to lay for some time on the bridge, a shocking and most lamentable spectacle. The furious animal was stopped without doing further mischief. The owner of the horse is highly censurable for allowing so vicious a beast to be driven by a man who appeared totally unfit to manage him; and more particularly so, as we have been informed by one of the relatives of the deceased, that the horse was always considered ungovernable; the animal had, previously to its reaching the bridge, ran against a horse, and rendered it probable unfit for service. The above calamity is lamentably dreadful; the vices of the horse must have been known; and, therefore, proper measures should have been adopted to prevent the possibility of accident. The body of the unfortunate sufferer was, at last, taken to the burying-ground of St. Anne's, Blackfriars, where it was soon owned by the husband, who, we are informed is totally inconsolable, as well as her family and friends.

Tuesday in the afternoon, as a labouring man was passing through the park belonging to his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, he was attacked by a ferocious bull, and gored in such a manner, as only to survive a short time; the Keeper of the Park received orders from his Royal Highness to shoot the animal immediately.

SHOCKING ACCIDENT.—An Inquisition was taken yesterday at the Half-way-house at Newington, on the body of Maria Matilda Pardet, a young lady who met with her death on Friday afternoon, by a violent fall. The deceased was walking on the leads of the house of her aunt, at Bowyer's-row, near Newington, with an infant in her arms, accompanied by two other young ladies, when a trap-door, over a lumber loft, gave way, and the young lady with the infant was precipitated into the loft, from the height of 16 feet. The infant did not sustain any injury, but the young lady pitched on the back part of her head and fractured her skull. She survived the accident but two hours.—Accidental Death.

Early on Thursday morning last, the shop of Mr. Fisher, mercer, Great Newport-street, Long Acre, was robbed in the following manner:—Having broken the fanlight, the thieves, by means of an instrument, supposed to resemble the ram-rod of a musket, with a worm-screw, reached the goods upon the shelves, and, by twisting the instrument into the goods, drew them to the fanlight. They succeeded in getting silk to a considerable amount, and probably would to a much greater extent had not the family been alarmed by the falling of the goods off the shelves.—The thieves made their escape.

Thursday night, between six and seven o'clock, as Mr. May, builder, of George-street, Grosvenor-square, was returning in his gig from West End, Hampstead, the horse took fright and ran off with him between Kilburn Wells and the Hill House, passed Mr. Gillow, of Oxford-street, and another gentleman on horseback, extremely frightened, and complained of his inability to stop the animal. In coming opposite Mr. Marvin's farm, he made a spring from the back part of the chaise, but unfortunately pitched on his head, and was killed on the spot. He lies at the Portman Arms, Paddington, for the inspection of the Coroner.

Three noted characters on the town were yesterday taken into custody, and examined on the charge of having extorted upwards of 30*l.* from a very reputable tradesman, by charging him with an offence, the very imputations of which fills the mind with horror. The complainant was attacked by the parties, in the Park, about two months since, and, rather than a charge of such a nature should even be falsely alledged against him, he was induced to comply with the demands of the robbers, until their repeated solicitations for other sums compelled him to seek redress.

CHILD STEALING.—A little girl, three years old, the daughter of Mrs. Penstone, a widow in Portland-street, was stolen from the door of her parent on Thursday morning, and has not since been recovered. She was seen in the arms of a woman in Oxford-street, by a servant who lives next door to Mrs. Penstone, but having no suspicion, it was not until the child had been missed that she communicated what she had seen.

A little boy was also taken from the door of Mr. Rivers, in Berwick-street, on Wednesday morning, and after having been stripped of his cloaths, was left at the door of his parent at ten o'clock at night. A woman has been taken into custody, on suspicion, in consequence of her having been found possessed of a frock, supposed to belong to the child.

BIRTH.

On Thursday se'nnight the wife of John Garnet, weaver, of Lane-Top in Midgly near Halifax, was safely delivered of four living girls. One of the children died soon after the birth; the other three are likely to do well, and have been baptized.

MARRIED.

On Wednesday, by special licence, at Melbury, the seat of the Earl of Ilchester, by the Hon. and Rev. Charles Strangeways, the Right Honourable Lord Henry Petty to Lady Louisa Strangeways, sister to the Earl of Ilchester.

DIED.

Sir H. Grey, elder brother to the late, and uncle to the present Earl Grey, on Tuesday, at a very advanced age; having never been married, Earl G. comes into possession of estates to the value of near 37,000*l.* besides a fortune for each of his younger children. His Lordship's brothers and sisters also have large legacies; and all Sir H's. old servants are left comfortable annuities for their lives.

About eight o'clock on Sunday morning, Mr. L. Bologna, of the Theatre Royal Covent Garden, after a lingering illness, at his apartments, at Brompton.

March 25, at Goodnestone next Wingham, in the one hundred and first year of her age, Mrs. Catherine Stocks. The old lady was born Jan. 25 and baptized at Wingham, Feb. 14, 1708; and during her life was never thirty miles from that place. She has left three daughters, whose ages united to hers exceed three hundred years. Fifty-two of her grand and great grand children are now living, and about the same number have died; she retained her faculties to the day of her death, and on the celebration of her ninety-ninth year, sung several songs to her family.

Our King, Constitution, and Laws.

No. 15. SUNDAY, APRIL 10, 1808. Price 8d.

GRATIS.

A PORTRAIT OF HIS MAJESTY GEORGE III.

BEAUTIFULLY ENGRAVEN BY SCRIVEN, AND INTENDED AS A

FRONTISPIECE

TO

THE NATIONAL REGISTER,

Was to have accompanied the Emblematical Title Page and delivered GRATIS to the Purchasers of that Paper on its Commencement, viz. SUNDAY, JANUARY, 3, 1808. In consequence, however, of the difficulties that always arise in the outset of so arduous an undertaking, the Proprietors were unable to accomplish that part of their Plan; but as those difficulties have now ceased they are happy to inform the PATRONS of THE NATIONAL REGISTER, and the PUBLIC IN GENERAL, that the beautifully engraven Portrait of OUR SOVEREIGN is now finished by Mr. SCRIVEN, and will be ready for Delivery on SUNDAY, APRIL 24; the Resemblance is unquestionable; and the whole Print is positively a Master-piece in the Art of Engraving. The National Register is designed to be preserved and formed into a Volume at the End of every Year, so as to exhibit to posterity a faithful Record of the present eventful Age: and the Motto of the Paper enforces the necessity of the present Embellishment. It is hoped that the splendid manner with which the Proprietors have ever conducted their Works, will induce the Public to expect a spirited and admirable Portrait of his MAJESTY; it may be necessary to say, that the Portrait will be delivered SEPARATE from The National Register, and printed on Copper Plate Paper, so as to form a Print that would not be sold by any Printseller for less than Four Shillings.

"OUR KING, CONSTITUTION, AND LAWS."

Our Patrons in the Country are requested to observe, that the Portrait of his Majesty will be invariably DELIVERED GRATIS to the Newsmen, for the purpose of being transmitted to their Subscribers, by the safest and most convenient mode. But as it will be impossible for the Newsmen to forward the Portrait by the Post, without incurring the risk of spoiling the Print, and the Expence of Postage, the Proprietors beg leave to submit to their Friends the necessity of their requesting some Bookseller in the Country to obtain it from his Agents in London, who will inclose it in his parcel. This will obviate every difficulty, and secure its safe arrival. To any of the Friends of the Paper, who may be disappointed of the Portrait, or to any Friend commissioned by them, an Impression will be gratuitously delivered at the Office of The National Register. But it will be necessary for the Subscriber, in this case, to send his real name, and place of abode, in a note addressed to the Proprietors.

Those who may have neglected to complete their sets, are requested to give early orders, to prevent the chance of disappointment.

Immediate Orders for the Paper should be given, to prevent the possibility of disappointment, addressed (post paid) to the Proprietors, No. 11, Catherine-street, Strand, to the Clerks of the Roads, or Newsmen, throughout the United Kingdom.

THE TRIAL OF GENERAL WHITELOCKE

IS NOW COMPLETED,

The First Part of which was DELIVERED GRATIS to the Purchasers of THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

If any disappointments have occurred; Orders should be sent (post-paid) to the Newsman who sends the Paper, and he will immediately transmit it; but as a difficulty has taken place at the Post-Office relative to its being forwarded by that channel into the Country; the Proprietors beg leave to request that Orders may be given to the different Booksellers throughout the United Kingdom, who will cause it to be sent by their Correspondents in London, so as to save expence, and prevent the possibility of disappointment.

Any Number of Sets, Price 8d. each, may be had of all the Booksellers and Newsmen throughout the United Kingdom.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER FIFTEEN.

ON THE BILL FOR PREVENTING THE GRANT OF REVERSIONS BY THE CROWN.

In the late Parliament, the House of Commons passed a resolution, founded on a Report of the Committee of Finance, for an Address to the King, praying that no offices might thenceforward be granted in Reversion; and a Bill was brought in to affix the Legislative sanction to that measure. Before the Bill was passed, a dissolution took place; but in the present Parliament the measure was renewed, and passed the House of Commons, with only one dissentient voice. It proceeded to the House of Lords, and was thrown out. The Commons finding their intentions thus frustrated, were obliged a second time to Address the King, praying him not to grant Offices in Reversion. In the present Session another Bill was introduced, which was also thrown out by the Lords. A Bill has now been brought into the House of Commons, founded on the same principle, but modified in its application, and professing its object to be simply the suspension of the Royal Prerogative in this respect. This Bill, as well as most of the other measures relating to the same subject, has been ushered in under the auspices of Mr. Bankes, who proposes that it shall be in force "for one year from the "passing of the Act, and from the close of that period "to the end of six weeks from the commencement of the "subsequent Session of Parliament."

For this Bill a very lively interest has been excited, by the fate of the former measures, and by the appearance of opposition from a potent quarter. We profess ourselves to be decidedly the friends of the principle on which the Bill is founded, and we only regret that as the rejection of it in the Upper House has precluded the Commons from sending it up during the present session in its original shape, it should have become necessary to make that which ought to be an absolute prohibition, amount to nothing more than a suspension. We are friends to the abolition of Reversionary Munificence, not more from regard to the rights of the people, than from regard to the interests of the crown. The rights of the people cannot in fact be very materially affected either by the continuation or by the abolition of this prerogative: but the people in general believe that their money is ill-applied in the grant of Reversions, and at a time when they do really bear so many necessary burthens, it surely is but fair to relieve them from those that are unnecessary. If the weight of unnecessary burthens be very small, and very small we believe that it is, in comparison of the mighty load which, at best, the nation must submit to carry, yet if the nation be of opinion that by the removal of that small weight, their strength will be more adequate to their task, it is no more than just to make this little sacrifice to their opinion. The people still will pay almost as much into the treasury: so much, that the difference will hardly be sensible: but then they will pay it more willingly, because they will have the satisfaction of thinking that it is all applied for salutary purposes. If the good which they expect from this measure were less than it is, nay, if it were absolutely nothing, we should still inculcate the propriety of the measure, because the people should always be satisfied when they can be satisfied without danger: and when their hearts are with their government they can submit without a murmur to a thousand difficulties which in a moment of discontent they would refuse with indignation to endure. Dr. Fuller relates a story, which, in his quaint language, stands thus: "A gentleman having led a company of little "children into the fields further than they used to walk, "they began to be quite tired, and called out to the gentle- "man to carry them, for they could go no further; but (he "being unwilling to give himself that trouble, and besides "was unable to carry them all, which must disoblige some "of them) he relieved himself with this invention, saying: "be content a little, my dear children, and I will provide "you every one a horse to ride home on; accordingly he "he went to the next hedge, and cut them geldings out of "it: and the success answered the device, for being "mounted on these wooden steeds, the strength of "fancy added new mettle to their legs, and they trudged "chearfully home." If the people, when they are weary, will be contented with a wooden horse, why should their guardians refuse it to them?

It has been objected that, in depriving the Crown of the right of making Grants in Reversion, we are depriving the Crown of its just prerogative. But those who fancy this appear to be short-sighted indeed. The abolition of this power strengthens the efficient force of the Crown; it weakens only the individual King, who may happen to be reigning at the time when the abolition takes place. It weakens him, because he finds the gifts, which every day become vacant under his eyes, devolving upon persons who claim them by the Reversionary Grants of some former Prince: but it ultimately strengthens the Crown, because the Crown is thereby empowered to give that in præsenti, which otherwise it can bestow only in futuro.

But whether the Bill be in effect likely to produce the infinite benefits that some persons hope from it, or whether it will be attended only with that slight but not contemptible advantage which we are inclined to expect, there surely can be among impartial persons only one opinion on the opposition with which it has been assailed. The measure originated in the House of Commons with the minority, and was approved by the Ministers: it was carried into the Upper House, and there too the Ministers concurred in it. And yet it has been rejected by a majority of the House of Peers: that is to say, by some Princes of the Blood with proxies in their pockets. And are the united voices of the Ministry and of the people to be drowned by the whisper of such authority? Are the advisers of the Crown to be always persons distinct from the Crown's responsible servants? Are the people of this country for ever to deprecate the existence of a power "behind the throne, greater than "the throne itself?" Is the King to have his negative voice as the first branch of the Constitution, and are negative voices to speak for him besides in the meetings of the second branch, so as finally to overthrow, without the personal odium of a refusal, the beneficial measures that may be proposed by the third branch? And for whom is all this done? for the good of the King? No: the good of the people is the good of the King. It is done for the good of those who call themselves the friends of the King: for the aggrandisement of those who eagerly take into their hands the reigns of government that have been but loosely held of late: and the consequence must be universal odium to themselves, and even unpopularity to their Sovereign. For though the higher classes of society may feel that their present Sovereign would never intentionally injure his people, yet the vast mass of low and inconsiderate persons, who shall see what the Junto has done, and hear that the members of that junto are called the King's friends, will imagine that the King has delegated them to do that obnoxious work which he himself was unwilling to perform.

But it seems that the opposers of the Reversion Bill have not confined themselves to the exercise of that influence which their rank bestows upon them, and which at best is ill exercised in opposing a measure of public good: that they have even exercised an influence to which no rank can any subject them: an influence which is said to have made itself known in some such whisper as this: "Ministers "know who made them, and they know who can unmake "them also." Thus then we find that the Ministers of the country are dependent, not upon the country nor upon the crown, but on a set which works from a dark corner, a party without a name, a ruling power without a right, a dreadful combination that attacks us like pestilence, then only seen when it destroys! Can his Majesty feel himself justified in entrusting his conscience, his popularity, and his glory, to persons who are amenable to no earthly jurisdiction for their abuse of his confidence? Can the representatives of the people with patience endure to see great measures of public advantage, the commencements of economical reform, and the proceedings of national justice, crushed in their very outset by such a conspiracy? Can the Ministers of the country, consistently with their pretensions to the character of men of sense and honour, allow themselves to be thus cheated of their claims to general approbation, brow-beaten into confessions of their own imbecillity, and compelled to record in the face of their countrymen, that their fears will not permit them to assist what their consciences tell them they ought to promote?

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XV.

AN APPEAL FROM THE FLATTERERS OF THE PEOPLE TO THE PEOPLE'S COMMON SENSE.

The spirit of party has, perhaps, been at some periods of our history more immediately detrimental than it appears to have been of late; but certainly it never was so ridiculous or so ill-conducted as it is at this very moment. There have been occasions when the minds of men were roused by pressing dangers to unusual violence: when on the side both of authority and of liberty were ranked the wise, the eloquent, and the powerful; when even contention was not destitute of candour, and genius threw a brilliant gloss upon error itself. But now, when factitious heats seem scarcely ever to blaze in the upper spheres: when those whose conspicuous situation or talent may entitle them to lead the country, no longer rage with a dreadful malice, but content themselves with a few personal accusations or ineffective speeches; when, in short, a lively zeal about party questions no longer exists with the well-informed part of the community; a few ill-disposed persons have begun to raise anew the flames of sedition, and have selected for the subjects of their experiment a class of people highly respectable and worthy of the greatest consideration, but unfortunately little able to judge for themselves on great questions of political expediency. The people at large in this country, as well as those few individuals, who compose what are called the higher ranks of society, are very much disposed to mistake flattery for friendship, and to believe every impostor who, from folly or for profit, perpetually tells them how far their treatment falls short of their desert. That there are abuses, even in the British Constitution, we do not pretend to deny: but that the great mass of the people in this kingdom are endowed with as many privileges as are consistent with their good, and protected in the free exercise of those privileges too, is a general position, that in our opinion admits but little reserve. The only persons, on whom the laws, or the mode of executing the laws, can be said to fall heavily, are the middling class of society. The poor have been generally considered with respect, by our governors, as well as by the framers of the Constitution: for our own parts, standing unconnected with any particular party, we feel the necessity, and the justice of consulting the benefit of the multitude, but we do not see the propriety of tickling their prejudices. Their prejudices will be some day tickled into madness: and if there be any reason to complain of a constitution framed by the wise and good, and conducted usually by the rich and great, what must our lamentations be, when an uninformed and rapacious multitude shall have constituted another code, and placed the executive power in the hands of its needy and ignorant demagogues? Surely, when madness is periodically preached, and honesty misled by ambitious vulgarity, it is not going too far to say that the Liberty of the Press is abused, and that principles are foisted upon the people which may corrupt them into revolutionary restlessness. The common people are desired to think for themselves; but why do they allow bockheads or flatterers to think for them? And if they do think to any purpose, for themselves, they will conclude, that to exercise their franchises, to enjoy the liberty of their words and of their persons, and to reap with security the fruits of their industry, must be sufficient for them, as freemen and men of sense. It is no imputation upon their understandings to say that they are generally incapable of forming a just estimate of political propriety: for the incapability does not arise from their want of good sense, but from their want of sufficient information on such abstruse subjects. The plainest man in this kingdom knows that he served a seven years apprenticeship to his business with a tailor, a shoemaker, or whatever other artisan or tradesman he may have been placed with; and surely, if he allows himself to reflect for a moment, he cannot suppose the affairs of a nation are more easily understood than the proportions of a coat or a pair of boots. Yet he has served no apprenticeship in politics, he has never been engaged in its practice, and, generally speaking, we may add, he has never read any of those authors who explain the principles of government, and supply the science of theory to those professed politicians who have never had opportunities of learning by practice. All that a plain man usually knows, is what he has acquired from the newspapers; and his own sense, even though it be naturally of the strongest description, can never enable him to form accurate estimates from the statements of a newspaper. For the newspaper writers themselves, for the most part know very little more of the science on which they treat, than their readers do. These writers are chiefly attached to some set of men, to some party, who have taught them to entertain particular prejudices, or bribed them to distribute particular prejudices through the country; so that notwithstanding the imposing air which they assume, they are in fact nothing better than blind and ignorant men, who collect the news of the day, who gather the opinions of their chattering associates in taverns and debating societies, and who then square their own reasoning, not to their principles, for they are too stupid to have any, but to their party, because thus they may sell their paper.

An unprejudiced person may indeed form some sort of judgment upon public affairs, if he reads several opposite papers, and seeks carefully for that truth which generally lies in the midst, at an equal distance from every one of them: but the lower class of the people in this country, to whom these observations most particularly apply, seldom see more than one paper, and that paper is usually a Sunday Intelligencer. Let them ask their own reason, and then declare, whether they think that the Sunday paper which they see and believe, for though all vary, "each believes his own," can be the infallible oracle they are accustomed to suppose it. Does it follow, that because their Editor talks largely, his thoughts are enlarged? Is it likely that a set of scribblers who cannot write English or grammar, can have had an education sufficient to fit them for the discussion of political philosophy? Is it likely that the constitution of the country, which must be good only inasmuch as it ensures good government, can be as good as their favourite writers acknowledge it to be, if the government be as bad as those writers wish to prove? Is it likely that they can do as much good by insurrection and discontent, as by a quiet submission to those laws, which prove their own liberality by the impunity of the wretches who calumniate them? If the people have any just grounds of complaint, every election affords them the means of procuring a constitutional redress of their grievances, by the choice of representatives who will obtain that redress; but until the majority of the country shall by such conduct declare that they feel themselves aggrieved, it will be evident that all violent complaints come from a few discontented people, whose interests being at variance with the interests of the majority, ought of course to give way in the consideration of rational men. For the good of the greatest part of the country is the real object of a wise government, and not the gratification of a noisy minority, composed of newspaper writers and their disciples.

In some future numbers of this Paper we shall particularize certain flagrant instances of the folly and wickedness of the Newspaper Revolutionists; in the mean time we recommend it to modest and sensible men to entertain a distrust of their periodical guides, and a diffidence of their own judgment. If all persons were competent to judge upon politics, a republic would be the only just form of government; but the British Constitution, which all concur to praise, has taken the incompetence and inconvenience of popular judgment as the basis of its structure, and while it leaves to the people an ultimate right of redressing their grievances, and benefitting their country at the elections of their representatives, it has given to those representatives the principal power of deciding on those particular questions which really require to be viewed with a little more information that can be gleaned from a Sunday paper. And when the people are entitled to decide, as at the period of their elections they certainly are, let them follow better guides than anonymous writers: let them believe those persons who having a reputation to risk, may be a little cautious in advising: and when they are not called upon to assemble in a constitutional meeting, for election, or for deliberation, where they may hear the opinions of rational and well-informed men, let them abstain from forming any violent opinion at all, remembering that their reason is unassisted by information, and that he who wanders in darkness must always be liable to mistake his path.

FOREIGN INTELLIGENCE.

FROM THE FRENCH, GERMAN, AND HAMBURGH PAPERS.

GERMANY.

FRANKFORT, MARCH 18.—The changes projected among the Courts of the Confederacy of the Rhine begin to be carried into effect. On the 27th of this month the Bavarians will take definitive possession of the principality of Bayreuth. Wirtemberg will take possession of the town and territory of Ulm. The Duke of Wurtzburg will have the town and territory of Swinfurt, in exchange for land ceded to Prussia.

DENMARK.

COPENHAGEN, MARCH 3.—The fermentation of the public mind is very great in Sweden, if we may believe the reports of travellers, and of certain writings, which are circulated in spite of all prohibitions. Among others, one pamphlet is quoted which is said to be very bitter; it has the following title, Why are not two Swedes worth an Ox? This question alludes to a treaty by which Gustavus the IVth sells his subjects to the English Ministry at 14*l.* sterling per head, while the English themselves pay twice as much for an ox. We cannot deny that it must be very humiliating to so brave and spirited a people to be assimilated to the cattle which serve for their food.

MARCH 1.—We perceive no part of the Sound which is not covered with ice. At Elsineur, where the passage is narrow, and the current more rapid, the masses of ice are seen collecting from day to day, so that should the frost continue a week only, it would be possible for the foot soldiers to cross the ice and march into Sweden. When Charles Gustavus, King of Sweden, passed the two Belts on the ice, he caused a medal to be struck with this inscription, NATURA HOC DEBUIT UNO—Nature owed this to One alone: We heartily wish that nature would unite with fortune in giving Charles Gustavus the lie.

ELSINEUR, MARCH 7.—All are actively employed in preparing for the embarkation and transport of the French army into Scania. The flotilla which is building will be in immediate union with the navy, and will serve to protect its movements, and secure the transport from one island to another.

TURKEY.

CONSTANTINOPLE, FEB. 26.—The Porte is making the greatest efforts to re-establish the army of the Grand Vizier, which has been considerably weakened during the winter; 150,000 men from the Asiatic provinces are to repair to it: very severe firmans have been sent to press the execution of the orders of the Grand Signior.

On the 12th and 13th of February, several corps of infantry, coming from Natolia and Schiumla, and repairing to the head-quarters of the Grand Vizier at Adrianople, passed through Constantinople.

The English squadrons continue to have the exclusive dominion of the Archipelago; their vessels, as well as the Maltese cruisers, carry the English flag; they seize all Turkish vessels, as well as all those which issue from a Turkish port. On the 8th of January, the Captain of the frigate Senorse, (Sea-horse) John Stewart, who commands a division, addressed a proclamation to the inhabitants of the Cyclades, in the name of Admiral Collingwood, in which he announces to them the close blockade of the Dardanelles, and the ports of Egypt. He adds, that he has orders to seize all Turkish vessels, even those concerned in the coasting trade, but that he will grant passports to all vessels sailing to and from Malta. The commerce in the Levant is in a state of absolute stagnation.

ITALY.

VENICE, MARCH 5.—The English have just established themselves in the island of Lesina, on the coast of Dalmatia, which the Russians occupied several months during the last war with France. But it is very probable that they will not remain there long, since the island is sufficiently near the land to permit the French to effect a landing by the aid of small boats.

MARCH 7.—By a Decree of M. Dauchy, [illegible] and Administrator of Tuscany, the laws of [illegible] military service, have been put in force [illegible] since the 1st of this month.

AMERICA.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, FEB. 2.

Mr. Sloane, after some prefatory remarks, offered the following Resolutions:—

Resolved, That it is expedient, and the public good requires, that the seat of Government should be removed to the city of Philadelphia for —— years, and that a Committee be appointed to bring in a Bill for that purpose.

Mr. W. Alston called for the Ayes and Noes for considering the motion; they were taken, and are as follows:—Ayes 67, Noes 45.

Mr. Lewis then moved, that the further consideration of the motion be postponed indefinitely. A debate of three hours took place on this motion, and the House adjourned without coming to any decision.

Letters have been received in town from Philadelphia, of the 19th of February, and from New York, of the 24th of February. They agree in representing the American Government as proceeding with caution, resolved to continue the embargo for the present, but not disposed to risk a war with this country. The following is also an extract from a letter from Virginia, the 16th February:—

"We are sorry to say the prospects of adjusting the present disputes are very gloomy, and we fear, from the reconciliating spirit of our Government to Great Britain, that it will be some time before things go right again. The embargo remains still on, and is expected to continue until England and France make peace."

WEST INDIES.

BRIDGE-TOWN, FEB. 16.—The Defence, in consequence of a communication from the Eurydice frigate, which touched in Carlisle Bay, between three and four A. M. on Sunday, proceeded immediately to sea; and it since appears, that the Eurydice was dispatched by Sir J. T. Duckworth into this Bay with information of his being then on his way off Martinique, in quest of the enemy.

We now further learn, that Sir J. T. Duckworth being off Ushant, and having received information on the 18th of January of the enemy having got to sea the preceeding day, sailed immediately in pursuit of him, and at two o'clock yesterday morning spoke the sloop Aurora (from Antigua to this island) 35 miles South-east of Martinique.

His Majesty's schooner Grouper, which was dispatched on Saturday to Admiral Cochrane, upon the arrival of the Defence, returned here yesterday, and left Sir Alexander at 7 p. m. on Sunday, 25 miles to windward of Martinique; his squadron in company then consisting of the and the Acasta, Eurydice, and Jason Frigates.

The Jason sailed from hence with the Defence on Sunday morning, upon the information received from the Eurydice, and joined Admiral Cochrane the same evening; but neither when the Grouper left him at 7 p. m. or the Aurora spoke Sir J. T. Duckworth at two a. m. on Monday, had a junction been formed between the two squadrons although they were both off Martinique.

FEB 20.—Sir J. Duckworth, after having joined Sir A. Cochrane, off Matinique, at eight a. m. on Monday last, and holding a conference with him, proceeded to leeward at eight that night, and is supposed to be gone off St. Domingo, where it is conjectured the enemy may be destined.

Rear-Admiral Cochrane remains off Martinique, about seven leagues to windward, with the Belleisle (flag-ship), Ramillies, Captain, York, Defence, and Intrepid, of the line, with two or three frigates.

A great part of the Astrea's convoy from London (only a part of which appeared off this Island on Sunday last) have not yet arrived here. The vessels chiefly missing are those for Surimm and the other Southern Colonies, and about twenty for Jamaica. The embargo was taken off our ports on Thursday.

IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MONDAY, APRIL 4.

The Irish East India Trade Bill was received from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Cotton Duty and Export Prohibition Bills went through a Committee.

Lord Holland presented a Petition from M. Tierman de Testat, against the Jesuit's Bark Bill, stating the injury which he apprehended therefrom, as being the greatest importer of the article in this country.—It was ordered to lie on the table, and the Bill to which it referred went through a Committee.

Lord Holland moved for an account of the quantity of Peruvian Bark imported and exported for the six years ending the 5th of January 1796, and for similar periods to 1802—1808. Ordered.

Lord Lauderdale moved for various accounts, relative to the Exports to Denmark and America, which were also ordered.

The Orders in Council Indemnity Bill, and Irish Cotton and Bark Bills, were read a second time.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 5.

Lord Redesdale brought in a Bill for better securing the Monies arising from Bankrupts Estates, and for the further amendment of the Bankrupt Laws.—It was read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

Lord Auckland read the 6th Article of the Act of Union with Ireland, to shew that the two countries were to be for ever subject to the same General Regulations of Trade. He then briefly remarked, that the system which had been pursued with regard to the various Bills arising out of the Orders in Council, tended to introduce a practice inconsistent with this general principle. The Bill which was lately passed applied exclusively to this country, and the consequence was, that at this moment the whole of the Export and Import Trade here, was on a different footing from that of Ireland. He knew that a similar measure was in progress with regard to the latter country; but he submitted it for the consideration of the Noble Lords opposite, whether the plan of separate Bills was not dangerous, in point of precedent, as well as inconvenient from loading the Statute Book with numerous Acts, containing a repetition of the same clauses, in their application to the different parts of the United Kingdom. These regulations, which he conceived should have been comprized in one Bill, had been split into five Bills.

Lord Bathurst said, that the Bill which recently passed was a Money Bill, and he apprehended that the practice, in matters of that kind, had been to have a distinct Bill for each country.—With regard to the other Bills now in progress, it might perhaps have been as well that enactments had been comprehended in a single Bill, but as they were proceeding through Parliament with very little difference in point of time, no practical inconvenience could arise from the circumstance of their having been proposed in the shape of separate measures. His Lord-ship's motion was then agreed to,

The second reading of the Scotch Judicature Bill, which stood for to-day, was, on the motion of the Lord Chancellor, postponed to Thursday.

Lord Hawkesbury laid on the table copies of certain Orders in Council, and also various Papers relative to the rupture with Denmark. They were ordered to be printed.—Adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6.

The Irish Warehousing, and East India Trade Bills went through a Committee.

Mr. Brougham was heard at the Bar, in summing up the evidence which had been adduced by the Petitioners against the Orders in Council.

Lord Grenville, immediately after the Counsel withdrew, gave notice that on an early day after the Holidays, he should move the House to address his Majesty for the revocation of the Orders in Council. He would not now fix a precise day for his Motion, but he would certainly submit it between the 5th and 10th of May.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7.

ORDERS IN COUNCIL.

Mr. Campbell, as Counsel on the part of the Petitioner, Mr. de Testat, was heard against the Bark Bill, and in the course of his speech displayed great eloquence and force of argument. At the close of the Learned Counsel's speech, a long discussion took place as to the propriety of hearing him sum up immediately, the result of which was, a division of 15 to 32 against the motion; majority 17 in support of hearing Counsel.

On the question being put, there appeared, for the third reading of the Bill, Contents, 110—Non-contents, 44—Majority, 66—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 8.

Heard Counsel in the Appeal respecting the Roxburgh estates.

The Innkeepers' Rates Bill was received from the Commons, and read a first time.

The Lord Chancellor moved the second reading of the Scotch Judicature Bill. His Lordship explained the chief enactments of the Bill, and contrasted them with those of the measure proposed last Session. With respect to the trial by Jury, the Bill merely went to enable his Majesty to appoint Commissioners to enquire how far, and in what cases, it might be expedient to introduce that institution in civil actions.

Lord Grenville followed the Noble Lord, in the course of his different topics, and drew conclusions adverse to the present Bill, and favourable to the system which he at last proposed. He, however, would not object to its going into a Committee, being willing to adopt a partial remedy to the grievances complained of rather than have none at all.

Lord Lauderdale gave a decided preference to the Bill of last year. He contended that the appointment of Commissioners by the Crown was contrary to precedent, so far as respected the Court of Session. He gave notice, that before the Bill went into a Committee, he should move an instruction for the purpose of dividing it into three Bills.—The Bill was then read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Tuesday.

Lord Bathurst moved the third reading of the Cotton-wool Prohibition Bill. In explaining the grounds on which it was introduced, he chiefly dwelt on the inconveniencies which might arise, without this precautionary measure, from the effect of the American Embargo on the Cotton Trade. The whole quantity necessary for our manufactures was from 58 to 61 millions of pounds. Of this America furnished, of her own growth, 24 millions, besides what she imported to us from the enemy's colonies. At present there was a large stock on hand above the demand, but notwithstanding the expected increase of importation from the Brazils, there would be a deficiency of 13 or 14 millions of pounds in the yearly average of supply, should the American cotton continue to be kept out of the market, and no other source of supply be opened. An abundant supply, however, he was confident, could be procured from our East India possessions; but in the mean time the policy of retaining the quantity on hand was obvious. This was the more necessary as, from information received by Government, there was such a scarcity of the article felt in Germany, that the manufactures there were obliged to send large orders to Turkey, for an inferior quality of cotton, never used in this country but for domestic purposes. Should the American Embargo be discontinued, or, from other causes, the necessity of a total prohibition cease, the means of exporting the surplus which would then exist, were provided for by another Bill now on the table. The Noble Lord then quoted a variety of Acts passed since the year 1794, to prove that exportation under licence from the Privy Council was not a novel proceeding in principle or practice; and argued that, even at common law, the greater part of our commerce could, in no other way be conducted, under the present circumstances, when almost the whole Continent of Europe was in a state of hostility with us. Without a licence, every shilling's worth of property shipped for the Continent, by a British subject, would be liable to capture by our own cruizers.

Lord Auckland thought the apprehensions alledged in justification of the Bill to be unfounded, but he was better pleased that it had been proposed on such grounds, than it should be recommended, as he expected it would have been as a war measure, resting on the system of the Order in Council. If it were to be regarded in the latter point of view, it could not be called even an experiment, for attempts to monopolize the raw material, had been tried a hundred times over, and without success, in all countries. He declared himself incapable of fathoming the principles of commercial policy, upon which we were proceeding to break up the whole system of our trade both in theory and practice. When he considered, that in defiance of all the impediments which our enemy could throw in our way we had, (he could not now say have) an export and import trade of more than 100,000,000*l.* a year; and that the whole of the enemy's commerce did not amount to one-tenth of that sum, he looked with feelings of the utmost alarm to the commencement of a war of prohibitive regulations. Bonaparte could not but perceive, that in such a contest, all the chances were in his favour, particularly in the present state of Europe.

The Bill was further supported by Lord Hawkesbury; and opposed by Lords Grenville and Darnley; and, on a division the motion for the third reading was carried by 44 to 13. The Bill was then read a third time, passed, and was ordered to the Commons.

The Cotton Wool Duty Bill, and the Irish Bark and Cotton Bill, were read a third time and passed.—Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, APRIL 4.

Mr. Alderman Shaw presented a Petition from the Butchers' Company of London, against the Bill for preventing the Damaging of Raw Hides. Referred to the Committee on the Bill, to be heard by Counsel against the same.

Petitions were presented from the Debtors in Londonderry and Cardiff Gaols, praying relief. Laid on the table.

Mr. Taylor, in answer to a question by Lord Temple, deferred until the 5th of May his motion on the Papers connected with the Expedition to the Dardanelles.

Mr. Rose presented a Petition from the Trustees of the British Museum, praying the annual grant of Parliament. Laid on the table.

Mr. Wharton brought up the Reports of the Committee of Ways and Means and Supply of Friday last. The Resolutions were agreed to.

Sir. A. Wellesley obtained leave to bring in a Bill amending the Laws respecting the entering into Recognizances in Criminal Cases in Ireland. The Bill was brought up, read a first, and ordered to be read a second time on Thursday, and to be printed.

Mr. C. Wynne, pursuant to notice, moved for the production of a Copy of the Minutes of Evidence, taken before the Sussex Election Committee, so far as the same respected Mr. Sergisson. His object was, when the Minutes of the Evidence should be produced, to move for leave to bring in Bill preventing such practices in future, as a Resolution of the House impeding a Committee upon an Election Question, from coming to a fair decision. He concluded by moving for the production of the Minutes of Evidence.

Mr. Perceval was not aware of any motion of the kind being to be made. Such a practice as had been condemned by his Hon. Friend, who had just spoken, was a practice customary and frequent.

Sir A. Piggott denied that such resolutions were either frequent or lawful, as in the first place they had never been heard of before; and secondly, they were in direct breach of the Grenville Act.

Mr. Tierney supported the arguments of Sir. A. Piggott, and said, the Commission had no right to act upon a resolution of the House, but ought to proceed entirely on the enactments of the Grenville law.

The House divided, Ayes 39, Noes 56. Majority against the Motion 17.

Mr. Biddulph said, he conceived that a Member of the Committee of Finance was incapable, from the duties imposed on him, of accepting any place of honour or profit under the influence of either the Minister or the Crown; and, as an independent Member of Parliament, thought it his bounden duty to move, that as "R. Wharton, Esq. had accepted of the situation of Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, as a place of profit, he could no longer be a Member of the Committee of Finance; and that the Hon. Mr. Ward be nominated in his room in the said Committee."

Mr Perceval did not think Mr. Wharton disqualified from holding both situations, as the House had not heard any thing to his prejudice. There could be no doubt but he would discharge both duties with equal honour.

The House divided, Ayes 21, Noes 70; Majority against the Motion 49.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee to hear further evidence against the Orders in Council, when Messrs. J. and W. Hall and R. Taylor, ship-owners, and Mr. Baimbridge, an American merchant, of Bread-street, were examined as to the effect of the Berlin Decree.—Adjourned.

TUESDAY, APRIL 5.

A ballot stood for this day for a Committee to try the merits of a Petition, complaining of an undue Election and Return for Newry, in Ireland. The Grenville Act requires that 49 Members should be chosen by ballot in the House, to be afterwards reduced by the Counsel and Agents for the parties to 13, and two Nominees. The House, on the present occasion, could only get 46, of course an Adjournment took place.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 6.

Sir J. Nugent, Chairman of the Dungarvon Election Committee, reported that the Committee had declared the Hon. G. Walpole duly elected, and the Petition against his return to have been frivolous and vexatious.

Sir F. Burdett presented a Petition from the united Parishes of St. Margaret and St. John, Westminster, in support of the Vauxhall Bridge Bill. Laid on the table.

On the motion of Mr. R. Thornton the Vauxhall Bridge Bill was ordered to be read a second time on Monday.

A new Writ was ordered for the Election of a Commissione to serve for the Burghs of Kirkwall, in room of Brig.-Gen. Mackenzie, who had accepted the Stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds.

Mr. Huskisson moved for an Account of the Surplus of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain, for the year ending the 5th of April, 1808. He observed that the House would hear with satisfaction that the Surplus amounted to nearly four millions and a half, and that it exceeded the corresponding quarter of the last year by 600,000*l*. The Account was ordered.

Mr. Bankes moved the resumption of the Order that dropped yesterday, for the House to resolve into a Committee on the Reversion Bill.

Mr. Tierney suggested to his Hon. Friend the propriety of delaying his motion till to morrow, as no inconvenience could result from so short a delay.

The Speaker said that an order that had dropped from one day, could not be put in motion on the next.

A short conversation ensued between Mr. Calcraft, Mr. Perceval, Mr. Tierney, and Mr. Whitbread, in which Mr. W. gave notice, that in the Committee to-morrow he should move for leaving out the time during which the Act was meant to endure. The Committee was fixed for Thursday.

Mr. C. Wynne obtained leave to bring in a Bill for the better Care and Maintenance of Criminal and Pauper Lunatics.

On the motion of Mr. Perceval the Order for hearing further evidence to-morrow in support of the Orders in Council, was discharged, and fixed for Monday, when the Gentlemen already ordered to attend were again ordered for that day, with the addition of J. Inglis, Esq.—Adjourned.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7.

A Message from the Lords, stated their Lordships acquiescence in the East India Trade (Irish) Bill, and the Irish Warehousing Goods Bill.

Mr. Lushington gave notice, that on Monday next he should move for the production of additional Papers respecting the Etrusco, and that on Monday, the 9th of May, he should bring forward a motion on the whole of that subject.

ASSESSED TAXES.

Mr. Biddulph objected to any further progress being made in the Bill, as it went to increase these duties in the sum of 100,000*l*. without any ground for such increase having been stated by the Finance Minister.

Mr. Huskisson said, that his Right Hon. Friend (Mr. Perceval) had sufficiently explained the subject in the Committee of Ways and Means; and the Bill by no means imposed any additional charge on the Public, as it only took the surplus of the Assessed Taxes up to the 5th instant, in order to defray the interest of four millions of Exchequer Bills, outstanding, which had been funded.

Mr. Perceval maintained, that the Bill was a Bill of Supply; and therefore it was necessary it should not be impeded. After a short conversation between Dr. Lawrence and Mr. Rose, the Bill was read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Monday.

DEFENCE OF THE COUNTRY.

Lord Castlereagh gave notice, that it was his intention, on Tuesday next, to offer to the House a proposition relative to the Internal Defence of the Country. His object was to have it submitted to the consideration of the House upon that day, without then meaning to enter further into it, but to have it printed and circulated for consideration, and then calling their attention to it at a reasonable period after the Easter recess.

REVERSION BILL.

Mr. Bankes moved the Order of the Day for the House resolving itself into a Committee.

The question was put, and Mr. Speaker left the Chair, Mr. H. Thornton filling that of the Committee.

Mr. Bankes said, that on the occasion of the last Bill having been rejected in another House, he formed the resolution of trying another, which might promise more success. With that view he formed the Bill then before the Committee. If he could not procure as much as the country required, at least he hoped to gain some practical good: this he was certain that the measure before the House would accomplish. He found it in vain to extend the period longer than one year, and till after the next Session of Parliament. Had it been of longer duration, he was very apprehensive that it would meet with such resistance elsewhere as to overthrow it altogether. He had removed from this Bill all that might seem objectionable to those Noble Personages who opposed the last, and he was therefore of opinion that this would succeed; and he earnestly advised the House to agree with him therein. When times and circumstances change, it may be deemed wise to make it permanent; and if he atchieved no other object, this at least must be ceded to him, that by its obtaining existence on the Statute Book, it would gain recognition. He then moved, that the first blank in the Bill be filled up with these words:—"for one year, and from thence till six weeks after the next Sessions of Parliament."

The Chancellor of the Exchequer rejoiced that the Hon. Gentleman had adopted the arrangement which he had pointed out to him. In any other shape he feared that it would still retain the principal objections which proved fatal to the former measure. It should not bear resemblance to the last, on account of the rules of Parliament, and it should not contain within its clauses any thing that could make it obnoxious to those who should have the ultimate decision upon it. Finding that the objectionable clauses were rejected, and the Bill had now assumed that shape which a Noble Relation of his own, in another place, suggested, he should now give it his support. When the Hon. Gentleman gave notice of his intention of bringing in the Bill, he then intimated to him his then intention of suggesting some amendments, one of which was, to prevent all grants of this description being concealed, to have had them publicly announced in the Gazette, that it might be ascertained when and how they were disposed of; but having been made acquainted with the implication that would have attended a clause of that description, he yielded to the reasoning which he heard on the subject, and had given up the intention of submitting that amendment. It appeared to him then, that the first amendment proposed by his Hon. Friend, combined with the second, which declared the Bill to have merely a suspending operation, would present it to the Lords in a form and substance different from what it possessed before. He was free to confess that the proposed amendments rendered the Bill more acceptable to him, than if it had been enacted in the shape that was first proposed. But still he must say, that he had not in any degree changed the opinion which he had all along expressed with regard to the supposed intrinsic utility of the measure. He doubted, however, its tendency to produce economy in the public expenditure, for to him it appeared that the expectation which Reversions might excite would be found rather a cheap mode of rewarding public services—(a laugh.)—Upon the whole, it certainly was his wish that the Bill should receive the sanction of the Legislature in its amended shape, since a large portion of the Public, and many of the Members of that House, attached so much consequence to the measure; and he most willingly agreed to withdraw those amendments of which he had given notice, and acceded to those proposed by his Hon. Friend.

Mr. Whitbread was certain the beneficial effects of this Bill would ultimately prove a great saving to the Public. He was glad that a revolution had taken place in the mind of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with respect to the Bill; whether it arose from a coincidence of public sentiment or not, was immaterial; but it was deplorable to see the King's Ministers defeated in the other House. It argued little in favour of their stability, when they could not carry the Bill into a law, though it had been recommended by his Majesty in his speech. He was not friendly to this Bill in its limitted state, yet he apprehended it, modified as it was, it would meet the fate of the former Bills; he, however, hoped the House would persevere under the impression that the other branch of the Legislature would see the necessity of retrenching the public burthens; and when the Bill came out of the Committee he should consider it his duty to propose to leave out the limited time, and adopt the Bill in its original state.

Mr. Fuller declared, that he looked upon the present Bill as merely a tub thrown out to the whale—(a laugh)—it reminded him of the Slave Trade Bill, in which there was a deal of management. But he had a fellow-feeling for the people, and since they wished for the measure, he was anxious that their wishes should be gratified; let it go then, and let them make the best of it. Seriously, however, these Reversionships appeared to him of great utility; for they might be given to the son of a Lord Chancellor, for instance, who had raised himself from nothing; whereas now, if the present Bill passed, they might be pocketed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the day for himself, or given to a child—(great laughter). He had no particular allusion to any one in this.

Sir J. Newport contended, that of all other things Reversion stood most in the way of economical reform. He enumerated a variety of those reversions in Ireland, which had been pointed out by the Finance Committee of that country. He instanced, in particular, that of Surveyor of the Port of Dublin, the emoluments of which were above 2000*l.* per annum, and which had been granted for three lives. He said it would be endless to go through all the variety of offices connected with the revenue in Ireland, which had been reversion sinecures, and besides stood in the way of the public benefit. Of these there were the Comptroller of Duties in the Port of Cork, where the principal had 1000*l.* and the deputy, who alone did the duty, had 300*l.* per annum.—There was also the office of Taster of Wines—(a laugh)—not long ago re-established, in which there was not even the semblance of duty to discharge, which brought in 1000*l.* annually, and this he would not scruple to say, had been given to the Hon. J. Beresford, and in reversion to two of his sons. The Right Hon. Member enumerated other local offices of a similar description, and added, that it would be enough to say to the other House, you have had all these abuses presented to you in the Report of a Committee, to shew the expediency of preventing the Grant of Reversions. But if the Law Department of Ireland were looked into, the grants would be found still more enormous; and instead of one or two thousand, some would be found to rise to eight or nine thousand pounds a year. There had also been various compensations of the most shameful kind granted for the loss of offices by the Union; and it was well known that the Board of Compensation had sat three weeks considering what compensation should be given to the King's Rat-catcher. (A laugh.) The Hon. Gentleman then alluded to those means of influence and corruption by which he said the Union was brought about, and related an anecdote of a certain Noble Lord, whom he was sorry not to see in his place, having urged a friend to accept an office only for a year, in order that he might be entitled to some compensation on the loss of it. The Right Hon. Member pledged himself that he was prepared to bring all these things to light, and establish them in the Committee, if the House should think fit.

A conversation then ensued, between Mr. A. Smith, Mr. Bankes, Mr. Martin, and Mr. Dundas, on several clauses of the Bill, during which amendments were introduced. The Bill went through the Committee, and the Report was ordered to be received to-morrow.

Mr. Whitbread, after a few observations on the limited time of the Bill, gave notice, that he should move an Amendment to-morrow, that the Bill should be suspended during Ninety-nine Years.

Mr. W. Smith brought up the Lunatics Bill, which was read twice, committed, the Report received, and the Bill ordered to be taken into further consideration on the 10th of May, and printed.—Adjourned.

FRIDAY, APRIL 8.

Mr. Speaker acquainted the House that he had received a letter from Admiral Stirling, acknowledging the receipt of the Speaker's letter, with the Thanks of the House for the capture of Monte Video.

The House was informed by a Message from the Lords, that their Lordships had agreed to the Bark Export Prohibition Bill.

On the motion of Mr. Dundas Saunders, a new Writ was ordered for the Election of a Commissioner for the county of Sutherland, in room of the Right Hon. W. Dundas, now Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds.

Mr. Vansittart gave notice for Tuesday of a motion for the production of certain public accounts relative to the Trade of England.

A Petition was presented against the late Return of Mr. B. Cooke, for New Malton, which was ordered to be taken into further consideration on the 3d of May.

In a Committee of Supply, sums were voted for the pay and cloathing of the Militia, and for allowances to certain Officers of the Militia disembodied; 48,000*l.* for employing convicts at home; 2500*l.* for the Stationary Office; 31,500*l.* for stationary to both Houses of Parliament; 4450*l.* for the farther preservation of the Public Records, and 5000*l.* on account, for completing the buildings for the Royal Naval Asylum, until the estimate for that edifice should be presented. Report ordered to be received on Monday.

An account was presented from the Exchequer, of the surplus of the Consolidated Fund, and Mr. Huskisson gave notice, that on Monday, in the Committee of Supply, he should move for its appropriation.

RUSSIAN PAPERS.

Mr. Whitbread rose in consequence of a notice he had given, respecting the speech of a Noble Lord (Lord G. L. Gower) on the 29th of March last. In the course of the Session there had been much discussion on the propriety of quoting from official documents. He did not mean to go over all the arguments for and against that practice, he only thought such a practice was unfair towards the House, and that it ought to be prohibited. The power to make such communications ought certainly to be confined to Ministers, as no other individuals had a right to make such communications. The Noble Lord to whom he alluded (Lord L. Gower) had lately been Ambassador to Russia, and he had made certain communications to the Foreign Secretary of State, which that Secretary had refused to lay before Parliament. After the demise of Mr. Pitt, Lord Mulgrave had given to both Houses a great mass of information, disclosing things very improper to be communicated, as no motions had been made for their disclosure. These related to the utter defeat of the Continental Confederacy of Austria and Russia against France, which was entirely ruined by the battle of Austerlitz. The Hon. Gentleman went on to complain that Lord Gower had misled Sir A. Paget in regard to the co-operation of Russia with Austria at that period, and that fact had produced the catastrophe of that campaign. He also complained of Lord Gower, presuming he was acquainted with the secret Articles of the Treaty of Tilsit; and that the field had been taken against France with an inferior force, namely, by 406,000 men, instead of 500,000. He next adverted to the conversations held by the Emperor of Russia, in regard to limiting the maritime jurisdiction of Great Britain, and said, he should be glad of ample explanation upon that point. He maintained, that Russia had a latent cause for hostility to this country, independent of the Expedition to Copenhagen, which certainly had encreased, and this position he had elucidated by several arguments. He next alluded to a private letter, written by Lord Gower to Mr. Canning, and commented forcibly upon what were understood to be its contents. He next denied that Lord Hutchinson had had any conversations with the Emperor of Russia, but those he had been instigated to by Lord Gower; and that the Emperor had, as it were, bamboozled Lord H. and had pronounced a tirade against this country. The Hon. Gentleman, after dwelling on these points, concluded by moving an Address to his Majesty, for Copies of the Correspondence of Lord G. L. Gower, of the 11th of April 1805, with the Secretary of State, on the subject of a Declaration delivered to his Lordship by the Minister of Russia.

Lord G. L. Gower was happy to find this business at length brought forward, as he was convinced he could justify his conduct to the House and the country; and that he could also make out, that he had been no party towards bartering away the maritime rights of the country. For this opportunity he was obliged to the Hon. Gentleman, and he would, in justice to the memory of Mr. Pitt, exculpate him from any blame for the failure of the Confederacy. He would therefore request his Right Hon. Friend, Mr. Canning, to grant the motion of the Hon. Gentleman to the full extent, excepting with regard to the private letter. On that subject, did the House think he had been deficient in his duty, it was an easy matter to express its disapprobation, by a vote of censure upon his conduct for having written it.—That however, he imagined to be totally out of the question. The intelligence communicated by that letter, came into his Lordship's possession in a certain way, and it would involve the interests, nay, even the lives, of those who helped him to that intelligence, were the mode in which it was come by divulged. Besides, it would be a gross breach of confidence, and a violation of all diplomatic faith. He concluded by moving an amendment to the Address, leaving out the private letter to Mr. Secretary Canning.

Mr. Secretary Canning said, he should be unworthy his situation if he disclosed, or gave up, letters which had been written to him privately. There were many secret communications which could not, with safety, be made public in any shape.

Mr. Whitbread replied with great animation; when the House divided—For the amendment 114—Against it 50. The original motion was of course lost.

On the Report of the Reversion Bill being brought up, Mr. Whitbread observed, that he wished to defer, till Monday, the motion he intended to make respecting this Bill, which was of great public importance. The amendments were then read a second time, and the Bill ordered to be engrossed, printed, and read a third time on Monday.

Sir John Newport moved, that there be laid before the House a List of the Appointments which had been granted in the Linen Board of Ireland, since the 31st of December last, together with the qualifications.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer postponed, till Tuesday, the further hearing of evidence on the Orders in Council.—Adjourned till Monday.

IRELAND.

The trial of Mr. Alcock and Mr. Dorensy, his second, was commenced on Monday se'nnight, at the Wexford Assizes, on an indictment charging the former with the wilful murder of Mr. Colclough, and the latter with aiding and assisting. The witnesses for the prosecution stated the circumstances of the duel, and that Mr. Alcock wore spectacles on that occasion, which he declined to take off. On the part of the prisoners it was stated, by Lord Valentia, that he was deputed by Mr. Alcock's Committee to carry a message to Mr. Colclough (in which Mr. Alcock acquiesced), stating that they considered Mr. Alcock as the representative of a party, and not of himself, that they would wish therefore that the business should be postponed until after the election, and that if any loss of character resulted to Mr. Alcock from withdrawing the challenge, they would take it on themselves. The answer given to his Lordship by Mr. Colclough's friends was, that since Mr. Alcock had committed himself so far, he must meet Mr. Colclough in half an hour. Another witness deposed, to an offer of accommodation having been made on the part of Alcock's friends, which was refused; and a third stated, that the effect of the glasses worn by Mr. A. on a defective eye was, that the object was made clearer, but not more defined, and that it was dimished in size and light; he did not think the hitting a distant object was thereby rendered more secure. Mr. Baron Smith having summed up the evidence, the Jury retired, and in about three minutes returned a verdict of not guilty.

Thursday se'nnight came on to be tried before the Hon. Justice Mayne, and a respectable Jury, at Ennis, W. Hammond, Esq. of Dublin, for the alledged murder of W. Foley, Esq. of Shepperton, county of Clare, in a duel fought at Six-Mile Bridge, on Saturday, the 23d of January last.—On the part of the Crown, the following witnesses were examined:—Ensign Taylor, Surgeon Thwaites, Mr. Patrick Falvey, and —— M'Mahon; and after a most impressive charge from the Judge, the Jury retired, and returned a verdict, at seven o'clock at night, of Manslaughter.—The following sentence was pronounced on Saturday by his Lordship:—"that the said William Hammond be confined 12 months in the county gaol, and burned in the hand."

PROVINCIALS.

Cambridge, April 1.—The Chancellor's two gold medals, value 15 guineas each, for the two commencing Bachelors of Arts who shall acquit themselves the best in classical learning, are this year adjudged to Mr. Charles James Bloomfield, and Mr. Richard Ward, both of Trinity College.

The subjects for the Members' Prizes for this year are, for the Senior Bachelors, Quæ præcipua sint tabenæ Imperii Indicia? For the Middle Bachelors, Quanquam Histrionis Artem miremur, quærendum tamen, utrum Mores Hominum emendet magis, an corrumpat Scena?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

Sir,—At this season of the year, it may be of service to publish the following fact:—In April, 1807, I had a ewe from which had been drawn, with great difficulty, a lamb that had been dead within her nearly a week. In some hours afterwards her pains returned, and continued very violent; upon which I gave her 30 drops of laudanum, in a little milk pottage. This dose I repeated, at intervals of eight or ten hours, as long as the pains continued violent; and afterwards, for a week, I gave her 15 drops night and morning, keeping her in a warm stable during the night, and letting her out into a good pasture during the day. In three weeks she got perfectly well.

Yours, &c. Y.

A lamb which had lost its dam, has been reared on a farm near Swansea in the following manner, which we understand is frequently practised in Lincolnshire:—The skin of a lamb which had died soon after being yeaned, was taken off, and the other lamb carefully sewed up in it; the ewe took to it immediately and continues to suckle it with as much fondness as if it had been her own.

On Friday se'nnight, was shot at Kirkandrews, near Carlisle, a most singular woodcock. It was of an extraordinary large size, and was furnished with only one leg; and from the most minute examination of the bird, it was evident, that it must have been formed in that state

On Tuesday a conger eel was taken in the Wash at Yarmouth, by a fisherman, which measured six feet in length, and twenty-two inches in girth, and weighed three stone seven pounds. This eel, on finding no way of escape, rose erect, and actually knocked the fisherman down before he could take it.

A few days since, as some workmen were digging a small court at Cheltenham, they found, within sixteen inches of the surface, a fresh-looking brown earthen pot, containing between 11 and 150 shillings of the reigns of Edward VI. Philip and Mary, Elizabeth, James I. and Charles I. The whole were in tolerable good condition, and the pot, except from its shape, (which somewhat resembled a raisin jar) appeared as if but lately buried.—From there being no coin, however, amongst them since those of Charles I. it is probable that the owner concealed this little treasure during the dissentions that followed that reign, and, falling a victim, never returned to reclaim it.

Thursday last John Clayton West, and another person, were tried at Shrewsbury Assizes, for picking the pocket of F. Fellowes, Esq. on last Lord Mayor's day, of a pocket-book, containing 2000*l.* in bills, &c. They had changed one of the bills at the Shrewsbury Bank; shortly after, they were pursued and taken. West was found guilty, and sentenced to be transported for seven years.

MURDER.—At Stafford Assizes, on Monday last, William Hawkeswood was found guilty of poisoning his master, Mr. Parker, of Swindon, in Staffordshire, by administering to him poison (corrosive sublimate) in a cup of camomile tea. The prisoner, when called upon for his defence, offered a written paper, wherein he acknowledged his having administered the poison, without the knowledge of any other person, but that he did not do it with an intention of injuring any one; that he meant by it as a "trick upon the old woman, the housekeeper." He also spoke very highly of his master's (the deceased) kindness towards him. The prisoner was found guilty, and executed on Wednesday morning.

A shocking occurrence took place at Newnham on Saturday se'nnight: as Mrs Matthews, wife of Mr. M, an attorney of that place, was standing with her back to the fire, her dress caught the flames, and in a few seconds she was so enveloped in them as to exclude the possibility of extinguishing them till the whole of her apparel was consumed. Mr. M. who exerted himself to extinguish the flames was so much burnt that his life was despaired of. The Clerk also suffered from his exertions in the same attempt. What added materially to the rapidity of the flames was her rushing from the room in which the accident took place into an adjoining passage, where the draft of air considerably aided the progress of the fire; she only survived the melancholy accident about three or four hours. This is another of the mournful effects produced by fire, of which not a week passes but two or three instances occur.

We understand that Mr. Alexander Angus, a person of considerable respectability in the mercantile and insurance line at Liverpool, has been committed to the county gaol of Lancaster to take his trial for the murder of Miss Burns, who had been an inmate of his house, and who had been nearly related to his late wife. Some suspicious circumstances attending the death of Miss B. led to an inquest, and under the direction of the Coroner, her body was opened, and found to contain a considerable quantity of poison, which was pronounced to have occasioned her death. Report says that she had been in a state of pregnancy, was prematurely delivered, and found dead in Mr. Angus's room, but no child could be found. The prisoner was under examination the whole of Thursday, and part of Friday se'nnight, at the expiration of which he was fully committed.

SINGULAR ACCIDENTS.—A person residing in the neighbourhood of Swansea, fell from his horse, a few days since, and dislocated his collar-bone; a servant was dispatched for surgical assistance, who likewise fell and broke his arm: and another, sent on the same errand, met with a similar accident, and broke his collar-bone.

POLITICAL EVENTS OF THE WEEK.

No official intelligence has yet arrived concerning the Mediterranean fleet, under the command of Sir RICHARD STRACHAN, and the victory over the Rochefort squadron. Under these circumstances we can only repeat our belief, that, notwithstanding the silence which has hitherto prevailed upon this interesting subject, the accounts that are generally believed of a decisive victory have not been believed without good ground. Some persons have imagined, that because the hostile fleet was lying within the Bay of Palmas, the British Admiral would have been unwilling to attack it; but it has been observed, and experience sanctions the observation, that the superiority of numbers, or of situation, has little effect on the mind of an English Commander. Lord NELSON's life was one series of examples illustrating this remark.

We have received no farther advices from the seat of war in the North. In Portugal the distresses of the people begin to augment; and if the prospect of the ensuing harvest be indeed as melancholy as it has been represented, General JUNOT himself, who, regardless of the miseries of the people, has hitherto provided food for his own soldiery, will soon be compelled either to evacuate the country, or to hold it at the expence or risk of procuring supplies from abroad. We mention all this as matter rather of regret than blame to the French Officers; for, as long as they have orders to continue in possession of Portugal, they are bound at almost any rate to furnish their men with the supplies that may be necessary for their subsistence.

There is a Bill which has passed the House of Commons, and which is now depending in the Lords, calculated to alter the course of proceedings on indictments and informations in the Courts of King's Bench in certain cases:—

By this Bill it is proposed to enact—"That whenever any "person shall be charged with any offence by indictment or in- "formation in the Court of King's Bench, not being treason or "felony, the Judge may issue his warrant, and cause such person "to be apprehended, in order to his or her being bound to the "King with sufficient sureties, in such sum as in the said "warrant shall be expressed, with condition to appear in the "said Court, and to answer, &c.—and in case of neglect or re- "fusal, it shall be lawful for the Judge to commit such person "to the common gaol of the county, city, or place, there to "remain, &c. And in case he or she shall not enter a plea or "demurrer in the said Court to such indictment or information, "it shall be lawful for the prosecutor to cause an appearance, "and also the plea of not guilty to be entered in the said Court, "and to proceed to trial thereon, as if the Defendant had "appeared and pleaded not guilty.—And there is a clause to au- "thorize the execution in Scotland of warrants issued in Eng- "land," &c. &c. &c.

It is a cruel measure to try any man for an offence in his absence; and it is equally dreadful to authorise the imprisonment of any friendless man whose poverty precludes him from procuring facts, merely because he may have called his neighbour a rogue, or in negligence committed a nuisance. To almost all poor men, whether guilty or not guilty, this Bill will produce imprisonment; and as to the fear lest criminals should abscond, it may be urged that instances of flight for petty offences very rarely occur; when they do, the banishment itself is generally sufficient penance.

This extension of punishment, for surely this is rather a measure of preliminary punishment than of needful precaution, would be dangerous enough, even if limited to cases of indictment; but that an Englishman should be dragged, perhaps twenty or thirty miles, from his home, upon mere information, is revolting to every principle of Liberty and the Constitution.

We earnestly hope that some of the Law Lords will check this Bill in the Upper House.

Some letters have been received from Madras. One, dated the 22d of October, is more explicit on the subject of Sir Edward Pellew's secret expedition to the Eastward, than any previously received. It is stated that Sir Edward left Madras on the 19th of October, in the Culloden, accompanied by the Powerful, Dasher, and Samaram men of war, and the Worcester and Byrangore, used as transports. He was accompanied by 500 men of his Majesty's 30th regiment, a company of artillery and pioneers. It was said he was to proceed from Penang, where he was to be joined by more troops from Bengal. It was first surmised that the object of attack was Manilla, which was taken by the English in 1762; but, on comparing the strength of the Island with the force sent against it, that idea was abandoned, and the more general one prevailed, that the expedition was meditated against Java.

The following is the extract of a letter from Demerara, dated January 20, 1808:—

"I have to inform you that an embargo was yesterday laid on all shipping, merely to prevent the Americans from getting away till we see for which side they declare."

From this extract, which was on Monday exhibited at Lloyd's, it would seem, that the Governors of our Colonies assume, or are invested with a very extraordinary power indeed. Perhaps this proceeding may be the result of imperfect instruction from our Government at home, or of forward zeal on the part of the Colonial Governor. Let us hope, that such a measure will not tend to exasperate the feelings of the Americans. We remember a similar proceeding some time since on the part of the Governors of Grenada and St. Vincents, but as it took place under circumstances somewhat different from those which now exist, and as it continued but a day or two, it did not excite much attention.

Captain Duncan, who for some time past has had a command in the Portuguese naval service, had the good fortune, about the end of February, to escape on board the Russian squadron in the Tagus, from whence he further succeeded in getting on board a vessel of our blockading fleet, and is now arrived in England. This officer remained on board the Russian squadron till the 13th ult.; he of course had ample means of ascertaining the state of opinion, and disposition of the Russian officers there. Captain Duncan states, that they are anxious to leave that uncomfortable station, could they do it with safety. The Russians had suffered greatly from the want of necessaries of all kinds. Junot had forbidden any supplies being sent to them; nor had they been enabled for some time, to procure from the stores of Portugal an ounce of fresh provisions of any kind. In the meanwhile the inhabitants of Lisbon were reduced to the necessity of making bread of peas, beans, and all the inferior sorts of grain, which, when mixed together, were scarcely eatable; and even of this kind the supply was scanty.—Several Councils had been held on board the Russian squadron, to consider of the measures to be pursued at such an emergency. At one time it was proposed, that the Russian fleet should put to sea, consisting of nine sail of the line and a frigate, and risk an engagement with the English; but on reflecting that every one of their ships were damaged in their masts, the plan was abandoned as impracticable. Besides this, the crews, for want of proper nourishment, were in a very sickly state.—The plan that had met the sense of the majority as the less evil of the two, was that of laying up their ships in the Tagus, and of marching their crews overland to St. Petersburgh. This project had not been carried into execution on the departure of Captain Duncan; but he is of opinion that it must soon take place, from necessity.

Mr. Gambier, the late Consul at Lisbon, is appointed Consul at the Brazils, and will embark, in a few days, on board the Presidente frigate, Capt. Mackenzie, for that place.

A curious discovery, which involved the reputation of a young lady of character, was made in Pall-Mall, on Sunday night. An officious hackney-coachman set down a gentleman, and the young lady in question, in Pall-Mall, between eleven and twelve o'clock, and the coachman demanded two shillings for his fare; the gentleman having given him eighteen-pence, the coachman, dissatisfied, secretly followed his passengers; and, after an affectionate parting, the young lady knocked at the door of a respectable house in Pall-Mall, not many yards from the spot where the coach had stopped. The coachman accosted the lady at the door for another sixpence, which she refused to give; and, on the door being opened, and the coachman still pressing for his money, and still being refused, he appealed to two persons belonging to the house, whether the time he had waited, together with such a distance from a certain house, of notoriety for the accommodation of the sexes, in the vicinity of Soho-square, did not entitle him to a two shilling fare. The lady fainted on her faux pat being related; and the meddling coachman was dismissed with his sixpence.—The lady's gallant is the son of a Lord.

AMATORY ADVERTISEMENT.—We have frequently seen Advertisements in the Morning Papers, declaratory of some gentleman's matrimonial views, or some lady's pecuniary embarrassments: but an open advertisement from a man who wants a mistress, was reserved for these times of universal impudence. We do not believe that vice is so general at present as it has been in some former ages: but surely it has become more shameless than ever it was. The Morning Advertiser published, last Friday, a notice that a Lady might form a permanent connexion of delicacy, honour, and inviolable integrity, by applying to a Captain Morris. Marriage was declared to be out of the question, and Ladies of a certain description were proscribed, though the advertiser declared that his object was not to allure any lady from a life of rectitude. Was ever so disgraceful a publication? Where is now that Society for the Suppression of Vice, whose vengeance falls so heavily on petty sins? Will not they admonish the printer to be a little more select in his admissions, and prosecute the Captain with the utmost rigour of the penal code?

SPORTING MAGAZINE, 186 Numbers, making 31 Volumes, containing 400 Copper-plates, are now published; the Work going on with great spirit, and a New Feature; viz. Disputes among Gentlemen on Points of Honour, &c. This article not only animadverts on those subjects previously given, of Disputes, Duels, Altercations, Trials, &c. but corrects such statements as tend to an improper bias in the public mind. To be had of all Booksellers.

Early on Thursday morning eleven French prisoners made their escape from the Vigilante prison ship in Portsmouth harbour, by swimming from her, alongside of a frigate in ordinary, and took her boat from astern; from thence they proceeded to one of the King's buoy boats (a fast sailing vessel, being coppered), secured the men, three in number, below, belonging to her, and about a quarter before five o'clock went out of the harbour. It being a vessel belonging to Government, was not hailed from the watch-house, (though observed going out), and, no doubt, ere this have gained the French coast. Two of them, in attempting to get alongside of the frigate in ordinary, stuck in the mud, one of whom was found dead, and the other much exhausted, who was taken back to the prison ship.

EAST INDIA AFFAIRS.

Wednesday a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when Captain Eckford, of the Lady Jane Dundas, took leave, previous to departing for Madras and Bengal. Captain G. Fleming was sworn into the command of the Earl Spencer destined for Madras and Bengal.—Adjourned.

Tuesday the agreeable news was received at the East India House, of the safe arrival of the following ships in the Downs, under convoy of his Majesty's ship Diadem, from the Cape of Good Hope, viz.

The Marchioness of Exeter, Captain Nash; Admiral Gardner, Capt. Eastfield; Lord Melville, Capt. Lennox: Dover Castle, Capt. Richardson; and Baring, Capt. Carnegie—from Bengal and Madras.

United Kingdom, Capt. D'Esterre—from Madras.

Devaynes, Capt. Adderley; Tottenham, Capt. Jones; and Union, Capt. Macintosh—extra ships from Bengal and Madras.

The Castle Eden, Colnett; and City of London, Yates, were docking at Calcutta.

The Metcalfe, Isacke, had arrived at Diamond Harbour from Bombay, cargo out, and was to return there.

The Lord Duncan, Bradford, which was bound to Penang with troops and stores, had returned to Saugor on account of bad weather, probably would have occasion to be docked.

The Duke of Montrose, Paterson, from St. Helena, passed Saugor the 2d of October.

The General Stuart, Rogers, was lying at Saugor, ready for sea, and expected to be dispatched as a packet.

The Admiral Gardner, spoke the Walpole, Sandilands, between the Reefs, the 11th October, having lost her mizen mast, but otherwise well.

The Surrey, Camberlige, and Lady Castlereagh, Murray, were said to be safe at the Land Heads.

The Marquis of Wellesley, Le Blanc, had gone to the Isle of France, as a cartel, and had not returned.

The Worcester, S. Wood, gone on the Expedition to the Eastward, under Sir Edward Pellew.

The extra ship Tigris, Macdougal; and Experiment, Normand; sailed from the Cape for Madras, the 10th January.

It appears by information received this day, that the outward-bound extra ships, viz. Glory, Northampton, Ann, Sarah, Christina, Diana, Sir William Pulteney, and Union, which sailed under convoy of Admiral Drury, in his Majesty's ship Monmouth, only passed the Cape on the 7th December, instead of having arrived in Table Bay, as advised in a former account.

L'Revenue, Captain Surcouff, had taken the ships Hunter, Trafalgar, and Mangles. The Mangles and Trafalgar were on their passage from Bengal to Madras, with cargoes of rice, an article of the utmost value to the captors, as the latest accounts from the Mauritius gave a dismal picture of the sufferings of the island from the effects of famine, and particularly from the scarcity of grain. The ship and cargo of the Mangles are insured in Calcutta to the amount of two lacks of rupees; the Trafalgar nearly to the same extent. The commanders, one or two of the officers, and a part of the crew of the prizes, were detained by Sourcouff. After the capture of the above ships, Surcouff made sail to the southward, in company with the prize. All the Lascars were taken out of the two prizes, and transferred to the privateer; the seacunnies were left on board, and a few Frenchmen shipped in each vessel.

The frigates L'Italienne, and Le Sultan, were expected at the Mauritius from France.

The Piedmontese was in the Bay of Bengal, and had made the following captures.

Caroline, Eaglestone; Sarah, Henderson; Maria, James; Eliza, Sparkes; Udney, Walers; Danesbourg, Winter; Highland Chief, Makpiece.

The ship Clyde, Captain Burnside, arrived at Madras, Oct. 19th, from Calcutta, with intelligence of a violent storm having been felt in the Bay, by which 18 sail of vessels had been lost, four were country ships captured by the enemy.

Passengers per Tottenham.—Mrs. Hedger, J. Routledge, Esq. Mrs. P. Graham, Lieutenant White, 8th regiment of dragoons, Lieuts. Harvey and Norten, 22d foot, Masters L. and W. O'Brien.

Passengers per Devaynes.—Mrs. Grame, Mr. Fraser, Masters Harrrington, Grame, and Miss Grame.

We have the pleasure to announce the safe arrival of the General Stuart at Portsmouth, on the 8th inst. The General Stuart has brought home an account of the fall of Fort Kilsmore, near Allighur, which place was taken on the 24th of November, after a month's siege. Thirty-eight officers fell on this occasion, and a great number of men.

The Metcalfe sailed from Bengal with the General Stuart, and parted on the 14th December off Ceylon, bound for Bombay. We learn by this medium that the fortress of Comona, commanded by a refractory Chief (Daondia Khan,) in the ceded provinces, was taken by storm, and, we are sorry to add, with the loss of several officers and men on our side. The number of the former, according to the best information we have been able to collect, is 35 in killed and wounded.

The following list is believed to be correct:

Killed and wounded at Camoona, in the district of Allyghur, in the Ceded Provinces:

Staff, killed—Lieutenant-Colonel Duff, Brigade-Major Fraser.

Wounded dangerously—Major Lieutenant W. Fogo.

THE THEATRES.

COVENT-GARDEN.

OBSERVATIONS ON BONIFACIO AND BRIDGETINA, OR THE KNIGHT OF THE HERMITAGE, OR THE WINDMILL TURRET, OR THE SPECTRE OF THE NORTH-EAST GALLERY.

The Melodrama intended to ridicule the Melodramas, continues to be acted at Covent Garden, though it was completely condemned on the first night of its performance. There was a time, when plays would quietly submit to their fate, and retire from the stage, after a home thrust from the audience; but in these days though a mortal blow has been given by the denunciation of the spectators, the piece continues to rear its head; and in spite of the most thorough destruction and damnation, a posthumous Melodrama rises to "push us from our stools." To push us from our stools, in the literal sense of the phrase, for he must be possessed of more than ordinary fortitude who can sit still at the representation of such a piece as the Covent Garden Melodrama: The Propietor of a Theatre once considered himself as amenable to the tribunal of the public: he used to think that it was his duty, as well as his interest, to comply with their sense, when decidedly expressed; but that happy period is past; he now makes the public his convenience, not his oracle; and with an independence truly Roman, he exclaims:

——Mihi res, non me rebus subjungere conor.

Indeed the scheme seems to answer pretty well; for by dint of perseverance he at last beats the public into a patient endurance of almost any nonsense; and the people by long habit acquire a relish for the poisonous messes which their purer palate at first received with loathing. The sentence of the first night is wiped away by the play-bill of the second morning; which, with a power most admirably magical, can turn hisses into plaudits, and transform the confusion of an execrating multitude into the extacy of admiring ranks; which can give to the grin of contempt an expression resembling the burst of delight, and change the angry shout of indignation to the festive roar of merriment. Indeed, a play-bill is a composition of true sublimity, according to the best definitions of the sublime: for it says a great deal to the ear, and leaves a great deal for the imagination. To the ear it speaks in the promissory passages, where we find the words grand, comic, splendid, &c. &c. all of which have a great effect upon the vulgar. And as to the imagination, that faculty of the mind is called into ample exercise by the historical portion of the play-bill, where the public are desired to believe that a piece has been received with unanimous applause, when it has in fact been totally condemned. Certainly the Proprietors deserve great credit for the wonderful powers of invention which they display on these occasions; contriving glories which they have never earned, creating a fictitious reputation, and spinning, like the spider, from their own frame, a covering of comfort and security.

The play-bills announcing Bonifacio and Bridgetina, have possessed these merits in a peculiar degree. And there are other minutiæ in the arrangement of these bills, which also merit very high approbation. For whereas ignorant people would have placed the names of the actors and characters first, the Proprietors have here given the first rank to those of the machinists and decorators, well knowing that the machinists and decorators are the persons who really make the piece. Nor can we refuse our tribute of admiration to the title, which sets the Melodrama in so many different lights, that every person's attention is sure to be roused. He whose enthusiasm is not excited by the silver-sweet names of Bonifacio and Bridgetina, will perhaps be struck with reverence by the appearance of a knightly hermit: The Windmill of the Turret attracts the notice of the volatile, and the melancholy are moved by the hope of beholding a Spectre in a Gallery

To be serious, for really this profanation of the stage is become almost too lamentable for a joke, was there ever an Advertisement issued at Bartholomew Fair more completely derogatory from the dignity of an elegant art, than the play-bills that we have just now cited! Pantomimes are the legitimate amusement of children: long custom has sanctioned their exhibition, and they are constantly brought out at the holidays. But such a thing as this is not warranted by custom; it is not presented before a youthful audience; it is not reconcileable to the plain principles of common sense: it is an absurd burlesque on an entertainment which is not absurd. The story and situations of the Piece are such as excite no risibility in the audience; and the whole of the joke is made to consist in the utter folly and vulgarity of the dialogue. But the true burlesque is produced not by weakening, but by exorbitantly overdoing reality; and the bombastic, not the familiar style, is the proper vehicle of such humour. If there was to be a burlesque upon Melodramas at all, it ought to have been mean in the situations, and lofty in the language, rather than lofty in the situations, and in the language mean. The exaltation of a trifle may amuse, but the degradation of splendour can only disgust. The humour of Fielding's Covent-garden Tragedy, which is by far the best of all the burlesques, consists in vulgar incident with swelling dialogue; and we are entertained by observing how the commonest occurrences may be magnified. In this Melodrama people in perilous circumstances and rich attire are made to talk like chimney-sweepers; and we are displeased to observe how grandeur may be humbled. It has been observed upon Gulliver's Travels, that the greatness of the little Lilliputians is admired, but that the littleness of the great Brobdignagians is totally foreign to all the principles of taste.

If the Proprietors are to continue this system of nonsense, of what use is the Theatre as a national concern? Taste and judgment are put totally aside: the imitation of Nature is abandoned for a bastard ballet: the stores of the treasury are wasted in shows to bribe the town's endurance of inanity; and Dr. Johnson's poetry is but too near to truth when, in declaring the possible vicissitudes of a London theatre, his prologue exclaims:—

"Perhaps, (for who can guess the effects of chance?)
"Here Hunt may box, or Mahomet may dance!"

The Oratorios, which have been carried on under the guidance of Mr. Ashley, are now concluded. As usual, the performances have been the pieces of Handel, occasionally varied with selections, &c.

The Oratorio seems to be a species of amusement but little suited for the English people. They do not relish music by rule, as foreigners do: they have no notion of admiring the composition of a master for the science which it displays, nor the executive power of a singer for the mere difficulties that it overcomes: they require something that shall operate upon their feelings, and pass the ear to the region of the heart. Handel is indeed a master, whose power of exciting sensations of deep pathos, of still sublimity, of mighty enthusiasm, has placed him on the highest roll of fame: but the mere excitation of these sensations, unconnected by story or interest, is not sufficient to occupy the attention of a large body of people for four successive hours. Besides, it will be observed, that the feelings even of the few who delight in these entertainments become more and more obtuse as the evening advances; and pieces of music, which would be hailed with rapture in the first act, pass off without an encore in the third. It cannot therefore, be matter of surprise, that the Oratorios in general are but thinly attended.

That which appears to have been most attractive is the Messiah: a work remarkable for a thousand beauties, and particularly pleasing to the multitude, from the grandeur of its choruses, which are generally the most popular parts of an Oratorio. The singers have been Mrs. Dickons and Mrs. Bland, Miss Bolton and Madame Dussek: Mr. Braham, Mr. Bellamy, Mr. Doyle Mr. Goss, and Mr. Grey. Mrs. Dickons and Mr. Braham are, neither of them, in our opinion, sufficiently natural and simple; they oftener astonish than charm us in the performance of Handel's works. Mrs. Bland and Miss Bolton; who certainly have not so much science, seem to us to possess much more of the genuine spirit in which such music should be sung. Nothing can be a more perfect example than the manner in which Mrs. Bland sings "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd." Madame Dussek has a lazy indolent style, which, though not without science, is certainly without grace or effect. Mr. Bellamy's grand voice is heard in sacred music with remarkable advantage: he is a singer of excellent judgment. Of the rest we have nothing particular to observe.

BOXING.

It having been given out that the matches between Young Belcher and Dockarty, and Dutch Sam and Cropley, were to take place on Tuesday at Moulsey Hurst, the regular patronizers of boxing assembled there before twelve o'clock, with a string of Nobility and Gentry; and after having been kept waiting nearly two hours, during which time there was a heavy fall of rain, intelligence was brought to the ring that the Magistrates had interfered, and the pugilists durst not engage in combat. This disappointment was not very well relished; and after each had kept his station in the ring for about half an hour, it was stated aloud, three of the Marlborough-street Officers had informed the pugilists, that if they fought they would be indicted, and that Dutch Sam and Belcher had consequently declined fighting their antagonists, unless the seat of combat was removed to Berkshire.

The Gentlemen present openly expressed their determination to protect the parties against any prosecution that might be instituted against them; but Dutch Sam could not be prevailed upon to face Cropley, and Young Belcher was prevented by his friends from meeting Dockarty. The Gentlemen, however, had met there to see a boxing match, and nothing less would do. A match for a purse was made between Jemmy from Town and a Gipsey, but it was, perhaps, as complete a burlesque on fighting as ever was witnessed. Neither of them had the least pretensions to skill. Jemmy, however, bore the palm of victory.

Another match was fought between a Kingston shoemaker and a London coal-heaver, in which the Londoner was victorious.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

Yesterday the Lunacy of Lord Aghrim was again discussed before the Chancellor. His Lordship, after taking a view of the case, said—"There are now before the Court two parties, one (Lady Abgrim applying to be appointed the Committee of her husband, the other the Earl and Countess of Athlone) petitioning to have the Master's Report sent back for revision, and that the Earl should be appointed Committee. I will not, said the Chancellor, to save myself trouble, send back the Master's Report; and to shew that I do not mean to shrink from my duty, I am ready to receive affidavits of medical men, as to the state of Lord Aghrim's mind from the time he left Scotland. Until I receive such affidavits, I cannot come to a final decision. In the mean time Lady Aghrim must retain the possession of his Lordship; but I wish it to be understood, that if any obstacle should be thrown by her in the way of the Earl and Countess of Athlone to procure necessary information, that Lady Aghrim shall not have the care of her husband one day longer. I shall be ready, on the first day after the recess, to receive the affidavits."

NAUTICAL INTELLIGENCE.

The Courageux, of 74 guns, arrived on Friday evening at Portsmouth, from off Cadiz. The state of the wind prevented her from communicating directly with the shore, and the news which she may have brought from the Mediterranean had not transpired when the post left Portsmouth. The intelligence brought by the Courageux, has, however, this day been communicated by telegraph to the Admiralty. We understand that the detailed reports of the action in the Mediterranean are false; but we cannot state positively that an action has not been fought; the Coquette sloop, of 18 guns, is also arrived at Portsmouth from off Lisbon.

ACTION BETWEEN L'AIGLE AND TWO FRENCH FRIGATES.

Accounts were on Thursday received of a most gallant action having been fought off L'Orient, between his Majesty's frigate L'Aigle of 36 guns, and two French ships of war, of 44 guns each. The latter were the Seine and Italienne, which were on their return to France from the West Indies. L'Aigle fell in with them in the night of the 26th ult. and notwithstanding the great disparity of force, gallantly attacked them. The conflict was obstinate, and resolutely maintained by our frigate for a considerable time, when the enemy were obliged to seek safety in flight, and shelter themselves under the batteries of L'Orient, L'Aigle being too much injured in her masts and rigging to pursue them with effect. We had one man killed and seven wounded in this gallant action; among the latter is Captain Wolfe, but we are happy to hear the wound is not dangerous.

Fresh accounts, received at the Out-ports, state, that one of the French frigates, attacked by L'Aigle, has actually been taken, and that L'Impetueux, of 74 guns, was in company. We fear, however, that this intelligence will not be confirmed. The dispatches before received by Government, state, that as soon as L'Aigle had brought one of them to action, and the latter perceived she must be taken, she set her sails, even her steering sails, and ran directly stem on upon the Isle of Groais, which is off L'Orient. All her top-masts immediately went over her side, and her mizen by the board, and she seemed the next morning to be a perfect wreck, the sea breaking over her, and herself upon her beam-ends. A shift of wind unfortunately rendered it impossible for L'Aigle to set fire to her, and the enemy sending some craft out of L'Orient, lightened her in such a manner that she floated off, and succeeded in getting into L'Orient. The other frigate escaped by out-sailing L'Impetueux, which was in company with L'Aigle. L'Aigle had nine men wounded, Capt. Wolfe slightly.

CHILDERS SLOOP OF WAR.

The following is an account of an engagement between the Childers sloop, Capt. Dillon, and a Danish vessel of superior force:—On the 14th ult. at four P. M. when standing in for the coast of Norway, the Childers discovered a galliot laden with oil and fish in shore, which was seeking the small port of Midbe for safety. Mr. Wilson, acting master, accompanied by Mr. Knight, mate; Mr. M'Nicholl, gunner; and Mr. Le Neve, purser, &c. although opposed by the inhabitants with musketry, whilst others hurled down stones upon the men from the top of the precipice, under which the vessel lay secured, yet they brought her out without any loss.—Scarcely had this been done, when a large brig was observed coming out of Hitteroe, that bore down with confidence, with the design of rescuing the prize. An action soon commenced at half gun-shot range, distant from the shore half a mile, and on the Dane (who carried long 18-pounders) receiving the first broadside, he caught fire forward, but kept so near the land, that the Childers could not weather him, who therefore enticed him about three miles further off, and passed under his lee, as close as it could be done, without touching, and poured round and grape upon his decks, which did the Dane much damage, for that the groans of the wounded could be distinctly heard; his guns also did the Childers material injury, most of the shot taking her between wind and water; and on the Dane making sail, the Childers found it impossible to follow, for she had five feet water in her hold, the magazine afloat, lower mast wounded, bowsprit and mainmast badly, and the pumps increasing on them in such a way as to make it doubtful whether the people would be able to prevent the vessel sinking.

OLD BAILEY.

On Friday Mary Frances Jones was tried for the wilful murder of her female bastard child. The prisoner lived servant with a Lady named Hewetson, the daughter of a Mrs. Burkitt. On the evening of the 3d of March, Mrs. Burkit and family went from home; during their absence, the prisoner complained that she was ill, and went to bed. The servants belonging to Mrs. B. afforded her every assistance, and suspicions were entertained that the prisoner had been brought-to-bed. She was questioned on the subject, and denied having been in the situation before mentioned. Dr. Smith, a Surgeon, being sent for, intimated an opinion that the prisoner had been lately delivered, and after a search had taken place in the room, a black trunk was found under the prisoner's bed, containing a new born dead infant, wrapped in a gown formerly worn by the prisoner. On the throat of the child a wound appeared three inches in length, from the ear to the under part of the jaw, and a pair of scissars was discovered near the bed, stained with blood. The trunk also contained baby linen, which was placed over the bundle. Under these appearances the Coroner's Jury found a verdict of murder against the prisoner, and she was committed for trial. The prisoner alledged in her defence, that she had inflicted the wound, in an effort to save herself during the time of her delivery, without the slightest intention to destroy the infant. The evidence of two Surgeons also proved that the situation of the infant might render it necessary to apply a sharp instrument. The Jury acquitted her of the murder, but found her guilty of concealing her pregnancy, which subjects her to imprisonment. She is a young woman of very interesting appearance, and conducted herself with great decorum and fortitude. The Court was numerously attended.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

SATURDAY, APRIL 9.—Charles White, a notorious swindler, was indicted for breaking out of Tothill Fields Bridewell, a few weeks since, he having been fully committed for fraud. The prisoner had been tried and acquitted on no less than four indictments during the present sessions, by points of law, and on being arraigned for this offence, he at first pleaded guilty, but afterwards recalled his plea and took his trial, which disclosed some curious circumstances. It appeared that the prisoner had broke out of Bridewell by forcing an iron bar, and he was afterwards heard of at Stratford, where Anthony the officer, and the prison keeper of Tothill Fields went to secure him. The prisoner made a stout resistance, and together with a ferocious bull-dog, kept the officers at a distance for some time; the particulars of which was inserted in a former paper. The warrant of committment was produced, and the prisoner was convicted.

SUICIDE.

On Tuesday evening a Coroner's Inquest was held on the body of Mr. L———, of Cornhill, who shot himself the preceding day. The servants were examined as to the fact.

It was given in evidence, that on arriving early in town he complained of being indisposed, and said he would retire to bed till half-past eleven o'clock, when he requested he might be called. About that hour Mr. C———, his partner, enquired for him, and being made acquainted with the orders he had given, desired the female servant to knock at his chamber-door. The servant did as she was ordered; but receiving no answer, opened the door and perceived the deceased lying on the bed. Although she was not certain that he was dead, her alarm induced her to run down stairs, and communicate her fears. Mr. C———, the porter, and the servant, returned to the chamber together, and found Mr. L——— lifeless. He had two pistols lying by him, the contents of one of which he had discharged into his mouth, and which is supposed to have caused his instant death; the other remained loaded. Mr. L———'s depressed state of mind, for some time past, was deposed to, which concluded the evidence.—The Jury gave in their verdict, Insanity. Mr. L——— had given a letter to his coachman, in the morning, to be delivered to Mrs. L———; he left one behind him for Mr. C———, and another for his nephew, who was on the eve of becoming a partner in the house.

It appears that Mr. L———'s affairs are minus to the amount of 60,000*l*. One person, it is supposed, will sustain a loss of 30,000*l*.

DIED.

Admiral Rainier, on Thursday, at his house in Great George-street. By his death there is a vacancy for the borough of Sandwich.

Tuesday se'nnight, after the funeral service in the Catholic chapel at Bristol, the remains of the Dowager Countess of Fingal were deposited in a vault adjoining the chapel, to be removed at a more advanced part of the year to the family vault at Killeen, in Ireland.

Mr. Ledger, who for upwards of forty years held a confidential situation at Covent-Garden Theatre, with credit to himself, and advantage to his employers, died suddenly on Saturday se'nnight of an apoplexy, to the sincere regret of all who knew him.

THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

Our King, Constitution, and Laws.

No. 16. SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1808. PRICE 8d.

GRATIS.

A PORTRAIT OF HIS MAJESTY GEORGE III.

BEAUTIFULLY ENGRAVEN BY SCRIVEN, AND INTENDED AS A

FRONTISPIECE TO THE NATIONAL REGISTER,

Was to have accompanied the Emblematical Title Page and delivered GRATIS to the Purchasers of that Paper on its Commencement, viz. SUNDAY, JANUARY, 3, 1808. In consequence, however, of the difficulties that always arise in the outset of so arduous an undertaking, the Proprietors were unable to accomplish that part of their Plan; but as those difficulties have now ceased they are happy to inform the PATRONS of THE NATIONAL REGISTER, and the PUBLIC IN GENERAL, that the beautifully engraven Portrait of OUR SOVEREIGN is now finished by Mr. SCRIVEN, and will be ready for Delivery on SUNDAY NEXT; the Resemblance is unquestionable; and the whole Print is positively a Master-piece in the Art of Engraving. The National Register is designed to be preserved and formed into a Volume at the End of every Year, so as to exhibit to posterity a faithful Record of the present eventful Age: and the Motto of the Paper

"OUR KING, CONSTITUTION, AND LAWS."

enforces the necessity of the present Embellishment. It is hoped that the splendid manner with which the Proprietors have ever conducted their Works, will induce the Public to expect a spirited and admirable Portrait of his MAJESTY; it may be necessary to say, that the Portrait will be delivered SEPARATE from The National Register, and printed on Copper Plate Paper, so as to form a Print that would not be sold by any Printseller for less than Four Shillings.

Our Patrons in the Country are requested to observe, that the Portrait of his Majesty will be invariably DELIVERED GRATIS to the Newsmen, for the purpose of being transmitted to their Subscribers, by the safest and most convenient mode. But as it will be impossible for the Newsmen to forward the Portrait by the Post, without incurring the risk of spoiling the Print, and the Expence of Postage, the Proprietors beg leave to submit to their Friends the necessity of their requesting some Bookseller in the Country to obtain it from his Agents in London, who will inclose it in his parcel. This will obviate every difficulty, and secure its safe arrival. To any of the Friends of the Paper, who may be disappointed of the Portrait, or to any Friend commissioned by them, an impression will be gratuitously delivered at the Office of The National Register. But it will be necessary for the Subscriber, in this case, to send his real name, and place of abode, in a note addressed to the Proprietors.

Those who may have neglected to complete their sets, are requested to give early orders, to prevent the chance of disappointment.

Immediate Orders for the Paper should be given, to prevent the possibility of disappointment, addressed (post paid) to the Proprietors, No. 11, Catherine-street, Strand, to the Clerks of the Roads, or Newsmen, throughout the United Kingdom.

THE TRIAL OF GENERAL WHITELOCKE IS NOW COMPLETED,

The First Part of which was DELIVERED GRATIS to the Purchasers of THE NATIONAL REGISTER.

If any disappointments have occurred, Orders should be sent (post-paid) to the Newsman who sends the Paper, and he will immediately transmit it; but as a difficulty has taken place at the Post Office relative to its being forwarded by that channel into the Country, the Proprietors beg leave to request that Orders may be given to the different Booksellers throughout the United Kingdom, who will cause it to be sent by their Correspondents in London, so as to save expence, and prevent the possibility of disappointment.

* * Any Number of Sets, Price 9*d*. each, may be had of all the Booksellers and Newsmen throughout the United Kingdom.

POLITICAL DISQUISITION.

NUMBER SIXTEEN.

ON LORD CASTLEREAGH'S NEW PROPOSITIONS FOR THE DEFENCE OF THE COUNTRY.

The ordinary force which has long been kept up for the purposes of National Defence, has been of two kinds, the Regular Army and the Militia. But it has of late years appeared necessary to provide also some kind of subsidiary force adapted to co-operate with the ordinary establishments. A great number of plans have been proposed for this purpose, and almost all of them have been found deficient in many material points. His Majesty's present Ministers have thought it requisite to do away the Training Bill of Mr. Windham, and Lord Castlereagh now proposes a plan by which he hopes to provide, not only for the immediate but for the permanent defence of the country. A plan that will secure permanent defence is of course greatly preferable to any temporary resort: but in proportion as we are prepared to welcome any rational proposal for this purpose, we must be cautious of admitting too hastily any scheme that does not carry strong appearance of probable benefit.

The system of military defence which is now proposed by the Noble Secretary is threefold. The force is to consist—First, Of the Regular Army, which will be sustained by the old method of recruiting; secondly, Of the Ordinary Militia, which is to be reinforced by the ballot; and thirdly, Of a new species of soldiers, to be denominated the Local Militia. This Local Militia is to contain about 60,000 men, who, in addition to the Volunteers, will compose a subsidiary force that Ministers deem sufficient, with the Regulars and Militia, for the defence of the country against any possible attack: and it is the wish of Government, in the event of an invasion, to incorporate with regular regiments the men who shall have been disciplined in the Local Militia. The Local Militia will be trained near their own homes: but the crown will be enabled to embody them for twenty-one days in the year, within their own county: and no substitution will be allowed, but heavy fines imposed on all who may not attend. The liable age will be the period between 18 and 35.

In a country like Great Britain, where every body is accustomed to freedom of speech, it would be almost impossible to propose any plan that could escape the censure of some discontented persons. But in a country like Great Britain, where every body is accustomed to personal freedom too, it is not to be supposed that such a plan as that now proposed can escape a very general unpopularity. A Minister comes forward and states, by way of preamble to a new Military System, that the measures adopted last year have added no fewer than 40,000 men to our Militia and Regular Force: and then he desires the people of this kingdom to grant him a further subsidiary force, which seems to be new in nothing but its compulsory tendency.

Digitized by Google

He asks for a subsidiary force, in which no man will be allowed to serve by substitute, although the Crown will be enabled to command permanent duty for one-and-twenty days in the year. Is this reconcileable to the principles of a free Government? Lord Castlereagh knows that it is not, and therefore he makes a relaxation in favour of persons "prevented by very serious business." What relaxation does he make? Why, he gives them the power of paying "serious fines." But, says his Lordship, "if substitutes were allowed in this Local Militia, it would go "directly to impose a heavy tax: men would magnify "the importance of the duties of the service, and would "give large sums to substitutes." So in order to avoid imposing a heavy tax, his Lordship proposes a serious fine. A strange kind of relaxation indeed! But then it will be said, a man will escape these inconveniencies if he belong to a Volunteer Corps: for the Volunteer Corps do not generally go out upon permament duty, but content themselves with exercising near their respective homes. The effect then of Lord Castlereagh's plan is either to avoid a tax by the imposition of a fine, or to raise a subsidiary force by compelling people to volunteer!

In a former number we expressed a regret that after so great an outcry about reform in the Military System of Great Britain, Mr. Windham introduced nothing more than an alteration in the business of recruiting the regular, ordinary, and subsidiary force of our Military Establishment. But though we have blamed him for having effected so little where so much was necessary to be done, and though we even conceive that in the reforms he has actually made, perfection has by no means been attained: yet we see still greater reason for impeaching the rage of alteration, which seems to be so peculiarly the taste of modern statesmen. The inconveniences of change are always so great, and most particularly in a military system, that no alteration should ever be introduced which does not give the strongest hope of great and material benefit. The system of the Militia, though perhaps absolutely necessary for the existence of the country, is felt by the country as a great annoyance: and if, even when the principles that govern that system are clear and fixed, the system itself be regarded as a grievance, how much more grievous does it become, when the introduction of some inefficient alteration gives occasion every year to a fresh Act of Parliament, puzzles the understandings of the people, and keeps their nuisance constantly before their eyes! We certainly conceive that it is the duty of that great mass of the people, whom education and circumstances have disqualified from judging on abstruse points of politics, to submit quietly to the reasonable acts of the Government, and not busy themselves, except upon some appearance of flagrant wrong, in investigating matters which they cannot understand. But we also think that it is the duty, as well as the interest of Government not to shock unnecessarily even the mistaken feelings of the people: not to destroy that magic of opinion, on which the good order of the State, and the absolute existence of every Government, must always so materially depend. And when we see the Ministers coming forward year after year, every time with a fresh plan, but never with a plan containing any thing fresh, at least any thing fresh that can be of serious advantage, we feel inclined to deprecate, in the strongest manner, the idle fashion, that occupies the attention of our countrymen merely to torment them, and even diminishes the benefits that might be expected from a quiet continuance of any one plan. There is scarcely any one of the numerous schemes, that might not be made to satisfy Englishmen tolerably well, if it were left to itself, though none of them exactly suit our ideas of a good military system: but no one has its fair chance: for as soon as the people have ceased to worry themselves with the last innovation, and from habit are become a little reconciled to any inconveniences it may contain, a new plan is obtruded upon their notice, and banishes the grievances of the last, not by a better invention, but by other grievances of its own.

The principal hardship introduced by the new Bill is the compulsion of permanent duty, unmitigated by the resource of substitution. And this is a measure of two-fold inexpediency: inasmuch as it affects both the liberties and the morals of the people.—The old system of ballot, which affected only persons in humbler life, was a subject of great complaint: because as such persons had seldom the means of providing substitutes, personal service became almost unavoidable to them. But the present Bill goes to extend the oppressive operation of the old principle of ballot, and at the same time to destroy its alleviations. The rich and the poor, the man of business and the man of pleasure, are now all equally summoned to personal service: and though upon the ancient plan, the chance of poor persons for avoiding personal service was but small, yet that small chance was better than none. And none at all is there now, for any class of people. Is it possible to conceive any greater inconvenience than that which this Bill will produce to men employed in active mercantile pursuits, which require their constant presence? To men engaged in the liberal professions, who cannot exercise their functions by proxy? To all concerned in the education of youth? To every clerk, whose weekly salary depends upon the certainty of his attendance in his business? The necessity of paying for a substitute was a necessity grievous enough to many of these classes; but the requisition of personal service on permanent duty for one-and-twenty days, is a matter almost of absolute ruin.

The mischiefs of permanent duty to the morals of the people, it is hardly necessary to urge. Even the Regulars, who are under much closer discipline than it is possible to enforce upon temporary Soldiers, and who have not the seduction of a new and sudden change of life to betray them into particular idleness and excess, are nevertheless exceedingly injurious to the morals of every town in which they are quartered: and when the Local Militia, shifting from business to sudden leisure, habited in a new and gay attire, becoming the gaze of the inhabitants of the towns in which they are stationed, surrounded in short with almost every temptation that idleness, vanity, and dissipation can present to inexperienced and thoughtless minds, shall take up their quarters in the heart of a country, it is easy to guess what riots and debaucheries will grow among themselves, and creep upon the society with which they come in contact.

If these are the mischiefs of change, the people of this country will soon shudder at the very rumour of it. For our own parts, we shall never cease to look anxiously for the time when the words "military reform" shall assume the sense that they ought to bear: when they shall no longer denote a partial removal of petty mischiefs, by the introduction of mischiefs on a different construction, but shall signify a grand, complete, and radical extermination of the corrupt causes that agitate our military state, and an introduction of such a plan as by consulting at once the ease, the liberty, the safety, and the morality of the people, may supercede both the necessity and the desire of any further alteration.

REVIEW OF POLITICAL DECLAIMERS.

No. XVI.

THE INDEPENDENT WHIG.

In the last Number of The National Register we warned our honest and unsuspecting countrymen against a belief of the poisonous flatteries with which of late they have been so assiduously plied. An opinion has gone abroad, and deserves to be reprobated, that no man concerned in the Government of the country can be honest: this opinion tends to the overthrow of all order and of all society: and therefore against this opinion we are determined most strenuously to combat. Dramatists and Poets have often said these things; and when they are said only by Dramatists and Poets, they are attended with very little danger to the country, because they are evidently said to display the wit rather than the opinion of the writers, and being circulated only among the higher classes of society who think for themselves, do not tend to weaken principles. But now a notion of this kind has become most truly formidable, because it is no longer the sportive effusion of the Satirical Epicurean, but the determined principle of the mischievous republicanist. It is propagated in debating societies, and published in Newspapers: the people are roused by imaginary injuries, and become the dupes of enthusiasts or hypocrites: coarseness and folly are now the paths to profit, and the Editors of the Newspapers, having poisoned the minds of the mob, continue to accumulate wealth by fomenting and inflaming the unnatural heats they have created.

We are sorry to rake in the dirt for an instance: but amid the filth of ignorance, and the lowest sediment of vulgarity, lie the example that we wish to present to the indignation of the public. That example is the production called The Independent Whig. It has nothing which can entitle it even to our notice, except its circulation. But when we find that such a thing has been imposed upon well-meaning, though mis-informed persons, as a fair statement of the grievances under which the people are labouring: when we understand that its sale among the lower classes of society, like that of obscene prints in less humble circles, is gaining ground in proportion to the mischievous tendency of the production itself: and when we reflect that the persons who take in this Independent Whig are most of them people whom education has not qualified to detect all the absurdity, inaccuracy, and vulgarity, which swarm along its columns; we cannot help feeling it incumbent on ourselves to explain to them the nature of the publication which they trust, and to warn them against a guide, who, like the celebrated criminal, presents a nosegay to the passenger, with a lancet concealed in flowers.

Let us observe the unreasonable style in which The Independent Whig always speaks of foreign affairs. We quote a leading article that appeared in that Paper on the 3d of April:—

"From the wavering indecision" (by the bye how should indecision be otherwise than wavering), "and irresolute measures that mark the feeble Councils," (that is we suppose counsels) "and capricious conduct of our Copenhagen Ministers," (and it would be just as good sense to say that their capricious conduct marked their irresolute measures as to say that their irresolute measures mark their capricious conduct) "it plainly appears "that at the present moment they scarcely know what to do "with the King of Sweden."

What would The Independent Whig have them to do with him? march him to Paris? or send him to over-run the unknown districts of Africa? Its Editor seems to imagine, that a Minister to be good for any thing must be omnipotent.

"—while this pensioned and unfortunate Monarch, who sees "the brink of ruin to which he has suffered himself to be hurried, seems equally dissatisfied and uncertain what to do with "himself. At one time, like the bragging and bullying Falstaff, he feels proudly confident of his own valour, and "strongly inclined to let honour prick him on; but at another "time, like that pusillanimous and unwieldy knight, he is "suddenly panick-stricken, lest honour should prick him "off."

This sentence is a chef d'œuvre of ignorance, mis-statement, and injustice—"This pensioned monarch—" What, is a Prince to be styled a pensioner, because he receives a subsidy from a wealthy ally? "Like the bragging and bullying Falstaff"—Falstaff is certainly a braggart, but where does he prove himself a bully? "Like Falstaff, the King of Sweden feels proud-"ly confident of his own valour"—In what play does Falstaff feel any confidence in his own valour? "Like that unwieldy "Knight"—Is the King of Sweden like Falstaff in unwieldiness? "He is suddenly panick stricken"—Has the King of Sweden ever done any thing that looks like cowardice? We should like to know what course the Editor of The Independent Whig would have recommended, if he could have advised the King of Sweden!

"Our wise and vigorous Ministers would wish him to con-"tinue a vain and hopeless resistance to the formidable con-"federacy with which he is surrounded, and would be grieved "to hear that he had entered into a negotiation, or made the "amende honorable to France."

Amende honorable means a handsome apology. Now, for what Sweden is to apologise to France, we own ourselves unable to conjecture. That our Ministers would be grieved to hear of a negotiation, is a malicious slander: for Lord Hawkesbury, in discussing his Majesty's message on the Swedish treaty, stated, that "our Government had expressly communicated to "the King of Sweden, that it would feel no dissatisfaction at "his concluding a separate peace with the enemy, provided it "should be on terms not injurious to the just rights of this "country."

The Whig goes on: "But they (our Ministers) are very un-"willing to risk their own reputation upon the issue of the "contest, or trust him with an English army for his de-"fence."

Why should they risk their reputation upon foreign counsels? or, while we are engaged in a war of our own, send out our forces to fight out the wars of other people? No victories in that part of Europe, even if we could spare men enough to afford the King of Sweden a chance of conquering the powerful forces assembled against him, could be of any use in restoring the balance of power and the tranquillity of the Continent: All that the King of Sweden and our Ministers should expect, at the utmost, is to prevent the enemies of Sweden from doing her any material injury, and, by keeping them always in check, to show that she may as well be left quietly to herself. The war of Sweden is a defensive war: we want to effect her safety, (which our subsidies, well employed in the supply of her own troops, may probably procure), and not to fight battles with our forces, in the hope of gaining useless victories.

Another absurd and unfounded attack upon Ministers appeared in The Whig published last Sunday:

"When all eyes are anxiously directed towards the proceed-"ings of our fleets in the Mediterranean, and every tongue is "busily employed in circulating some new and extravagant "story of a brilliant victory or a terrible defeat, our Copenha-"gen Ministers seem totally at a loss how to account for their "own ignorance upon the subject, or what explanation to give "of their strange and ambiguous conduct. They have, indeed, "in consequence of frequent importunities and anxious inquiries "from the relatives of our gallant officers and seamen, contrived "to squeeze out a sort of demi-official intimation; and in order "to satisfy the restless impatience of the public, and quiet their "gloomy apprehensions, they tell them, that 'although from "the relative situation of the fleets in the Mediterranean, an "engagement was highly probable, yet that Government had "received no certain advices on the subject.' This laconic and "satisfactory answer, which has now been repeated for above "three weeks," (this answer to the inquiries of public curiosity is, with a noble disregard of all accuracy, stated as having been repeated for above three weeks, though the reports that roused the public curiosity had only been in town since the Wednesday se'nnight before) "reminds us of the celebrated reply of the "Delphic Oracle, to the enquiries of the Roman General, who, "asking as to the probable result of an approaching battle, was "answered by the wily priestess in these circulatory terms: "Oh Romans! either you will conquer your enemies, or your "enemies will conquer you."

Here, as in the foregoing instance of the comparison between the King of Sweden and Sir John Falstaff, the writer shows a thorough ignorance of the topic from which he draws his attempt at illustration. The answer (which as originally delivered was ambiguous, but which as quoted here, is absolute nonsense), was given to no Roman General, but to Pyrrhus, King of Epirus, who wished to assist the Tarentines against the Romans. But the Romans and their enemies are all alike to The Independent Whig: the Editor, like Scrub in the Beaux Stratagem, knows it was one or the other, but whether it were Sullen or Dorinda he does not care. However, we are unwilling that his readers should give him credit for quite so much classical information as he assumes, when, from both the illustrations he has attempted, the real fact appears most clearly to be, that he has been told about Falstaff, without having read Shakespeare, and heard of the Romans and the Oracle, without having looked into the Latin and Greek historians. But if he does not understand Latin or Greek, we should advise him to get a translation next time he attempts any allusion to a passage in a dead language. For the words of the Oracle, "Credo te, Æacida, Romanos vincere posse," though they leave an ambiguity, yet do not directly assert a self-evident proposition, such as, "You will conquer them, or they you:" for Pyrrhus would have laughed at that: but by a transposition of words the sense is thus guarded: "I think that you the Romans may overcome:" and thus it is left to Pyrrhus to understand the words either as "You "may overcome the Romans;" or as "The Romans may overcome you." But how does this sentence, correctly or incorrectly given, apply to the Ministers? The Ministers simply say, "We know nothing certain, and therefore nothing certain can "we tell you."

What follows is still more worthy of observation:

"If the Ministers were informed of the 'relative positions' "of our squadrons, and those of our enemies, one would suppose "that they could, with equal facility, tell us precisely where "they were and what they were; of how many they consisted "and what dispatches had been transmitted by our own Commanders upon the subject. Now, if the 'relative situation' "of the hostile fleets were such as to render an engagement "highly probable, there is great reason to believe that before "this time an engagement must have taken place: and, if successful, Ministers must know it: and if no action have been "fought, they must know the reason why, unless we suppose "what is not very probable, or at least not very creditable to "their abilities—that they are perfectly informed of their relative positions, but wholly unacquainted with their subsequent operations. The truth is, in our opinion, that Ministers have either received some unpleasant intelligence which "they are unwilling to disclose to the public, or that they are "shamefully ignorant upon the subject."
